47. The year following wherein T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minucius were Consuls, a great dearth fell upon the Citie, the effect of the late Sedition. For, the Commons having departed a little after the Autumnal Equinoctial, about the time of sowing, the Countrey was forsaken of husband-men; the richer sort betaking themselves to the Patricians, and the poorer to the Army, and the division continued till a little before Mid-winter. All the middle space of time there was no tillage, though it was most proper for sowing, and for some time after the agreement, it could scarce be renewed, for that Slaves had run away, and there was great scarcity of Cattle by these means for the year following they were little beforehand in Corn, either for seed or provisions. This put the Senate upon sending into several parts of Italy, and also into Sicily, to buy Corn. But notwithstanding their care, the multitude being exceedingly pinched with Famine, raised tumults, getting together by companies, and laying all the fault upon the Fathers, as if by their wilfull neglect they had in this way revenged themselves. The Volsci being acquainted with this new Sedition, and the weak Estate of Rome, conspired how to improve the advantage; but were diverted by a grievous plague, which so raged, as Velitra a Noble Citie of that Countrey was almost utterly exhausted, the small remnant of the Inhabitants whereof gave up them-themselves to the Romans, desiring they would send a Colony thither.

48. Of this advantage the Senate was very glad, to lessen the multitude of the City; and the poor were content to inhabit so fertile a place; but when they considered the danger of infection, they were again discouraged, and wrested this to so bad a sense, as to make it a design to destroy them. But the Senate laying a great penalty upon such as refused to go, many obeyed and went thither, as also to Norba a Latin Town. This enraged more such as stood behind, being still pinched by the famine, so that raising great multitudes, they called the Tribunes into the Comitium. Great strife hapned betwixt the Consuls and them; The Tribunes affirming they had promised not to interrupt them in their discourses to the People, to which the other answered, that it was onely when they called the People together, not when the Consuls themselves did it, as now they had done, to promise them all fair accommodation from the Senate. Hereupon Brutus, who being so great a stickler before, was chosen one of the first Tribunes, devised a Law, which under such a penalty as the Tribunes should impose, forbade any one to contradict or interrupt them, when they spoke to the People. Such as could or would not give security for the payment of the fine, were to be put to death, and their goods be sacred to Ceres. If any controversy arose about the fine, it was to be determined by the judgment of the People.

new Law in behalf of the Tribunes.

49. This Law being enacted by the Suffrages of the Tribes, caused greater disturbance; the Senate refusing to ratify the resolves of the People, and the People the Decrees of the Senate; yet proceeded it not to any greater inconveniency than words, and some blows without weapons. For the poor broke not into the store-houses of the rich, but were content to purchase victuals at an excessive rate; and when money failed were contented with roots and herbs: neither did the rich deal harshly with the poor, but carried it towards them as indulgent fathers, so that we must say, it was the infirmity of the Government, and not any bad disposition of the People which caused the Seditions. The Consuls, to divert their minds, and ease the charge, offered to lead them out into the Enemies Country, but few or none would give their names; so that Marcus Coriolanus with some Patricians, and a few of their Clients made incursions, and returned home laden with booty; the knowledge whereof made the poorer sort murmur against their Tribunes, who had dissuaded them from the Expedition. The following Consuls M. Minucius Augurinus, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, famous for their abilities both in War and Peace, bent themselves, by making provision for Corn, to allay the present distempers; though not with wished success. They procured much to be imported, and this Summer returned those that were sent into Sicilie, with a great quantity of Wheat, whereof half they bought at a very cheap rate, and half was bestowed on them by Gelon, the Son of Dionomenes. Now the Patricians considering how to dispose of the Corn; some were for selling it to the poor at easie rates, thereby to win upon the multitude, but others urged they were to be harshly used and afflicted, and the Corn to be sold to them on dear rates; that by necessity they might be brought to sobriety, and become subject to the Laws.

Corn brought out of Sicilie.

Coriolanus his
thereupon.

50. Amongst these was Coriolanus the chief, being offended with the Commons, as was given out, for a repulse at the last election of Consuls. He had been ever an extraordinary assertor of the power of the Nobility, which made the People afraid to chuse him; but now incensed he much more shewed his inclination, openly declaiming against the innovation of the multitudes, and exhorting others to resist the petulant endeavours of the Tribunes and rabble. The Consuls calling together the Senate, he enlarged himself in a set speech to this purpose, and pressed that by force they should take away the Tribuneship, as the onely means for the recovery of the State; concluding with his opinion, that no favour at all should be shewed to the multitude in the sale of Corn. Some were offended with this freedom, perceiving what inconvenience it would bring; but others approving of it, the Tribunes who were present (say both Dionysius and Plutarch) ran forth, and crying

crying out, called the People together, and declared to them the effect of Marcus his speech. The multitude enraged, would have violated the Senate instantly, but that the Tribunes stayed them, laying the whole blame upon Marcus. They sent some Beadels for him to come and answer it before the People, but they returning with nothing but ill words, they went themselves, and commanded the Ædiles to apprehend him. These were Brunus and Isilius the first Tribunes, who going to do what was enjoined, were repulsed and beaten by the young Patricians he had got about him. This put all into a flame, the whole City being gathered together and ready to destroy it self; but by the wisdom of the Consuls the matter was put off till the following day. Then the Consuls laboured to heal the breach, confirming as from the Fathers, what was formerly granted to the Commons, and palliating as much as might be the supposed offence of Marcus. The Tribunes answering, inveighed against the Senate, as desirous to break their faith, and laying open the fault of Marcus, concluded the action with a Decree of their College, That he should be forthwith cast down headlong from the Tarpeian Rock. For, having given him liberty to speak, he was so far from recanting his former speeches, that he flew out into the same invectives, as they were termed.

51. The Ædiles laying hands on him, the Patricians again rescued him, the sober part even of them taking it ill he should be condemned to death without due proceſſe, and the more understanding sort of the Commons not approving of the attempt; so as a great tumult being raised, the Tribunes nullified their former Decree, and set him a day wherein to answer, and stand or fall by the judgement of the People. In the mean time the Senate, by selling the Corn at moderate rates, and by intreaties, sought either to procure the tryal to be utterly laid aside, or at least to defer it till the wrath of the multitude should be appeased, which was also to be employed in a War against Antium. When the former could not be done, and the War was blown over, the Consuls being very unwilling to let the People take so much upon themselves, as without Decree of the Senate first had (according to the ancient custom) to passe their judgement in any case, procured the Tribunes first to sue out such a Decree, on this condition, that they might be heard speak their minds, and each Senator before he gave his judgment, swear solemnly, as was usual in judicature proceſſe, to deliver what he thought most behoveful for the Publick. The Tribunes then argued much in behalf of the Commons, who they said had undergone the heat of all Wars, both in the time of Kings, in the expulsion of them, and since in the enlarging the Roman Dominion; in consideration whereof, they could not in conscience have lesser privileges than of late they had obtained. They aggravated by several circumstances the crime of Marcus, who in so high a manner had gone about to infringe them, and therefore as well for maintenance of right, as the safety of the City, they desired he might be left to the justice of the People. Appius Claudius stiffly impugned the Decree, arguing that the Senate would be enervated, and the Commonwealth betrayed, if they granted to the People power of judging Patricians.

52. M. Valerius, and other popular men made a better construction of the People's desire, thinking they would use this power moderately, and in opposition to Appius his politic reasons, strangely conceived it would make for the security of the Commonwealth, and particular members thereof, if the Commons were admitted to some share in the Government; that so it might neither wholly lye in the Patricians nor Plebeians, but be tempered and poised betwixt both. He urged, that they had allaid the Kingly power, by giving it to two annual Magistrates, and that therefore there was no fear of it's degenerating into Tyranny, being also awed by the oversight of 300 most prudent and worthy persons, of which the Senate consisted. But for the Senate it self, there was no curb; so that it might afterwards (though of the present members he had no cause to judge so) draw all things into extremity, and indeed ruine the State, except the People might be admitted

SECT. I. to have an hand in the judgment of such faults as concerned the Commonwealth, as when any was accused of moving Sedition, affecting Tyranny, Treason, or the like crimes; because the more solemn and severe the tryal was, ambitious men would be the more terrified from such attempts. The generality inclining to give up the man, Marcins demanded of the Tribunes whereof they would accuse him. They consulting with themselves apart, knew not well how to form an impeachment out of his former words, which might passe with the Senate, and therefore answered, they would lay the affectation of Tyranny to his charge. Hereat he very chearfully put himself upon tryal, not refusing the severest punishment, if it could be proved; and a Decree of the Senate passed accordingly, time being given him till the third Market day, to prepare for it. For a Market was kept once in nine dayes, at which time the People that lived in the Country, came either to traffick, receive justice, or give their Suffrages in such matters as either primarily concernd them, or were referred from the Senate. When the day came, a greater multitude of Country-men than ever formerly was seen, early in the morning placed it self in the Forum, and the Tribunes called the People to the Comitia Tributa, or Assemblies of the Tribes, severing each Tribe from another by cords. Now it having been the custom for the People to give their suffrages by Centuries in the Campus Martius in arms, and under their Centurions, the Patricians called hard for them, and protested against this innovation; but by the other way of Centuries brought in by Servius, the ordinary sort of People being excluded, (for that most commonly the two first Classes caried it from the other four) the Tribunes would in no case suffer it, and the crime of Coriolanus seeming to concern all alike, at length they obtained the consent of the Patricians to this innovation.

He answereth
before the People.

53. Minucius the Consul beginning the action, declared the worth of the person now to be judged, and exhorting the People to mildnesse, signified that the Senate became petitioners in his behalf. Sicinius one of the Tribunes said, he would neither betray the liberty of the People, nor suffer another to do it; therefore if the Patricians would, as they pretended, subject him to their judgment, he would give forth the balls without any more to do, to which the Consul replied, they did so, but on this condition, that he should answer to the charge of affected Tyranny, and therewith protesting, went down. Sicinius then ripping up all that ever Coriolanus did, that might any way make for his purpose, laboured to put a bad construction upon it. But when the party came to speak, he so related what particular services he had done the State, and shewed the skars received all over his body; withall, those that he had saved in the Wars, made such lamentation in his behalf, that the People generally cried out he was to be discharged. Then Decius another of the Tribunes stepping up, said, that seeing the Senate, as the Consul alleged, had absolved Marcins from those words he had spoken in their house, and suffered him not to be accused for them, he would wave his words, and come to actions, by which he would make good the charge. Their was a certain Law, that all booty and plunder got in War, should be appropriated to publick use, so as no General was to meddle with it, but give it up into the hands of the Quaestor. Now, whereas no man ever brake this Law, or so much as spake against it, this Marcins, saith he, hath dared to contemn it; for when in the late incursion into the Territories of Anium, we had got great plenty of Slaves, Cattel, and Provisions, he neither delivered these things up to the Quaestor, nor payed any money unto the Treasury, but divided all the booty amongst his friends, which could not but be taken as an argument that he intended to enslave his Country; it being the custom of Tyrants, this way to procure themselves instruments for their purpose. Though he had done this not with any sinister intention, but for the service of his Country, at such time as all were full of Seditions at home, and the Enemy from abroad wasted the Roman Territories; yet the multitude interpreted it in the same sence as Decius, and the whole matter was quite charged; he being abashed at so unexpected a charge, and the Consuls is banished.

Consuls and Patricians utterly to seek what to answer. The Tribunes then named perpetual banishment, and gathered the suffrages of the Tribes, which being 21 in number, 9 onely absolved him, and so he stood condemned by the major part.

SECT. I.

54. This was the first sentence passed by the people upon any Patritian, and henceforth the Tribunes were wont to set the day to whomsoever they pleased; whereby the power of the Commons was enlarged exceedingly, and the interest of the Patritians was more and more diminished; Plebeians at length being admitted into the Senate, Offices, and Priesthoods, which in former times were onely communicated to the other: the Senate partly against their wills and by constraint, partly by a wise foresight giving way to it, as will be seen in due place. Marcins being accompanied home with the lamentations and tears of many, saluted his Mother, Wife, and Children, as they made pitifull complaints, and without any appearance of trouble, bidding them bear their condition cheerfully, straitway departed out of the Citie, attended onely by a few Clients, and without any thing to bear his charges. He went to Antium, and there in the habit and posture of an obnoxious suppliant betook himself to Tullus Attius, a man of royal condition amongst the Volsci, both for Nobility, Riches, and Valour, whom he knew to be his greatest Enemy in that Nation, because in battel they had often challenged each other, and out of Emulation added a private to the publick hatred. But knowing him to be of a magnanimous mind, and most willing to catch hold of any advantage against the Romans, he cast himself at his feet, bidding him either avenge his Countrey of him, or else him against Rome, which by her unnatural carriage toward him had forfeited all duty and service that she might have expected at his hands. Tullus imbracing him with singular kindnesse, resolved to make use of his great abilities. Marcins advised that some fair pretext might first be sought for War, and for that purpose sending many of the Volsci to behold the solemn Games at Rome, caused one to go to the Consuls, and accuse them of having some design against the Citie, that so they forcing them out on a sudden, might be said to have broken the peace. This accordingly succeeding (for the Consuls commanded all by Proclamation to be gone before Sun-set) Tullus so aggravated the matter to his Countrey-men, that he procured them to send to Rome to demand back all the Towns and Territories which by War had been taken from them.

against Rome.

55. The Senate taking the message in great scorn, answered, that if the Volsci first took up Arms, the Romans would last lay them down. Tullus then perswading the Volsci to the War, procured Marcins to be joyned with him as General, with full power, who presently invading the Roman Dominions, wasted all such grounds where ere he came as belonged to the Plebeians, not suffering any thing to be touched which belonged to any of the Nobility. His design was accomplished; for this raised great envy and malice against the Patritians, who upbraiding the people that they had banished unjustly so considerable a man, were accused with greater indignation, that to be revenged for former injuries they had procured Marcins to invade the Countrey, seeing they were idle spectators, when others were undone, and kept their goods, being out of all danger of the War. Coriolanus leading home his men richly laden with booty, was sent out shortly after with one half of the Forces, and taking by surrender the Town of the Circeians, a Roman Colony, thence invaded the Latines, who being Confederate with Rome sent thither for relief; but the common people were averse to the War, and the Consuls being almost out of their Office were unwilling to begin any thing; so that the Messengers were dismissed without any satisfactory answer. Marcins then by storm took Tolerium, Lavici, Pes, and Bola, which he plundered, and made the Inhabitants Slaves. Such as yielded he mildly treated, but having stormed Bola, which lay within thirteen miles of Rome, he put almost all to the sword that were of age. The Volsci now so admired him, that such as were left to defend the Towns would not stay, but all flocked to him, owning him onely for their General. At Rome there was nothing but confusion, all being in despair, and seeking no relief any other way than by venting their spleen one against another: but when news came that Lavinium was besieged, it made a marvelous, yet absurd change in their minds. The people now cried out that Coriolanus was to be restored by a repeal of the Decree for banishment; but the Senate utterly refused to assent to it, and plainly forbad it in full house; either for that they desired to oppose the people in all things, or would not have his restitution ascribed to the Commons; or else were incensed against Marcus, who was become Enemy to all, though but injured by some, and had declared against his own Countrey, wherein he knew the greater and better sort to sympathize with him, and account his no other than a common grievance.

He marcheth towards Rome.

56. The resolve of the Senate being published, the people could do nothing as to his restitution, the custom requiring that the Fathers should propound. Marcus hereupon rose from before Lavinium, and marching towards Rome it self, pitch'd his Camp at the Ditches of Clælia, five miles from the Citie. This forced Senate and people into agreement, all in common being seized with horreur and amazement, so that it was agreed a message should be sent to him, offering him his restitution. The Messengers were Patricians, and such as for their love to him he had most cause to favour; but though with all advantage possible they made their addresse, yet he received them with wonderfull severity in a Council of Officers, and gave them this answer, that if they would expect peace, they should restore to the Volsci all Towns and Territories taken away in War: and make them free of the Citie as the Latines were: and he would give them 30 dayes time to consider of it. Hereat the Captains of the Volsci, especially Tullus, took occasion to malign him, though he employed this time of Truce very profitably, subduing seven great and strong Towns. When the time was out, and he returned, another Message came to him, desiring that refraining himself he would draw off the Volsci, and then consult in common; for they would do nothing by constraint or fear: but if he thought the Volsci were to be gratified, they would yield to him if they would lay down their Arms. He replied, he carried himself not as General of the Volsci, but as a Roman Citizen, and desired, that, having a respect to justice and moderation, they would return within 3 dayes with a grant of what he had formerly demanded; else he must proceed in his enterprize. Hereupon the Senate, in so great a Tempest which threatned all, betook them to their sacred Anchor as they accounted it, and ordered all the Pontifices, Priests, Governours of their superstitious houses and Augurs, in their several habits, should go & beseech him to compose the matter: But neither was Marcus moved with this Pompous train; but required they should either accept of the terms, or expect hostility to the utmost.

57. The Priests being returned, the Citizens were warned to be ready at the Walls, thence to repel the Enemy if he came, for that no other hope remained, than what time, and vicissitude of fortune might afford. The whole Citie being full of tumults, trembling, and amazement, the women flocked to the Temples, but the most, and especially the chiefeſt, made their supplications at the Altar of Jupiter in the Capitol. Amongst these was Valeria the sister of Poplicola, into whose mind came this device, that they should go to Veturia (say Dionysius and Livy) or Volumnia (saith Plutarch) the mother of Coriolanus, and procure her, with Volumnia (say they) or Virgilia (saith he) her daughter-in-law, to go, and intercede for their Countrey. Veturia earnestly pressed to undertake so pious a work, answered, they had little hopes to obtain their sute, for that her son had never sent to see them since his departure, being fallen out with his own family as well as his Countrey; yet she was ready to improve that interest she had in him, and set forth towards him with her daughter-in-law, and two Nephews. Coriolanus seeing the women come, resolved fully to give them a denial; but when he perceived his mother amongst them, he descended from his Tribunal, and went to meet her. Having courteously received her with his Wife and Children, he gave ear to her request, which she made with all the Oratory that she could compass out of the impending ruin of his own Countrey, and the infamy which would necessarily follow a fruitlesse attempt. When herewith she could not prevail, she put him in mind how much nature, together with a carefull education of him in her widdowhood, had ingaged him to obedience, and in conclusion cast her self down at his feet which she imbraced and kissed. He presently lifted her up, and cried out, Mother, thou hast got the victory, advantageous to my Countrey, but destructive to my self, and accordingly drew off the Volsci into their own Countrey, who were variously affected. Some blamed both him and the action: others that were studious of peace did neither; and some, though they condemned the thing, yet absolved the man, who was constrained by so great necessity to do it; yet none refused to obey his orders, but followed him, more through the authority of his virtue than of his power.

58. But when he was come to Ancium, Tullus, the great Emulator of his glory, supposing he had a sufficient advantage against him, required him to lay down his Office, and give an account of his actions to the people. He refused to resign his place, except commanded by the people to do it, unto which he said he was not afraid to give an account of any thing he had done, at that present. The people being called together, the principal of Tullus his faction instigated them against him, but when he arose to speak for himself, those turbulent spirits for shame gave way, and all sober and peaceable men openly declared they would hear him candidly, and judge him according to right and equity. Tullus then fearing the mans eloquence, and sufficiently apprehensive how much repute the very Crime objected would bring him (for they could not seem to be injured by him in not taking Rome, without considering that he had brought things to that passe by his incredible valour and dexterity, that they were near taking of it) would not expect the judgement of the multitude, but crying out with his complices, that the betrayer of the Volsci was not to be suffered to hold the Tyranny over them by refusing to lay down his Office, rushed out, and slew him in the place. Though no man stood up in his defence, yet that this wicked act displeased most, it presently appeared. For upon report of his death they came generally out of the Towns and buried him honourably, adorning his sepulchre, as of a General and a famous Warriour, with Arms and Trophies. Such was the end of the Eminentest min of that age for valour, who by his sour rigidity procured extreme hazard to his Countrey, and destruction to himself, whilst he preferred private revenge before publick good, and yet would not stoop to any provision for his own safety.

59. At Rome upon Marcus his retreat was such exultation, as is suitable to the joy of those that are rescued from utter desolation. The Senate Decreed to the women what honours they would ask, but they onely desired they might build a Chapel to Women's fortune, in the place where they had delivered their Countrey, which was done at the publick charge, and they at their own dedicated the image. When the death of Coriolanus was heard, there was neither expression of joy nor sorrow further than this, that the women were permitted to mourn for him ten moneths: the longest time allowed by Numa for the nearest relations, according to Pintarch. The Consuls not long after took the field with a considerable Army, but had no occasion to make trial of it; for the Volsci and Aequi joyning their forces together resolved to take the Romans unprovided; but in their march they fell out about a General, of whether Nation he should be, and from words to blows, in such a manner that they fought a great battel, and if night had not severed them, one party had been utterly destroyed. The year following the new Consuls, C. Aquilius and T. Sicinius, overthrew, the one the Hernici and the other the Volsci, amongst whom fell Tullus Aftius, a man of personal valour, but no good conduct. Their Successors, Proculus Virginus, and Sp. Cassius took the field with the Legions; the Aequi falling to the former, as the Volsci and Hernici to the later. The Volsci presently asked peace, having in the last battel lost the flower of their strength, and after them shortly the Hernici, refusing any more to contest for equality with the Romans. Cassius having received money and provisions, as from such as confessed themselves conquered, gave them truce, and referred them for conditions to the Senate.

at the Sovereignty.

60. After a long debate, the Fathers resolved they should be received into amity, and that Cassius at his discretion might prescribe the conditions of the League, confirming whatsoever they should be. Cassius returning home, asked, and obtained a triumph, though he had neither taken any City, worsted any Enemy, nor had any Captives or spoils for ornament of the solemnity, which possessed men with an apprehension of his arrogancy, and procured him envy. After his triumph he published as conditions of peace, the very same that were granted to the Latines, which gave great distaste, it being conceived an unworthy thing to make strangers equal in privilege with their kinsmen the Latines; such as could allege no merit, with those who had exceedingly well deserved of the State: the Patricians took it also disdainfully that he would determine fully on his own head a matter of such weight, without asking any of them his advice. His three Consulships, and two Triumphs, made him seem to himself far superiour to any of the same rank, so that no lesse than the Principality would now content him. Knowing that the ordinary way to it was to gain the favour of the People, by some great act of kindnesse, he resolved upon that course, and first to divide amongst them certain publick grounds, which through the neglect of the Magistrates, had been seized on, and possessed by the rich. The successe might have been dubious had he staid here; but he would also have the Latines into the lot with the Hernici his new denizens, that he might procure the favour of those Nations. The day after his Triumph, calling together the People according to the custom, he recalled to their memories the great services he had done in his several Consulships: how in the first he had subdued the Sabines, in the second reduced the Commons into the City, after the appeasing of the Sedition, as also received the Latines into fellowship and Communion: in the third, the Volsi of Enemies were made friends, and the Hernici, a great and powerful Nation, received into close and inward confederacy. By these discourses he insinuated, as if above all others he took charge of the Commonwealth, and so would continue to do. And he concluded with a promise to do more for the Commons, than any man ever did who was most in favour, and that should presently appear.

61. The day following, he called together the Senate, which was very much troubled at his speech, and declared, that because the Common People were very useful both in procuring Dominion, and defending Liberty, it was convenient to divide to them those publick grounds, which were most impudently held from the State by some Patricians, and pay the money back out of the Treasury, that they had laid out for that Corn, which being given freely to the City by Gelon the Tyrant of Sicilie, ought to have been divided amongst the Inhabitants. The Fathers heard him with great disdain, and rejected the motion, his Colleague Virginus grievously accusing him as seditious. For several daies after, Cassius discoursed of this to the People, and Virginus held the Senate consulting how to withstand him. The Tribunes of the People at length, either for that they were jealous of some designe, or were displeased that they themselves had not first proposed this thing, withstood it, alleging it was an unjust thing that what they had dearly purchased with their labour and blood, should be common to strangers as well as themselves. As this raised some dislike, so Cassius again drew them to his party, by propounding that the grounds might be divided amongst such as had most need, and by urging that it was better to have a little, than by expecting much to be frustrated of all. As the People were thus perswaded to and fro, C. Rabuleius one of the Tribunes found out a way, which for the present ended the dispute. Virginus pretending that he was for a division of the grounds, but not unto foreigners, hoping that these would ever be joyned;

and Cassius being both for Citizens and Strangers ; he took them both at their words ; for the one and the other yielding there should be a division, he bade the People accept of that, and defer that wherein they dissented to another time.

62. For some dayes after this, Cassius kept his house, pretending sicknesse, and studied how he might cause his Law, called Lex Agraria, to passe by force. For this purpose he sent for the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, that he might carry it by greater number of voices, so as the City was filled with them. Virginus hereupon made Proclamation, that all such as dwelt not in the City, should depart within a short time prefixed, and Cassius caused it to be proclaimed, that all such as were free should stay till the matter were determined. No end of the contention appearing, the Fathers feared it might come to blows, or further inconvenience, and therefore assembled to make some effectual provision for the publick Peace.

After a little debate they came to this resolution, that ten men of Consular dignity should be created to survey the grounds, and declare how much of them was to be let out to farm, and how much divided to the People. That it should be declared, that for as much as it was inequitable for the new associates, or denizens, to expect part in such Lands as were gained to the State before their admission, if any afterward should be got by their assistance, to each severall People should be assigned it's portion, according to the League. That for the choice of the ten men, and the distribution of the ground, the succeeding Consuls should make provision. This Decree being published to the People, appeased all, and frustrated the design of Cassius.

63. In the year following, being the first of the 74 Olympiad, wherein Astylus of Syracuse was Victor, Leostratus executing the place of principal Archon at Athens, according to the computation of Dionysius, in the first year of Xerxes his Reign, Q. Fabius and S. Cornelius were Consuls. Now two most noble young men, Cato Fabius, the brother of the Consul, and L. Valerius the grand-son of Poplicola, being Quaestors, and thereby having authority to assemble the People, set a day to Cassius the late Consul to answer in the Comitia to the charge of affected tyranny. Then in full Assembly did they lay open his actions ; how he had bestowed upon the Latines the third part of the plunder, who thought it happinesse sufficient to be made free of the City : then the Hernici, who could expect no lesse than to be deprived of their own Lands, he chose rather to make Friends than Subjects, and Citizens than Tributaries, whence both grounds and plunder being divided into three parts, two of these must go to Subjects, and Strangers, so that if it were found necessary afterwards to give others the same privilege of the City, the Roman Citizens being by right Lords of all, should not have remaining one third to themselves. They aggravated this with the management of the businesse, as his doing all without consulting the Fathers, and against the interposition of the Tribunes. That these things tended to the designed establishment of a Tyranny, they proved from the money and arms wherewith the Latines and Hernici had furnished him, as also from the company of stout young men of those Nations which he had about his person. In testimony hereof they produced severall credible persons, both Citizens and Associates, who averred it. To these the People giving credit, notwithstanding his premeditated Orations, and his three children, who with many friends and clients accompanied him in mourning habit, and interceded for him ; notwithstanding all his services, and the honour obtained by them, they would not at all pity him, but out of extreme hatred to Tyranny condemned the man, and put to death, lest being banished, he should procure the State such trouble and danger as Marcus lately had done. Therefore judgment being passed, the Quaestors presently led him to the Rock near to the Forum, and thence cast him down headlong in the sight of the People, this being the then ordinary kind of punishment. His estate was confiscated, and his house razed. Some would would have had his sons also put to death, but the Senate refused to use such severity, and at Rome the children never suffered for their Father's fault, although for high Treason, till the Marſian War, wherein those that broke the custome miscaried, and he who destroyed them restored it to the State, as Dionysius observeth, who disliketh the practice of some of his Countrymen the Gracians, in killing, or condemning to perpetual banishment the sons of Tyrants themselves.

64. By the death of Cassius the Patritians were more elevated, and the Commons grieved after they saw this, and considered how serviceable a man to their interest, as they foolishly thought, they had cut off. They now called hard for the execution of the Agrarian Law, but the Senate being resolved to put it off, caused the Consuls to make provision for an Expedition. None would give their names, and the Tribunes interposing hindred the Consuls from punishing any; but it being given out that a Dictator would be created, the multitude fearing to fall into the hands of Appius, listed themselves, and so Cornelius wasted the Territories of the Veientes, as Fabius those of the Aequi. The year following, being the 270 of the City, when Nicodemus was Archon at Athens, the Patritians procured Cassio Fabius one of Cassius his accusers, and L. Aemilius, to be created Consuls, during whose Office all was quiet at home, the Volsci renewing the War upon the Romans. Fabius was sent to the assistance of the Latinæ and Hernici whom they had invaded, and Aemilius led the other part of the Forces to Antium, where he was worsted by the Volsci, and being forced to desert his Camp, had with his whole Army been cut off, but that his Colleague in good time sent some choice Companies to recruit him. For the next year M. Fabius brother to Cassio, and L. Valerius son of Marcus, who put Cassius to death, being Consuls, proposed it to the Senate to fill up the Army at Antium. A Decree passing for new Levies, the People refused to be listed, calling for the division of the grounds, and one of the Tribunes withstood the Consuls. This put them upon this device, to sit in the Campus Martius, where whosoever was cited and did not appear, they punished him, if he had any Lands, by cutting his trees, and pulling down his houses; or if he hired grounds, by driving away his Cattel, or other ways, the Tribune not being able to do them any good, for that the power of his Office was confined within the walls; so as it was unlawful for them to lye one night out of the City, except in the Lune feria, where all the Magistrates for the common safety were wont to sacrifice in the Albanian Mount unto Jupiter.

65. This forced the Commons to submit, and so the Consuls making Levies led out the Legions, Fabius to the defence of the associates, and Valerius against the Volsci, who ingaging with him in battle, came off on equal terms; and afterwards neither party were forward to fight. It was believed of the City, that the Roman Army wilfully neglected an opportunity of victory, out of hatred against the Consul, whom they despised as a man of no experience, and in revenge against the Fathers who had so long frustrated their hopes about the division of publick grounds. At this time one of the Vestal Nuns Opimia by name, being convicted of incontinencie, was shut up within the ground in the Forum, and her corrupters scourged and put to death. At the next election of Consuls there was great contention, the Patritians having a desire to prefer some in whom they could confide, and particularly pitching upon the son of Appius, a man of the same temper with his Father; and the Commons as much labouring the Contrary. When the Consuls held the Comitia, the Tribunes interposed, and when the Tribunes called the People together, the Consuls would not suffer anything to be done, contending that it belonged to their Office. Both parties being impassioned with those of their Factions, railed, and sometimes came to hand cuffs, so that worse threatening, and the Senate consulting what was to be done, some moved to have a Dictator named, who might first correct all distempers of late brought in, and then deliver the power to men of approved integrity; but a middle way pleased; to create Interreges for holding of the Assemblies.

Commutations in the City.

The

The first was A. Sempronius, who for his five dayes governing affaires in a peaceable manner, the other Magistrates having laid down, created according to the manner Sp. Largius. He in the Centuriata Comitia made Consuls with the well liking of both sides, C. Julius a favourite of the Commons, and Q. Fabius now the second time elected, a man addicted to the power of the great ones. In their Consulship the Aequi and Veientes invaded the Roman Territories, and did much hurt. Against the later they were sent with the Legions, after some contest with the People (who were hardly drawn in by Largius, because the Senate had now deferred the execution of the Agrarian Law five years) and harrazing the Country returned home with much spoil; neither was any thing else of moment done that year.

66. The year following (which was the first of the 75 Olympiad, wherein Xerxes made his Expedition into Greece, Callias being Archon at Athens) had for Consuls Casus Fabius again, and Sp. Furius, to whom came messengers from the Latines, desiring assistance against the insolence of the Aequi; and all Hetruria was reported now to be in arms at the desire of the Veientes. The Consuls were ordered to assist the one, and suppress betimes the other; but when they came to raise men, Isilius one of the Tribunes interposed upon the old pretence of the Agrarian Law. The work being hereby hindred, Appius advised the Senate to set one Tribune against another, by drawing ever some of them unto their side, as the onely way to abate the power of that Office now so sacred and inviolable. This course both at present and afterwards was effectual, and the Consuls with their Armies departed each one into his Province; Furius against the Aequi, and Fabius into Hetruria. Furius harrazed the Enemies Country, and returned home with great booty. Fabius, though an able Warriour, was so hated by his men, that when they had in battel routed the Enemy, they refused to pursue or do any thing more, but departing against his command to their Camp, thence also marched home, lest they should procure him the honour of a Triumph. The following Consuls Cn. Manlius, and M. Fabius, again were both sent to carry on the War in Hetruria, where they held the Soldiers in the Camp so long, till the Enemy was ready to fall upon it, and for shame they desired to be led forth. Fabius taking this opportunity, upbraided them with their disobedience to the Consul the last year, in that place; and shewing them how little cause he and his Colleague had to trust them, having sufficiently humbled them, led them forth. A greater and longer battel was never fought by the Romans, who were thought to be Victors onely, because the Hetruscans, the night following, forsook their tents. Manlius was slain, and for that cause his Colleague refused the Triumph, saying, it was not right for him to take the Laurel at his funerals. Having disbanded his Army, he laid down his Office two moneths before the time, because his wounds disabled him for service; and by the second Interrex in the Comitia, were declared Consuls Casus Fabius his brother (who having extraordinarily deserved in the late battel, was now honoured with this Office the third time) and T. Virginius.

67. Virginius being sent into Hetruria against the Veientes, was overpowered by them, and had lost his whole Army, but that Fabius upon the intimation of his extream necessity came out of the Country of the Aequi, and brought him off. When the Romans were retreated, the Veientes made excursions very near the City, to the great losse and disparagement of the State. The Senate found it necessary to have a constant guard upon the borders; but the Treasury was low, the tributes of private men were not sufficient for this new charge, and it seemed that none would give their names willingly to so constant a work. When they were at a stand, the whole family of the Fabii, by the procurement of the Consul, voluntarily offered to take both the charge and trouble upon it self onely, which was gratefully accepted. The Fabii then under conduct of Marcus the last year's Consul, fortified a Castle near the River Cremera, and not far from Veii. Their whole number was at first 4000, whereof their Clients and friends made up the greater part, and of such as bore the name of the Family there were 306: afterwards terwards another Company followed, being led by Caso Fabius the Consul. Out of this Castle, which they named Cremera from the River, they made excursions, and much endamaged the Enemy. This caused the Veientes again to implore the aid of all Heururia, which making preparations, news came that the Aequi and Volschi also had agreed upon an invasion. The Senate hereupon ordered their Armies to be provided, whereof L. Aemilius the next year's Consul led one against the Heurufci, with whom joyned Caso Fabius as Proconsul. C. Servilius the other Consul, marched with another part against the Volschi: and Ser. Furius with the third against the Aequi, having also the power of Proconsul. Furius no lesse happily than sodainly finished his work. Servilius rashly managing his affaires lost many men, and not daring to adventure all in a battel, drew out the War in length; But Aemilius giving battel to the Veientes and their Associates, overthrew them, and then storming their Camp, forced them to beg Peace.

68. Having purchased a Truce by the grant of provisions for two monerhs to the Consul's Army, and six monerhs pay, they had leave to tend to the Senate. The Fathers upon reading of Aemilius his letters, who advised them by all means to finish the War, resolved to make Peace, and left the conditions thereof to him. He having a respect rather to equity than the profit of the Conquerours, made a League with them, neither taking from them any grounds, nor any more money, nor receiving any Hostages to secure their obedience, which procured him much evil will, and deprived him of the due honour of a Triumph. They ordered him to assist his Colleague against the Volschi; but he complaining grievously of them to the People, and suggesting to the multitude that they were angry, because the War was finished, out of a desire to have the Peoples thoughts diverted from the Agrarian Law, disbanded his Army, as also that of Furius, and hereby afforded much matter for contention betwixt the Nobility and Commons. The year following, being the first of the 76 Olympiad, wherein Scamander of Mitylene was Victor in the course, and Phadon Archon at Athens, the new Consuls, C. Horatius, and T. Menenius, found some obstruction in the Levies; the Commons still complaining that the Agrarian Law was not executed. But necessity cut off the dispute, eleven several Cities of Heururia having declared against the Veientes, for making Peace without publick consent, and forced them to break it. The pretence was, for that the Fabii were not drawn off from Cremera, who sending intelligence to the Senate of this intended breach, it ordered Menenius to march into Heururia, as Horatius against the Volschi. While Menenius loitered in his Expedition, Cremera was taken, and the Fabii all cut off. Some wrote that it was by an Ambush, as they were returning to Rome, to sacrifice for the whole family, according to their custome. But others delivered more probably, that being accustomed to make depredations, they were drawn into snares by the Heurufcans (who caused herds of Cattel to be driven thither, where they had bestowed a sufficient quantity of men) and being overpowered, were all at length destroyed, though with the great losse of the assaiants, except such as they had left to keep the Cattel. These were so far from being discouraged at what had befallen their fellows, that they also stood it out to the last man, enduring all extremity, and fighting when half dead, with weapons wrested from the hands of their Enemies.

69. A tradition remained to posterity, that 306 of this family being cut off, none remained except one Boy, who for his youth could not serve in the Expedition. Dionysius sheweth the vanity hereof, by these reasons. 1. All except one could not be unmarried, or without children, for an ancient Law commanded all at a legitimate age to marry, and provide for Posterity, which being diligently observed till their age, the Fabii alone would not contemn:

Whether only one Boy remained of the family. but, 2. Grant this; it is not to be granted, that none of those had a brother of young years. 3. If their Fathers had been so utterly deprived of their Sons, yet certainly all would not have been so old and dry, as to despair of any more issue, and consequently make no provision for it by marriage. 4. And if

if they had no fathers living, yet would it be a prodigious thing to suppose that none of them left any son as yet an Infant, a Wife with Child, or a young brother. This is true, that of the three brothers, Casus, Marcus, and Quintus, in the family of whom the Consulship had continued for seven years, Marcus onely left a young son, besides whom none of this name afterwards being famous, thence the report might rise that none else was preserved. 70. The Veientes having recovered the Castle, went confidently against the Roman Legions, which lay incamped not far off, and as was thought might have relieved the Fabii, but that Menenius the Consul out of envy would not make use of the opportunity. They took the advantage of his unskilfulness, and seized on an Hill near unto him, where placing a Guard, they made sallies upon the Camp, and so straightened it, that they brought him to fight upon very unequal terms, and put his Army to the worst. The Romans forsook their Camp, and fled in so tumultuous a manner, that had the Veientes not been too greedy of plunder, they might utterly have destroyed them. The day following they invaded the Roman Territories, and came as far as the Hill Janiculus, two miles from the Citie, whereon they seized, and thence made excursions to the great disgrace of the Romans. Horatius the other Consul returning from the Volsci, overthrew them twice, and gave the people some respite from their fear. The following year two skilfull men in Military matters, Sp. Servilius and A. Virginius, entred the Consulship after the Summer solstice in the moneth Sextilis. Now the Hebruscan Warre, though difficult enough, seemed profitable, compared with domestick affairs; for the seizing upon the Mount, and the depredations thence made had hindered Tillage for the last Winter, and no Traffick having been for that time, there was such scarcity of Corn that the Citie was brought into extream want, containing 110000 men of ripe age, as appeared at the next Census, besides Women and Children, Slaves, Merchants, and Artificers (for no Roman Citizen was allowed to keep a Victualling-house, or to exercise any sordid Trade) thrice as many. The people made great tumults, and were ready to take away violently the provisions of the rich: the Tribunes also made great disturbance.

Menenius fined for the miscarriage of the Fabii.

71. The Consuls laboured to satisfy the poorest sort by buying in all they could, and causing such as had Corn to sell it, till their Levies were finished. Then led they out by night against the Enemy, and passing the River before day, unexpectedly fell upon him, and got a bloody victory; after which the Mount was forsaken by the Garrison, which having no relief sent in, retired to Veli. This War being ended, Menenius the last year's Consul was called to an account, and condemned in a pecuniary mulct for suffering the Fabii to miscarry, whom the people so gratefully esteemed, that they hated all who seemed to have been to blame as to their defeat, and placed the day thereof amongst their Nefasti, or unlucky ones, wherein no good work was to be begun. The following year also, when Servilius was out of his Office, he was called before the people, for that in the last battel against the Hebruscans, he had so unadvisedly pursued the Enemy, as thereby to lose the flower of his Army; but the man's abilities being considered, and his own defence with that of his Colleague weighed (who desired either to stand or fall with him) he was acquitted. This year and that following, the Veientes were so overpowered, having been overthrown in battel together with their associates the Sabines, and now closely besieged, begged peace once more, and having with a whole year's pay for the Consuls Army, and money for two moneths provision purchased leave to send to the Senate, obtained a Truce for fourty years. Great stir about the Agrarian.

Argive was Victor, and Chares Archon, L. Aemilius Mamercus the third time, and Vopiscus Julius were Consuls. Their Consulship was very turbulent through the attempts of Cn. Genatius Tribune of the People, who required them to divide the grounds formerly Decreed to the people by the Senate. They denied it belonged to them to execute what had been Decreed in the Consulship of others, and alleged that a Senatus Consultum was not of force, but for one year. Because he could not compel his Superiors, he set the day to Manlius and Furius, the last year's Consuls, to answer before the people, why they did not divide the grounds, pretending some reasons wherefore they ought to be questioned more than others, though it was now 12 years since the passing of the Decree, and alleging, that except the present Magistrates were quickned by a sence of punishment inflicted upon others, they would never set upon the work.

72. The Patricians exceedingly startled at so bold and impudent an attempt, resolved by force of Arms, if fairer means would not prevail, to protect the accused, and the Citie might have been in blood had not Genatius died suddenly that very morning, no sign of violence appearing on the body. This allayed the fury of the multitude, and the Sedition might have been quite appeased, had the Consuls born their successe with moderation, and considered what was fitting for the time. But making new Levies, they would force one P. Volero, who had before-time been an Officer, to go in the present expedition as a Common Soldier, and when he alleged that he ought not to be compelled so to serve, for that he had not deserved it by any offence, they commanded him to be strip't and beaten. He flying to the assistance of the Tribunes appealed to the People, wherewith they not being at all moved, he became a Tribune to himself, with blows repelling one or two Lictors: and when the Consuls sent all their Officers to take him, such Plebeians as stood by calling one upon another rescued him from their hands. This diverted mens minds from thoughts of Land, and raised a zeal for privilege and liberty; the Patricians complaining that the Chief Magistrates should be so contemned, and the Plebeians alleging it was a great breach upon their right for a Roman Citizen not to be heard when he appealed to the people, but scourged like a Slave: and they demanded Justice of the Senate against the Consuls; with these stirrs, without any other thing of moment, was their Consulship passed over. For the following year Volero an impudent fellow, obtained, though a man of meanest condition, to be Tribune, having made himself popular by resisting that Office, which was once equal to the Kingly, and promising that he would clip the power of the great ones. He proposed a Law for holding the Assemblies of Tribes at the Election of Tribunes, instead of the other of the Curia: betwixt which there was this difference. In the Curiate Comitia were such things treated on, and confirmed by the suffrages of the Curia, as the Senate had first Decreed, and that with the auspicia; for except the birds predicted good, the Comitia were null and frustrate. But the Tribute Comitia were managed without any consulting of the Senate, without the superstitious observation of birds (called Auspicia, and observed at the Election also of Patrician Magistrates) and all things were determined by the suffrages of the Tribes gathered apart.

A Law proposed for Creation of Tribunes in the Assembly of Tribes.

73. When the day for determination of the question was come, great endeavours were used on both sides; the whole time consumed in speeches, for, and against the Law. The Tribunes then put it off till the Trinundinum, against which time the Patricians improving all their interest, Volero resolved by force to keep them from the Comitia, and the Consuls from diswading the thing, because they carried it mighty highly, and with their friends, and Clients, took up a great part of the Forum. He was prevented by a grievous plague, which like a Torrent carried away multitudes, so as his year being out before he could accomplish his design, by his great promises he obtained to be Tribune again, as also his two Collegues who sided with him in this enterprise. The Fathers to ballance him procured to be made Consul Appius
Clau-

suls.*

Claudius, the son of Appius, absent, against his will, and to their own prejudice. His Collegue was T. Q. Quintius Capitolinus, of a contrary disposition. Appius was all for Wars, that by expeditions the multitude might be diverted from Seditious attempts, the effects of idleness; and Quintius contended that causes were not to be sought for, lest the ordinary sort being forced to unnecessary War, should break out into rage, and trample Magistracy under their feet; and the Government being his, saith Dionysius, this month, he prevailed. But Volero renewed his endeavour for the Law, and thereto added, that the Ediles should be Elected by the Tribuna Comitia, as also whatsoever should concern the Commons, might be transacted, and passed in them; which tended to no other than to transfer the power from the Senate to the people. Appius now earnestly pressed to make Levies, and undertake some expedition; but Quintius prevailed that they should rather go about to dissuade the people by reasons, than to compell them by force.

eth all.*

74. Quintius to this purpose made a seasonable speech in the Assembly, and so far prevailed, that the Law as unjust had been laid aside, but that his Collegue used, though just and true, yet unseasonable words, speaking to the Commons, not as free Citizens, who had an hand in making, and abrogating Laws, but as a rabble of base persons. He upbraided them with untruthfulness, defrauding of their Creditors, revolting from the Consuls, and voluntary Exile; as also perjury, and turning of the Weapons taken up in defence of their Countrey, into its bowels. He said, it was no wonder that such as they were should proceed thus from one wicked act to another, instancing in their Seditious attempts for the gaining of the just power of the Patricians. Having spared no contumelious, or affronting language, he came to that which gave most offence: that the State would never be at rest so long as the Tribunitial power remained; for as much as it was impossible that what took its Original from violence, iniquity, sedition, fear of a Civil War, and other abominable things, could produce any profitable effects. He concluded with an asseveration, that as long as he was Consul, he would neither suffer this, nor any other Law to pass without approbation of the Senate, and this he would stand by both with Words and Deeds also if need should require; so that, if never before, they should learn in his Office, of what force was the Consulship. Then stood up C. Licinius, the principal man amongst the Tribunes, and in answer to his accusations related what labours the Commons had sustained before, and since the banishment of Tarquinus; how, for all this pain and danger, they were not made partakers of any thing which they had obtained by their blood, till forced to separate from the Patricians. That then they got this Office of Tribuneship, as a protection for the poor, with other Laws afterwards, as of judging the Patricians, and translating the suffrages from the Centuriata to the Curiate Comitia, all which he accounted nothing. Then reproving Appius sharply, he told him he would shew him of what force that Office was upon which he had trampled, and of the people called by him scold, and without House or Harbour. Having spoken this, he swore most solemnly that he would, and not live except the Law passed, and commanding silence, when all men expected earnestly what he would do, he lawfully required Appius to depart the Assembly.

ed to depart
the Assembly,*

And to be sent to prison.

Is defended,

75. Appius not obeying, but incircling himself with a Company he had brought for that purpose, having made silence to be proclaimed by a Crier, he declared that the College of Tribunes commanded the Consul to be carried to prison, and therewith sent an Officer to apprehend him. He was beaten back by the Lictors, whereat Licinius himself exhorting the multitude to stick to him, went to lay hands on him. Appius being defended with a company of stout young men, a great and unseemly Contest followed with railings and thrustings to and fro: and at length it came to blows, and throwing of stones. The Consul Quintius by his intreaties throwing himself into the middle, and the more grave Senators, hindered the tumult from proceeding to a further inconvenience, which was ended shortly after by the night.

Several dayes were spent with mutual recriminations ; but at length the Tribunes and People seized on the Capitol, and there kept watch night and day. The Senators very solicitous what to do, both in respect of the danger, and the difference betwixt the Consuls ; for Quintius thought the Commons desiring nought unjust thing, were to be gratified ; but Appius would rather die than yield. Quintius taking great pains, at length procured the Tribunes to refer the Law to the discretion of the Senate, which after a long dissuasion of Appius, and perswasion of the Tribunes, permitted it to be put to the question of the Comitia, wherein the Commons readily passed it. After this, the Consuls were sent out with the Armies ; Quintius against the Aequi, whose Territories he wasted, and returned with honour, which his Soldiers were careful to purchase for him ; but Appius going against the Volsci, bore himself so austere towards his men, that they would not obey him, but out of hatred, and to procure him an ignominious retreat, when they came to fight, retired to their Camp without striking a stroke, and no more could he draw them forth against the Enemy, so that he was constrained to depart homewards, and in his way put to death such Centurions and Ensignes, as had been faulty, with every tenth man in the Army. Some were beheaded, and some knocked on the head with clubs : this decimation being an usual punishment amongst the Romans, of such as had forsaken or lost their Colours.

76. The following Consuls Q. Valerius again, and Tib. Amilius, being both well affected towards the Commons (the former out of envy to the Patricians, for that they had denied his Father a Triumph, and the later because he would reconcile himself to the multitude, offended by him for accusing Cassius the Author of the Agrarian Law, when he was Quaestor) promised the Tribunes to promote in the Senate the division of publick grounds. The Tribunes in confidence of their assistance, came into the Senate, and spake very mildly in favour of the Law, which the Consuls would not contradict, lest they should seem to seek after contention, but asked the ancients Senators their opinions. L. Valerius Father to the Consul, pressed the division of Lands ; but Appius so severely and plainly withstood it by several invincible reasons, that he carried it against the other, for which the Tribunes set him a day to answer before the People for his life. The crimes were : That he gave ill advice against the Commons, raised Sedition, laid violent hands forsooth on the Sacrosanct body of the Tribune, and being General of an Army had received a defeat, and returned with ignominie. The Patricians exceedingly concerned, left nothing unattempted to save him, and desired him, that giving way to the time, he would take the habit agreeable to his condition ; but he flatly refused to do any thing poorly, or unworthy of his Ancestors, adding, that he would die a thousand deaths rather than touch the knees of any, as was the custome of Suppliants. He forbid his friends to supplicate for him, saying, his shame would be doubled, if he saw any do that in his behalf, which he himself disdained to do. Giving out many such like speeches, he neither changed apparel, nor his countenance, nor remitted any thing of his ancient magnanimity, and when he saw the whole City earnestly intent upon his tryal, a few dayes before the appointed time he killed himself. His friends gave out that he died of a natural death, and the body being brought forth into the Forum, his Son was there ready, and asked leave of the Consuls to commend him in a funeral Oration, according to the custome. The Tribunes commanded the body to be taken away without any ceremony ; but the People were thereat displeased, and suffered the young man to perform this last and usual Office of honour to his deceased Father.

77. For this and the two following years the Romans fought successively against the Aequi, Sabines, and Volsci. From the later was taken Antium, being surrendered to T. Quintius Capitolinus the Consul, who placed therein a Garrison. In the following year, wherein were Consuls Tib. Amilius again, and Q. Fabius (son to one of the three brothers, that with their Friends and Clients died at Cremera) the Tribunes made new stirs about the Agrarian,

Agrarian, and Emilius furthering the businesse, the Senate to gratifie the multitude, decreed that some part of the Lands lately taken from the Volsci and Antiates, should be divided. Yet not many would give their names, being unwilling to forsake their native Country, so that the Colony was made up out of the Latines and Hernici. The Consuls marched, Emilius against the Volsci, and Fabius against the Aequi; both had successe; the latter forcing the Aequi to beg Peace, the conditions whereof were left to him by the Senate. But the Aequi receiving the Fugitives of Antium, suffered them to make excursions into the Territories of the Latines, and refused to give them up, whereupon succeeded another War, though the Romans obtained a bloody Victory, in the third year after the making of the Peace. In the next Consullship which was executed by L. Ebutius and P. Servilius Priscus, fell a more grievous plague upon the City than ever before hapned. It first consumed almost all Cattel, and from the Country came into the City, wherein it swept away an innumerable company of slaves, and a fourth part of the Senators, and amongst these the Consuls, with most of the Tribunes. Livie writeth, that the Ediles supplied the place of Consuls. The disease began about the Calends of September, and continued that whole year, sparing no Sexe or Age.

A most grievous Plague.

War with the Aequi and Volsci.

78. When this was known by the neighbour Nations, the Volsci and Aequi, supposing the time of destroying the Roman Empire to be come, provided all things for a Siege, and to divert the Romans invaded the Latines and Hernici their associates. These sending to Rome for aid, Ebutius was already dead, and Servilius as yet alive, in small hope assembled the Senators, who were brought half dead in their Litters to the Court. They gave them liberty to defend themselves, which doing, when the Enemies had wasted their grounds at their pleasures, they marched for Rome, but contrary to their expectations, they found it sufficiently guarded, though with sick and feeble men. When the next Consuls were created, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Geminus, the Pestilence ceased; and all things being quiet at home (for the Tribunes making adoë according to the custome about the Agrarian, were commanded by the People to desist, and expect better times) they invaded those who had taken advantage at the publick calamity. They had good successe abroad, and better near home, when the Aequi in their absence came and thought to have surprized the City. For understanding the walls to be furnished with armed men, and four cohorts of 600 apiece to stand before the gates, they altered their course when they came to Tusculum; but Lucretius met and gave them battel, which they were hasty to embrace before the coming of his Colleague. For a time they fought courageously; but seeing a band of men behind them, which came from a certain Castle, they thought it had been the other Consul, and fearing to be inclosed ran away, having lost both their Captains, and many other valiant men. Afterwards without any let, the Consuls wasted the Territories both of the Aequi and Volsci, and returned home at the time of the Comitia: Lucretius in full triumph, and Veturius in the other called Ovation, by decree of the Senate, with the like pomp in all things, except that he entred on foot, and not in a Chariot; which words conclude the ninth Book of Dionysius his Roman Antiquities.

79. For the year following (which was the first of the 80 Olympiad, wherein Torymbas the Thessalian was Victor, and Phrasicles Archon) P. Volumnius and Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus were created Consuls, who having nothing to do abroad, imployed themselves at home in defending the power of the Patricians against the Commons, now much instigated against it by their Tribunes. They were come so far, as to assert, that it was most agreeable with the constitution of a free State, for the Citizens to have equal power in Government. The People now would have all things done by the prescript of Laws, whereof as yet there were none written, the Kings having judged according to their own discretion, and the Consuls by certain presidents of those Princes formerly in power. The least part was recorded in the Fresh stirs about new Laws.

SECT. I.

Books of the Pontifices, which none could come at except the Patritians, C. Terentius, or Terentillus Arsa according to Lois, Tribune of the Commons the foregoing year, had endeavoured to circumscribe within certain limits the power of the Consulship; but left the matter unfinished, because the greater part of Citizens were employed in the War; the Consuls on set purpose drawing it out in length, till the Comitia. Now the whole College of Tribunes renewed the attempt by the procurement of A. Virginius one of the number; the whole City being divided about it. Much contention there was in the Senate, betwixt the Tribunes and the contrary Faction; but at length, not doing any good in that place, they called the People together, and proposed a Law, that ten men might be chosen in Lawful Assembly, such as were most eminent for age, prudence, and dignity, and who especially respected their repute, and honour: that these men should publish Laws both concerning private and publick business, by which right should be prescribed, both to private persons and Annual Magistrates. The Question they put off till the Trinandinum, giving any one leave to speak freely, either for or against it.

called to an account.

80. The Patritians extraordinarily moved, that the Senate's authority in this matter was utterly neglected, both by fair and foul means laboured to hinder the debate; casting the meanest sort like Slaves out of the Forum, who minded their private commodity more than the publick Peace. Amongst those sticklers Caso Quintius the son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, was principal, one of great Nobility, beautiful in person, and very stout and expert in War. Him the Tribunes resolved to make an example to all young men, and called him to answer for his life before the People. He refused to answer, except at the Tribunal of the Consuls; but his Father earnestly intreated for him, recounting the several eminent services he had done for the State, and imputing this miscarriage to his youth, and indiscretion. The multitude plainly declared by signs, that they were ready to gratify him, which when Virginius perceived, knowing, that if Caso escaped without punishment, the insolence of the young Patritians would be intolerable, he procured M. Volscius, one of his Colleagues, to tell feigned a story, how in the time of the Plague he and his brother returning from a friend's house in the night, were set upon by Caso and his drunken Companions in the Forum, who killed his brother outright, and left Volscius himself half dead. He added, that both the Consuls dying of the Plague, he could have no satisfaction, and in the succeeding Consulship, whensoever he cited Caso before the Magistrates (as several could bear witness) he received nothing but blows. This so enraged the multitude, that they had torn him in pieces, but that the Consuls and some of the Tribunes kept them off. His tryal then was deferred, not without a great controversy, whether he should lye in prison, or be out upon bail, the latter whereof at length was accepted by the interposition of the Senate, and he fled into Hetruria, leaving his ten sureties to pay the money, which was exacted of them by the Tribunes, who also condemned him. His Father sold the greatest part of his estate to reimburse the sureties, and content with a small quantity of ground beyond Tiber, and a little cottage, sustained himself very laboriously by the help of a few slaves; for grief and poverty abstaining from the City and his Friends, and neglecting to divert himself with publick solaces.

condemned.

81. The Tribunes were much crossed in their expectations. For the calamity of Caso was so far from moderating the insolency of the young Patritians, that they grew much higher, opposing the Question both by words and deeds; so as in this Consulship the Law could not be preferred. For the following year P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus, were created Consuls; and the Commons made the same Tribunes as the year before, who perceiving the Law was not by persuasion to be enacted, sought to terrify both People and Consuls. They caused various rumours to be spread, that Enemies had hatched a great conspiracy against the Commons, then coming into the Senate, there affirmed it, pretending they had letters from some friends to assure them of it. They said certain Senators were in the plot, but that the greatest part consisted of the order of the Equites, which it was not seasonable then to name; but they had designed in Conjunction with Caso Quintus the Exile, to murder the Tribunes with others by night, and then at their leisure to rescind whatever had been granted by the Senate unto the Commons: In conclusion they desired the inquisition of so grievous a design might be committed unto themselves. The Senate being very solicitous, Claudius the Consul (who was fully perswaded that what the Tribunes went about was the onely conspiracy) by ripping up their designs concerning the Agrarian Law, and the bad successe of their endeavours which put them upon this exploit, fully convinced the Fathers how the matter stood, especially when they would neither name their friends from whom the Letter came, nor the Messenger: and though the Tribunes highly complained of him, and the Senate, unto the People, yet the most sober amongst the Commons were satisfied with his reasons. Whilst the heat of this contention remained, the Citie fell into such danger from outward Enemies as never before, which, saith Dionysius, had been foretold by Sibyll's books that it would arise out of intestine division, and was likewise signified by the prodigies of the foregoing year, when besides strange sights and noises, it rained pieces of flesh, of which some were devoured by all sorts of birds before they fell to the ground, and the rest continued long upon the earth, without either change of colour or smell.

82. Ap. Herdonius a Sabine with 4000 men seized upon the Capitol, and called the Slaves to their liberty. At this time of extreame of danger, the Tribunes made what disturbance they could, instigating the multitude not to fight against the Enemy, except the Patricians would ingage by Oath to Create ten men for the making of Laws, and suffer the Commons to live with them upon equal terms of privilege. Claudius would have wholly omitted them, and carried on the War by the Patricians, and their Clients onely; but Valerius thought it necessary to have a closure in the body before it should go about to defend it self from outward attempts, and therefore promised with an Oath, that if the people would chearfully carry on that War, as soon as peace was restored, he would permit the Tribunes to put the question, and indeavour to satisfy the desire of the Commons. Claudius then being appointed to look to the Citie, Valerius on all sides set upon the the Capitol, which was taken by storm, though he lost his life, having omitted neither the part of an able General nor valiant Soldier; For though he had received many wounds, yet he gave not over, till climbing the Walls a great stone was tumbled down upon him, which took away his life. The War being ended, the Tribunes required of Claudius to make good the promise of his Colleague; but he deferred the matter by several pretexts, and at length alleged he could do nothing of himself. He appointed then the Comitia for Creation of a new Consul into the room of Valerius. The Patricians were very solicitous to get some chosen that would defend their interest, and resolved upon L. Quintus Father to Caso, lately banished, who at the day appointed was chosen by all the Centuries of the first Classis, as well Equites as the other, so that the rest of the Classes were not called. They that were sent to fetch Quintus into the Citie, found him at Plow without as much as a Coat about him, onely in his Trusse, and a Cap on his head. Seeing the company make towards him, he wondred what it meant, but being told by a Viator that run before, he put on other apparel, and in a seemlier habit presented himself. Being saluted not by his own name, but by that of Consul, invested with Purple, honoured by the Fasces, and other Ensigns of Magistracy, he was desired to begin his journey, whereat pausing a little he answered with tears: Then for this year this little field shall be unsown, and we shall be in danger of want. After this, taking leave of his Wife, and commending his household affairs to her care, he departed for the Citie.

83. Quintus restrained the Tribunes from preferring the Law, by denouncing, that except they were quiet, he would lead out all the Citizens against

against the Volsci. When they said they would not permit him to make Levies, he called the people, and put the younger sort in mind of their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had bound themselves to the Consuls to follow whithersoever he would lead them, and not be wanting to the Majesty of the Roman people. He affirmed they were all obnoxious to him by this Oath now he was Consul, and sware he would animadvert upon Offenders according to the Laws. Herewith he commanded the Standards to be moved out of the Aravinum, and told them that to make them know they should have no leisure for Tribunitial actions in his Consulship, he let them understand, he would not return out of the Enemy's Countrey till his Office was at an end, and bade them prepare for wintering in the Camp. The multitude terrified hereat, desired him to forbear this rigour, and he did it upon this condition, that they would not molest him for his whole time, but suffer him to spend it in administering Justice. He behaved himself with such prudence, Justice, painfulnesse, and courtesie, that the Commons thought they stood not in need now of any new Laws, and the Senate was desirous to have him Consul for the following year, to oppose him to the Tribunes, who executed that Office now the third time. But as he approved it not in them, so he himself would not commit the same fault as he counted it, and in the Assembly speaking much against such as would not quit their Office when their time was finished, swore most religiously, that he would not accept the Consulship till he had laid down his present charge. Having finished a new Election, he betook himself to his little Cottage, and his former laborious course of life.

He is made

84. The year following, the Aqui surprized Tusculum, which action caused a War betwixt them and Rome, wherein they were worsted, together with their friends the Volsci, and forced to beg peace. But in the next Consulship they were drawn again to revolt, and making War upon the Latines, by Gracchus Claius their Captain, an industrious man, who had improved the power granted him by his Countrey almost to regallity. He drew the Roman Army into so disadvantageous a place, that it was thought convenient to make a Dictator, which was L. Quinctius Cincinnatus. The Messengers found him newly dressed; for when he espied the compiny, suspecting they came to him, he left the Countrey-work he was in hand with, and put on his better Clothes. Seeing himself made Dictator, by the trapped Horses, the 24 Axes, the Purple, and other royal Ensigns, he was so far from being delighted with this honour, that he said with indignation: This year's Crop will also be lost by reason of mine employment, and my family must be famished. When he came to the Citie he encouraged the people, and named Master of Horse-men, L. Tarquinius, a man of no great esteem by reason of his poverty, but a good Soldier: Having gathered together the Forces, he gave Claius battle, and beat him into his Camp, which having besieged some time, he forced the Aqui to give him up, with other incendiaries, to be punished with death according to their deserts, as also to passe under the Jugum (two Spears set in the ground, and a third laid over upon them in form of a pair of Gallows) in token of servitude; and because they had the year following without any provocation plundered Tusculum, to suffer him to deal in the like manner with Corbio. The choicest part of the plunder he caused to be carried to Rome; the rest he gave to his own Soldiers, and those of T. Quintius the Quaestor, saying, that the other of Mimutius the Consul, who had been besieged by the Enemy, ought to be content that they fell not as a prey into his hands. Having caused Mimutius to lay down his Office, he returned to the Citie with a more illustrious Triumph than any Captain before him, (the General of the Aqui, and other Eminent prisoners in Chains preceding his Chariot) having overthrown a strong Army, and plundered, and fortified a Citie of the Enemy within seventeen dayes after his Creation. That absolute power which he might have kept for six moneths he presently resigned, having first given an account of his administration. And when the Senate and his private friends would have enriched him with publick Ground, Plunder, and Contributions, he utterly refused it, and betaking himself again to his his small Cottage, preferred a laborious life before Kingly power, for that he pleased himself more in his poverty, than others in the abundance of their wealth.

85. The year following, the Sabines, whose grounds the other Consul Nautius had wasted, as also the Aequi, were in Arms, having retaken Corbio, against whom when Levies came to be made, the Tribunes again withstood them, being all new Created the fourth time. Hereupon the Fathers with weeping eyes signified to the People, that being forsaken by them, who hitherto had stiled themselves their Children, they would go forth and fight against the Enemy in their own persons, wherewith the multitude being fore moved, and Virginus seeing that do he what he could they would give their names, he averred it to be the resolution of the Commons to live and die with them; onely they desired some reward for all their pains and danger, which was, that they might live in equal freedom. If this could not be granted, they waved it, and desired another thing, which he was sure would not intrench upon the Senate's privileges. The Consul affirming the thing should be proposed if they would but refer it to the Senate, he desired that the number of the Tribunes might be increased unto 10. The Senate debating the matter, C. Claudius, the son of Appius the Elder, spake against it, alleging, that the Commons would never be satisfied; but Quintius, who now bore the greatest sway, commended the opinion of Appius, that the onely way to crosse the design of the Tribunes was to set them one against another; and if so, it would make more for the interest of the Senate to have their number increased. Accordingly a Senatus Consultum was drawn, that it should be lawful for the Commons to increase their College of Tribunes to the number of 10, and it was presently confirmed by the People. After this the Sedition being appeased, the Consuls levied Forces, and managed the War successfully against the Sabines and Aequi.

The number of Tribunes increased to 10.

86. The ensuing year, being the second of the 81 Olympiad, and the 297 year of the Citie according to Caro, as the 298 after the account of Varro, had for Consuls M. Valerius and Sp. Virginus, who having nothing to do abroad, had too much employment in the Citie. Before this time, the Tribunes onely reigned in the Assemblies, neither taking upon them to call together the Senate, nor give their voices therein. But now they ventured to assemble the Fathers, by the procurement of Isilius principal of the College, an industrious, and eloquent man, who presumed to make a further innovation in the State, requiring the Aventine Mount for the People to build upon, which being a mile and an half in circuit, was not as yet fully inhabited, but publick, and full of wood. The Tribune moving the Consuls to procure a Decree of the Senate for his new project, and they deferring the matter, an Apparitor was sent from the College to cite the Consuls before it. He applying himself to one of their Lictors, was bearen, and sent back, which so enraged the Tribunes, that apprehending the Lictor, they led him to the Tarpeian Rock, the Consuls, though much troubled, not being able to rescue him; for that none could hinder the execution of what the whole College resolved; all they could do was to desire some of the Tribunes themselves to interpose. But this could not be effected, they having resolved at the beginning not to dissent from one another, that thereby they might preserve their Authority inviolable. As concerning the Lictor, then they answered they were resolved, yet they put not the man to death, giving his life to the intreaties of the graver sort of Patricians, lest that order should be driven by just indignation to attempt something extraordinary. Having then assembled the Senate, the Consuls sharply reprehended them, but Isilius excused what had been done to the Lictor, by the sacred Laws, which forbade all, both publick and private, to crosse a Tribune. By a premeditated Oration he endeavoured to shew, that he had not unjustly assembled the Senate, and when he had seemed sufficiently to have answered the charge of the Consuls, he mentioned the Law: That what private men were possessed of, and was justly gotten, should remain unto them; what ground by force, or fraud, was already furnished with buildings, the expence of building being considered by arbitration, should be recovered to the use of the People, and what was yet publick be divided amongst them. He shewed that this Law would be exceedingly profitable for the suppression of all Agrarian Seditions, forasmuch as the Commons would be satisfied with possessions at home. No man dissenting, except C. Claudius, a Decree of the Senate passed for it accordingly.

Dissentions
renewed,

87. The remainder of the year was spent in building. For the next were created Consuls T. Romulus and C. Veurius; Isidius and his Colleague being continued in their Office: The civil dissentions supposed to be removed by the late Law, were again revived, and the foreign Enemies of the Commonwealth were in Arms, to the greater profit than discommodity of it. For such a vicissitude now there was, that Peace brought Sedition, and Warre procured Concord, which the chief Magistrates apprehending, wished for nothing more than external motions, and when there was Peace abroad, sought occasion for War; as understanding the growth of the Citie's prosperity to be procured thereby. The present Consuls were of this mind, being jealous of the beggerly and idle multitude. And their opinion was right, that they were to be diverted; but there they failed, that whereas in so ill a crisis of the State, they ought to have proceeded gently, they admitted the excuse of none who desired exemption from the War, but severely inflicted penalties upon all; which gave occasion to the Tribunes to make disturbance, crying out, that they violated the privilege of their Office, by imprisoning such as appealed to it. From mutual revilings sometimes it came to blows, both parties being berounded with those of their faction, and the People not fully complying with the Tribunes in their demands, they went into the Senate, where they required, that the Consuls might either lay down their Offices, or answer their crime against the Sacrosanct Tribunitial power before the People. The Senate determined nothing, seeing it dangerous to diminish the power either of the Consuls or Tribunes, at which the later much discontented, returned to the multitude. Some were for departing again from the Patricians; others more moderate, would expect the course of Law against those who had violated so sacred an Office; and a third (the most sober party) disliked this as well as the other, for that the Consuls were the Supreme Magistrates; and thought it meeter to punish their abettors. If the Tribunes had not at length restrained their anger against Senate and Consuls, the City that day had destroyed it self, so intent were both parties upon Arms and War. But they set the Consuls a day to answer before the People, and then were prevailed with to let the matter fall, telling the Commons, that they remitted what concerned themselves for their sakes whom they ought not to deny it, but would revenge the injury done to the whole, to prevent an ill example.

The Agrarian Law after 30 years with another of
published.

88. This was by promulgating the Agrarian Law, which hitherto had lay dormant for thirty years, to which another was added of equal right, which the former year could not be passed. Having with an oath promised to prefer these Laws, they appointed a day for the Comitia, wherein having first themselves spoken largely, several others related what good service they had done for the Commonwealth, and laboured to shew how unworthy a thing it was for them to be defrauded of those grounds, which by their labour and danger they had gained, and admitted to no part of reward. The multitude gladly hearing such discourses, none more affected mens minds than L. Siccius Dentianus, a man of admirable shape, 58 years old, and furnished with military eloquence, for a seditious attempt. He told them, he had served his Country in the Wars forty years, and been an Officer thirty; sometimes a Centurion, afterwards a Tribune. He was raised to that honour by Sicinius the Consul, for defending the Ensign of his Cohort, when the Centurion was slain, for which he was also adorned by his fellow Soldiers with a golden crown. In another batrel, wherein the Tribune of the Camp was struck to the ground, and the Eagle (or Standard) taken, fighting for the whole Legion, he recovered it and saved him, for which the Tribune would have given him his place, but he refused it, and the Consul made him Tribune of the first Legion, which Office was then void. Having thus purchas'd himself honour; to maintain his credit he spared no labour, nor refus'd any danger, being ever rewarded by the Consuls with spoils, crowns, and other rewards and honours.

Tribune

The achievements of Siccius Dentatus.

89. In short; during those forty years, he had fought 120 battels, received 45 wounds, all before and none behind, whereof twelve that day where-in he fought against Herdonius, who seized upon the Capitol. As for rewards after the several battels, he had obtained fourteen Civick Crowns (which saith Gellius, were bestowed upon him who had preserved the life of a Citizen, and were made of Oake, because the most antient meat was thought to be the fruit of that tree;) three Murals (which were given by the General unto him who first mounted the walls, and entered a Town, being adorned with an image of the batlements) and eight Golden Crowns; besides 83 Golden Chains, 60 Golden Bracelets, 18 pure Spears, which were Spears having no iron at the ends of them, being also called Hasta donatice, and Hasta graminea, and 23 Horse trappings, whereof nine were for killing Enemies that he had challenged to single Combats. To this relation of Dionysius, Gellius addeth a Crown, called Obsidionalis (which was given to one who had freed the presenter from a Siege) and increaseth the number of Bracelets to above 160, that of Spears to 22, and the other of Horse trappings to 25. He calleth him L. Scimius Dentatus, and writeth, that for his incredible achievements, he had the appellation of Achilles Romanus.

Lib. 5. c. 6.

Lib. 2. c. 11.

90. Siccius proceeded, saying, that though he had fought so many years, served in so many Expeditions, received so many wounds, and helped to gain such large Territories for the Roman People, yet neither he, nor his fellow-soldiers partakers with him in the same dangers, had received any portion of those Lands, being possessed by others, who could neither shew title nor merit for them. After this, he accused the Patricians of having put Cassius to death, for no other cause than favouring the Commons, as also of privily murdering Genutius the Tribune, eleven years after, which had terrified others since from such attempts as his were. He mentioned the affronts lately made to the Tribunes, and concluded with an exhortation to the multitude, to free themselves from this Tyranny of the great ones, by passing the Law without giving heed to the dissuasions of any. The Assembly was so moved by his words, that they seemed impatient of any thing to be said against it; but Scilius rising up, after he had extolled the worth of the man, said, it was neither just, nor agreeable with the custome of the City, to hinder any one from speaking against the Law, especially such an one as asserted right, and opposed violence. He adjourned then the Comitia till the next day, when he commanded all to be present, who would speak any thing against it. The Patricians meeting at the Consul's house in the evening, resolved, if they could not with words, by deeds to hinder the passing of the Law, and sometimes in the morning took up the Forum, spreading themselves all over to hinder the uniting of the Commons. The Comitia being full, those that spake could not be heard, some encouraging, and others interrupting them with great clamours. The Consuls protested against this carriage, and that if any violence succeeded, the Commons were the procurers of it; and the Tribunes answered, that they had heard long such discourses as they were now making. The day being far spent, the People required the ballots; but then the young Patricians hindered them from uniting in their Tribes, and snatched away the pots and ballots, bearing out of the Forum the Officers attending for the gathering of Suffrages. The Tribunes crying out, and casting themselves into the throng, they gave way to them, where ever they went, but hindered such as would have followed, and rendred their Office thereby unserviceable. At length the Patricians prevailed against the passing of the Law, by the means of three Families especially, viz. the Posthumii, Sempronii, and Clælii, most eminent for Nobility, Riches, and Clients, who also especially hindered the confirmation of the Agrarian by a Plebiscitum.

Siccus.

A new Law.

91. The Tribunes consulting how to vindicate their cause, the most moderate opinion prevailed, that neither the Consuls, nor any other Patricians, save those of the three Families now mentioned, should be called to answer before the People; and not for their lives, but estates, for resisting the Tribunes in preferring the Law. The Patricians gave way to it, and having redeemed the estates, restored them to the owners. Afterwards, when the Tribunes again went about to prefer the Law, news came that the Enemy was on his march to Rome, as far as Tusculum, which place onely stopped him, but could not long hold out. Levies now being to be made, according to a Decree of the Senate, the Tribunes endeavoured to hinder them, but another Decree being published, that the Patricians with their Clients, and such as voluntarily came in, would undertake the War; some for shame, some for plunder, and others to gratifie the Nobility, gave their names; and amongst the rest Siccus himself, whom followed a Cohort of 800 old Soldiers to do him honour, though excused from warfare by the Laws. A strong Army being presently raised, the Enemies retired, and were followed by the Consuls to Antium, where the Armies lying incamped one against the other, the Aequi, confident of their strength, at length provoked the Romans to fight. Romulus having then the command, sent for Siccus, as the story goes, and gave him order with his Cohort to go a certain way, and fall behind upon the Enemies Camp; intending either to disgrace him upon refusal, or destroy him by so impossible an undertaking. When Siccus laboured to shew him that the thing could not be done, he upbraided him with his speeches used in the Comitia concerning his own exploits, and objected to him pretended valour. Hereat he undertook the matter, and giving all to understand his case, departed with his men all weeping, to the regret of the Army, who expected of these 800 to see no man return alive. Siccus led them not the same way as the Consul thought, which being mountainous, would have brought certain destruction to them ascending, but another through a Wood, by which they came upon the Camp of the Aequi, where it was forsaken of the guard, now gone to behold the sight of the two Armies, before this time joyned. Falling in with a shout, the Aequi supposing the other Consul present, forsook the Camp and fled, after which Siccus and his Cohort marched down towards the battel, whom the Enemy discovering on their back, and knowing their Camp to be taken, were also discouraged and fled: The Romans pursued them till night, and did great execution, but none so valiantly demeaned himself as Siccus Dentatus.

92. Siccus having lodged himself and his men in the Enemies Camp, the next day set it and all the stuff therein on fire, and with haste marched for Rome, on purpose to deprive the Consuls of the honour they expected. Coming into the Forum, he related to the Tribunes and People the whole passage, how he and his old men being destined to ruine, had obtained the Victory. Hereby he not onely ingratiated himself with the People, but procured the displeasure of the Senate also against the Consuls, who were denied the honour of a Triumph. The Commons gratified Siccus in the highest measure they could, making him one of their Tribunes for the following year, wherein Sp. Tarpeius, and A. Terminus (or Thermus rather as Gellius hath it) were Consuls. The first he did relating to his Office, was to set the former Consuls a day to answer before the People, for violating the power of the Tribuneship, and devising the destruction of him and his Soldiers: and so resolved was the whole College, that the judgment passed without interruption intended by the Patricians, and they were both condemned in a pecuniary mulct. The present Consuls were hereby rendred more inclinable towards the Commons; so that they procured a Decree of the Senate, and a Law passed in the Centuriata Comitia, that All Magistrates should have liberty to punish such as violated their authority, which was formerly the privilege of the Consuls onely. But the mulct was not left to their discretion, provision being made, that it should not exceed the worth of two Oxen, or thirty Sheep; which Law was long observed by the Romans. After this, the Tribunes propounded to the Senate, that Laws might be made, which the Citie should use for ever. After a grave debate, the advice of Romulus the late condemned Consul prevailed, who contrary to the expectation of both parties spoke in behalf of the thing propounded. He said, he was for the interest of the Patricians as long as there was any hopes of its continuance, but finding things in such a condition, as it must necessarily decline, he thought it wisdom to comply with that necessity, and advised that Ambassadors might be sent to the Greek Cities in Italy, and to Athens, thence to fetch such Laws as were most excellent, and besitting the Commonwealth. After their return was to be propounded to the People the choice of Law-makers, what their power should be, for how long, and what other things should appertain to them. Siccus extraordinarily affected with the mans ingenuity, said he was now friends with him, and remitted his fine; but he refused to forbear the payment of it, because already sacred to their gods. A Senatus Consultum being made, and confirmed by a Plebiscitum, Ambassadors were chosen to fetch Laws from the Greeks. These were Sp. Posthumus, Ser. Sulpitius, and A. Manlius, to whose use Gallies were assigned, and furnished at the publick charge, as was suitable with the Majesty of the Roman People.

92. For the following year, being the first of the 81 Olympiad, wherein Lycus a Thessalian of Larissa was Victor in the course, Charephanes exercising the Office of principal Archon, the 300th year of the Citie being now ended (as Dionysius computeth, following the account of Caro) P. Horatius and Sext. Quintilius were Consuls. Now fell a greater plague than ever had been known, upon both Citie and Countrey, which swept away Quintilius the Consul, and Sp. Furius chosen in his place, with four Tribunes, and many Senators. The succeeding Consuls were L. Menenius and P. Sextius, who took care for Corn to supply the Citie, which laboured under a famine, by reason that the grounds lay untilld the former year. In their year the Ambassadors returned out of Greece with Laws, presently after which the Tribunes required, that according to the Senates Decree, law-makers might be appointed. The Consuls knowing not how to deny them, yet unwilling to weaken the interest of the Patricians, deferred the matter, saying, that the time of the Comitia was at hand, after which they would labour, joyntly with the Consuls Elect, in the businesse. The Tribunes were content; but when the Comitia were past, wherein Appius Claudius, and T. Genutius were chosen, they grew idle, and neglected the administration of affairs, as now belonging unto others; and Menenius was sickly, pining away, as was thought, by melancholy; of which Sextius took advantage, pretending he could do nothing by himself. The Tribunes then betook themselves to the Consuls Elect, and though they had not yet entered upon their Magistracy, importuned them to gratifie the Commons, by proposing great honours and rewards. Appius being elevated with the hope of a new kind of Magistracy, grew popular, and perswaded his Collegue to a compliance, so that Sextius was forced to call together the Senate, and propound concerning Laws.

93. Many things were spoken, as well by those that desired a new model, as others, who thought it sufficient to rest satisfied in the customs of their Countrey. But the opinion of the designed Consuls prevailed, which Appius the principal of the two delivered, being asked his advice, according to the custom, before any other Senators. Their sense was, that ten men out of the chief of the Senate were to be Elected, whose power continuing for a year should be the same with that of the Kings and Consuls, and all other Magistracies cease till they might be renewed according to Laws: in the mean time the ten men, or Decemviri, were to administer Justice to private men, and model the Commonwealth. When the day came wherein this Senatus Consultum was to be confirmed by the People, the designed Consuls resigned their Office, for which they were exceedingly admired, and remembered in the choice. In the Centuriate Comitia were created App. Claudius and T. Genutius, late Consuls Elect; P. Sextius Consul for that present year, the three

SECT. 2. three Ambassadors who fetched Laws out of Greece, P. Posthumius, Ser. Sulpitius, A. Manlius, and one of the former year's Consuls T. Romulius, who had been condemned by Siccus the Tribune, and afterwards was the author of this popular act: besides these, out of the Senate C. Julius, T. Verurius, and P. Horatius, all of Consular dignity. The Tribunes, Aediles, Quaestors, and all other Magistrates were for a time deposed of all power. Instead of Horatius, Livy mentioneth P. Crassius.

2. The Decemviri having taken upon them the Government, in reference to a new constitution, agreed that onely one of them at one time should have the Fasces and other consular Ensigns. He assembled the Senate, confirmed the Decrees, and did other things agreeable with chief Magistracy. The rest (for to lessen envy) differed little in habit from private men, having onely an Accensus, or sort of Beadle, going before them, which Livy addeth to the relation of Dionysius. They succeeded by turns, for a certain limited time, till the year went about. The present Possessor of the Fasces onely saith Livy, but all of them as Dionysius seemeth to mean, judged private causes together with publick ones belonging to their subjects, and associates. All things they managed with such Justice and moderation, that the Commonwealth seemed most happy under them, having no need of appeal. Appius above the rest grew exceeding popular by his familiarity with the ordinary sort; so as in a manner he carried away the praise from the whole College, for that he had a further design than any of the rest.

3. At length having made a model out of such Laws as were brought out of Greece, and their own Countrey's customes, they proposed it to the view of all men in ten Tables, that any one might make exceptions; liberty being given to private persons to inform the Law-makers, who consulted much with the Nobility about the work. When all approved of them; a Senatus Consultum passed, nemine contradicente, for the ratifying of these Laws, and the question being put to the People in the Centuriata Comitia, they were confirmed most religiously in presence of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Priests. Then were they ingraven in brasse, saith Dionysius and others, in Ivory saith Pomponius the Lawyer, and proposed to the publick view in the most conspicuous part of the Forum, as Minos of old, according to Plato, and long after him Solon, caused his Laws to be written in Tables by the Athenian called Cyrbes and Axones. The year being almost out, the Decemviri moved the Senate about the Comitia. After a great debate it was resolved to continue this kind of Magistracy for the following year; because something seemed yet wanting to the new model, through the shortness of time allotted to the work; but especially for that by this Office the Tribuneship was suspended, of which the Patricians had cause to be most jealous. The commons thought they had good reason to concur with the Fathers in this choice, and the day for holding the Comitia was appointed.

* Eupatres & Agoras.

4. The

Appius obtaineth to be Decemvir the second time by cheating the credulous multitude.

The most antient and honorable of the Fathers stood for this Office, fearing that if turbulent spirits were possessed of it, they might have a great advantage against the State. Above all others was Appius extolled to the skies, the Commons labouring earnestly to retain him in his place, for that none had behaved himself better than he. He desired to be excused, pretending he had rather be discharged of so troublesom and ingratfull a work. At length overcome as it were by the intreaties of the people, he professed himself amongst the Candidates, and by accusing all others, as owing him ill will for his publick spirit, made way for himself and his friends. In the Centuriate Comitia he was made Decemvir the second time, and with him was joyned Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been Consul three times, a man hitherto of unblameable carriage: out of the other Patritians by the procurement of Appius were created M. Cornelius, M. Servilius, L. Minucius, L. Antonius, and Manius Rabuleius, persons of no great Eminency, and out of the Commons Q. Petilius, Caso Duellius, and Sp. Oppius, whom he took in, the more to ingratiate himself with the rabble, saying, it was just that the Commons should share in that Magistracy, which was to govern and command all.

He and his Collegues labour to establish themselves.

4. Appius, a man more popular than any Magistrate that ever governed, either King or Consul, with his nine Collegues, entred his Office on the Ides of May, which saith Dionysius hapned in the full Moon, according to the course whereof monerths at that time were observed. The first thing the Decemviri did, was mutually to agree and confirm by Oath to be of one mind, not to hold the Assemblies, but perpetually to retain the power in their own hands: to admit none into their number, and to be of equal power and authority amongst themselves: to make use of Senatus Consultum's, and Plebiscitum's, but rarely, and never except in case of necessity, acting most things by virtue of their own power. On the first day (which to the Romans was ever Festival and Religious) after their superstitious Ceremonies were over, they all appeared with regal Ensigns, which exceedingly terrified the people, especially the Axes added again to the Rods, which Poplicola had laid aside, and none of his Successors the Consuls used in the Citie. By this fear they sought to procure themselves security, each of them getting about him a company of stout young men, such as were most addicted to him.

Some preferring their private commodity before the publick good flattered them, and even amongst the Patritians themselves were not wanting, who though Eminent both for birth and estate patiently bore the oppression of their Countrey. The Decemviri indulging their pleasures, exercised now their authority with all licentiousnesse, nothing valuing the Roman Senate and people. Being both Legislators and Judges, many Citizens they unjustly put to death, and deprived others of their Estates, whose causes were all formally judged, that they might have some shew, and pretence of Justice, accusers being suborned out of their Dependents, each one affording all assistance herein to his Colleague. Such private persons as in their sutes feared their cause were constrained to joyn themselves to the party of their Judges; so as it came to passe in a short time that most of the Citizens were also corrupted. Such as were offended with the extravagancy of the ten retired themselves, expecting the Comitia for the Creation of new Magistrates.

They add two Tables of Laws to the ten.

5. The Decemviri added two Tables of Laws to the ten that were made the year before. Amongst these new Laws there was one which forbad marriage betwixt the Patritians and Plebeians, for no other cause as Dionysius conjectureth, than lest the families being joyred together, concord should ensue betwixt the two orders. These Laws thus by accident, such (a) Pomponius, came to be called the Laws of the twelve Tables, being written by the Decemviri, through the perswasion of one Hermodorus an Ephesian, as some reported, then banished into Italy, concerning which person (b) Cicero and others are to be consulted. These Laws being established, blished, it followed, that disputations and controversies of the Court should be necessary, for as much as an interpretation was to be built upon the authority of the Learned. This disputation, or this unwritten Law, composed by the Learned, is not called by any peculiar name, as all other parts, but by the common one of Jus Civile, or Civil Law onely. Besides, out of these Laws, at the same time almost, were composed certain cases, wherein men contested one with another, which cases, lest the People should make them at their pleasure, were to be certain and solemn; and this part of Law is called Actiones Juris, or Cases at Law. Thus almost at the same time these three sorts of Laws arose, viz. the Laws of the twelve Tables; from these flowed the Civil Law: and from the same were composed Cases at Law. But the knowledge of expounding all these, and the Cases themselves, were kept by the College of Pontifices, who appointed yearly those that judged Private Persons, which custome the People used almost 100 years. Afterward, when Appius Claudius had propounded, and reduced these Cases into form, (c) Gneus Flavius his Scribe, and the son of a Libertine (or of one whose father was once a Slave) stole the Book, and gave it to the People, which accepted so thankfully of the gift, that he was made Tribune of the Commons, a Senator, and Ædilis curulis. This Book was called Jus Civile Flavianum, as the other Jus Civile Papirianum. Yet Flavius added nothing of his own to the Book. The City increasing, and there being as yet wanting certain sorts of Cases, not long after Sexus Ælius composed other Cases, and gave a Book to the People called Jus Ælianum.

by degrees.

6. There being now in the City, the Lex or Law of the twelve Tables, the Jus Civile, or Civil Law, and the Cases of Law, it came to passe, that the Commons disagreeing with and separating from the Patritians, appointed Laws of their own making, called Plebiscita. After their return, there being a great controversie about these, it was thought good to receive them also for Laws, and so it was enacted by a Law preferred by * Horatius the Dilector; so though there was a difference in the form of making a Law (called Lex) and a Plebiscitum, yet the authority was the same. Then for that it was difficult for the People to meet, because of it's multitudes, necessary it self devolved the care of the Commonwealth upon the Senate. So the Senate began to interpose, and whatsoever it resolved was observed: and that Law was called Senatus Consultum. At the same time the Magistrates also administered Justice, and that the People might know what they would determine concerning any thing, and to fore-arm themselves, they published Edicts, which Edicts of the Prætors constituted the Jus Honorarium, so named from the honour and authority of the Prætor. Lastly, as the course of affaires reduced the making of Laws to fewer fashions, at length it came to passe through several Factions (viz. of Sylla, Marius, Pompey, and Cæsar) that there was necessity of the Commonwealth's being governed by a single person. For the Senate not being able to govern all the Provinces, a Prince was ordained, and what he appointed was taken for Law. So that in the Commonwealth of Rome, all Law was either so constituted by a Law called Lex, as that of the twelve Tables; or properly called Jus Civile, which being unwritten, consisted in the interpretation of the Learned; or Cases of Law, which contained the form of Pleas; or a Plebiscitum made without the authority of the Fathers: or the Edict of a Magistrate, called Jus Honorarium: or a Senatus Consultum, which without a Law (Lex) was ordained by the sole authority of the Senate: or Principalis constitutio, which the Prince himself enacted.

7. These things are written by Pomponius in this narrative of the Original of Law; for the better understanding whereof, it is to be noted, that the word Jus signifieth all Law or right in general, and is that genus whereof Lex is but a species, being defined by (a) Justinian the Emperour to be that which the People of Rome upon the question put by a Senatorial Magistrate (for example a Consul) did enact. As for the twelve Tables, they were furnished with Laws, partly borrowed from the Gracians, partly added at the discretion of the Lawmakers, and partly the same as formerly were in use. Of the first sort were such especially as concerned private interests. Of the second was that which forbade marriage betwixt the Nobility and Commons. And of the third, that Law which from Dionysius we formerly mentioned to have been made by Romulus, giving power to a man to call together his wives kindred, and judge her for drinking wine, or dishonestly: this is attested to have been taken into the twelve Tables by (b) Plinius; and (c) Gellius also hinteth as much. From (a) Ausonius is observed, that these twelve Tables were divided into three parts, whereof the first contained what belonged to the Religion of the Romans, the second what concerned the publick, and the third the rights of private men. Great are the commendations which many give of them, but the most eminent is Cicero's Encomium, that we name no more. Disputing under the name of Crassus, in (e) one place he thus speaketh: If diversity of Studies please any, in the twelve Tables there is a great image of Antiquity: because the antient use of words is known, and certain kinds of actions declare the life and custome of our Ancestors. If any look at Polity, you shall find it all in the twelve Tables, which describe all the interests and parts of the State: or if any one be taken with this glorious Philosophy, I will speak more bo'dily, these are the fountains of all his disputes contained in the Civil Law (Jure Civili) and Laws (Legibus.) Though all be displeased, I will speak what I think: that little Book of the twelve Tables alone, in my opinion excelleth the Libraries of all the Philosophers (if one view the fountains and heads of Laws) both in weight of authority and copiousnesse of advantage. In another (f) place he writeth, that when he was a boy, they were wont to learn the twelve Tables as some necessary Poem. Lastly, a collection of the fragments of these Tables out of approved Authors (such especially as conduce to the explication of the Institutions, and of ancient Law with deep Antiquities) hath been made by I. Crispinus, to which the Reader is referred.

8. But (to return) the Decemviri at the usual time of the Comitia bidding farewell to the customs of their Country, and the new Laws, neither regarding the approbation of Senate nor People, continued themselves in power for the year following, which was the third of the Decemvirate, the first of the 83 Olympiad, according to Dionysius, wherein Criso of Himera was Victor, Philescus being Archon at Athens. They so ordered the matter shortly, as even all the considerable part of the Citizens, (Patricians and others) they either killed, or forced to quit the City. This pleased them well enough, but the Sabines and Aqui thinking it a fit time to attempt some great matter against Rome, invaded the territories thereof, and of the Latines. The Decemviri much troubled hereat, after a consultation how to make resistance several wayes, found themselves constrained to assemble the Senate, wherein Appius with a premeditated Oration propounded the matter of the War. L. Valerius Potitus, the son of him that besieged the Capitol, and grandson of Poplicola, first arose, and though he was commanded by Appius to forbear, flew high against the tyranny of the present Usurpers. He being forced to silence, was seconded by Marcus Horatius Barbatus, great grandson of the Colleague of Poplicola, who having expressed great indignation, the Decemviri incensed with his biting words, threatened to cast him down headlong from the Rock. All the Senators at this cried out as at a breach of their privilege, and made a tumult, whereat the Ten repented of what they had done, and excused themselves, saying, they deprived none of speaking to the matter in hand, but interrupted Seditious Orations, which they might do by their power of Consuls and Tribunes received from the People, not for a year onely, nor any limited time, but till the work of Laws were finished, untill which time they were resolved to act, and then give an account of their administration. Appius having delivered this in the name of all, asked the opinion of C. Claudius his Uncle.

9. Claudius beginning his Oration with the occasion of their meeting, fitly shewed what was the occasion of it. The War he demonstrated to be begun by no other inducements than what the present distempers of the State afforded, which were bred by the arbitrary and tyrannical carriage of his Nephew, and his nine Companions. He made out what these distempers were, and by virtue of his relation to Appius, took upon him, after a sharp reproof, by the nearness of their blood, their Ancestors, and the Decemvir's Father, with all that was dear and religious to them both, to conjure him, that putting a stop to his ambitious course (destructive to himself as well as the publick) he would resign his usurped power, and restore the Commonwealth to it's former government and liberty. Appius answered him not a word, which so moved him, that with tears he signified he would depart to Rhegillum, the seat of his Forefathers, and there continue till that fell upon the Decemvirate, which he guessed would happen in a short time; for as much as he could not endure to behold his Nephew degenerate so much from the ancient worth of their Family. As concerning the War, he advised the Fathers to resolve nothing, till the accustomed Magistrates were first created. The graver and more eminent sort of Senators that spake after, were all of this opinion, which made the Ten resolve to ask none now according to their age, as the custome was, but M. Cornelius called upon his brother Lucius to deliver his opinion. He attributed all that had been said against the Decemviri to envy, saying, it was because the speakers themselves could not compass the Office, and laboured to shew, that it was most foolish counsel to resolve upon new elections, which would require time, and defer the War that threatened ruine and desolation. By pressing the danger very close, and urging what necessity there was of committing the War to the management of the Decemviri, he drew almost all the younger sort to his party, there being many even in the Senate from whom fear wrested compliance. After all these, the Decemviri gave Valerius leave to speak, whom first of all they had interrupted. He professed he was of Claudius his judgement as to the whole, and answered all the reasons of Cornelius by one proposal; that a Dilettor might be instantly named, shewing, that if they missed of this opportunity, they could not expect again to bee assembled by the Decemviri.

10. Few that delivered their opinions after him remained unconvinced, and many were changed from the sense they had before delivered. He required then of the Ten, that the matter might be further considered of, and all might have liberty to recall their votes, which caused a great contest betwixt him and Cornelius, who desiring that the Decemviri might have the command in the War, cried out, that the thing was already decided in a legal manner, and desired the parties might be counted. Much heat being shewed by both, the Fathers were also divided, which advantage the Ten took to do what they pleased. Appius then formally declaring for what cause they had been assembled, told them they were divided according to the three several opinions of Claudius, Cornelius, and Valerius, every one having had liberty to speak his mind freely: and seeing that most had approved of what Cornelius had propounded, he declared his party to have overcome. Then commanded he the Clerk to draw up a Senatus Consultum, whereby power of raising Forces, and commanding them, was given to the Decemviri; and therewith the Senate was dismissed. They were by this kind of victory rendred more confident, and imperious, as having now in their own thoughts established themselves, by having an Army at their command, which Valerius had advised the Fathers earnestly to beware. Horatius and Valerius made provision for their own defence, by gathering together their Clients and dependents, and Claudius, as he had said, departed into the Country of the Sabines, whose example multitudes following, left their native fear, with their wives and children departing into voluntary exile. The Decemviri troubled hereat, endeavoured at first to hinder them by shutting the gates, but again fearing they might out of fury attempt some dangerous thing, they let them depart, but seized on such goods as they left behind, having accused them of defection. These things being added to the former miscariages, incensed much more both Patritians and Plebeians against them. Yet had they proceeded no further in such like outrages, they might probably for a much more longer time have secured their power, through that influence which the mutual emulation of these orders afforded. For the Plebeians were glad to see the high spirits of the Patritians dejected, and the Senate void of all power: on the other side, the Nobility rejoiced that the Commons had lost their former liberty, having not the least help, because the Tribunitial power was taken away. But they neither using moderation in War, nor temperance at home, constrained all to unite for their destruction, which followed certain hainous offences committed against the Commons.

They lead out an Army against the Sabines and Æ-qui.

11. They divided their Army into three parts, whereof one remained with Appius and Oppius in the Citie, the two other their Collegues led forth against the Sabines and Æqui. The later forced the Romans to forsake their Camp, and shamefully to fly, which caused great rejoycing in Rome amongst the Enemies of the Decemviri, so that Appius fearing some attempt, wrote to his Collegues in the Army, by one means or other to destroy their known adversaries, which was effected upon diverse. But at Rome, Siccus Dentatus, the Roman Achilles as he was named, amongst others spake much against the Captains as Cowards and unskillfull, which Appius understanding, with good words perswaded him to go as Lieutenant or Legatus to the Army then lying at Crustumeria against the Sabines. He not suspecting what was designed, undertook the employment, for that the Office of Legatus was most sacred and honorable amongst the Romans, having the authority and power of a General, and the inviolableness and veneration of a Priest. When he came to the Camp he was sent out with 100 men upon service, who had order to kill him. He fought with them all, slew fifteen, and wounded twice as many, so that finding it too difficult a task to kill him by hand-strokes, they threw Darts and Stones at him, and thereby at length, and at a distance, performed what was enjoined them. Though the murderers according to agreement gave out he fell by the Enemy's hand, yet the Soldiers fetching him off to give him honorable burial, by several circumstances plainly perceived the truth, and demanding Justice against the instruments, when that was put off, and they concealed, they easily understood who were the principal cause, and thought of nothing more than how to revolt.

tus* made away by them.

12. The Army lying at Crustumeria and Fidena being thus incensed against the Decemviri, another wicked act of Appius caused the other which lay incamped at Algidum against the Æqui, not onely to think of, but fully to effect a revolt. There was one L. Virginus a Plebeian, who had a daughter the most beautifull of all Roman women. The maid being but young and at School near the Forum, Appius as he passed that way fell in love with her in such a measure as by no means could he allay his brutish passion. Marry her he could not, being a Plebeian, neither could he hope to obtain her for his Concubine: there remained then no other way for him to enjoy her, than by procuring M. Claudius one of his Clients to challenge her as his Slave, so that the matter being brought before him to judgement, he might judge her so to be. Claudius laid his claim, by affirming she was the true and natural daughter of his Slave, and that the wife of Virginus, now dead, herself being barren, procured the Child, and brought it up for her own; which though he and others knew well enough, yet being young, he had not opportunity till now to right himself. The pretence was so impudent, as raised the indignation of all persons no otherwise concerned than as in the publick liberty. Numitor the maid's Uncle by her mother, and Isilius the son of Isilius one of the first Tribunes of the Commons, to whom she was already contracted, sufficiently evidenced the truth; but Appius being bent upon his lustfull design, would hear no reason, and had not a tumult hapned out of the indignation of the multitude, would have given her up in the hands of Claudius, till such time as her father could be sent for from the Army to defend her cause. Being hardly drawn to put off the matter till the next day, and not giving any more time, wrote to Algidum to hinder Vir-

SECT. 2. ginius from coming, bidding Antonius the Commander of that Legion to confine him, lest he should hear any thing of his daughter. But Numitor, and the brother of Isilius, prevented the Letters, and Virginus pretending the death of a near relation, getting leave to depart, through by-ways returned to the Citie, fearing a pursute after the arrival of the Letters, which accordingly hapned, but he thus evaded it.

13. Virginus then was present in the morning to the great astonishment of Appius, when his daughter was commanded to be brought forth. He proved the maid to be his own daughter, and no supposititious brood; but Appius, a man of no great natural abilities, besides the brutish, corrupted by the greatnesse of his power, and inflamed with the excesse of his passion, neither considered the defence of Virginus, nor was moved by the bitter tears of the Virgin, being angry at the pity of the standers by, who apprehended the case of Father and Daughter no otherwise than as their own, as if he himself were more to be pitied, enduring more for her beauties sake than she herself. Interrupting those that spake in her behalf, and commanding them silence, he told them, that this was not the first time he had had knowledge of this matter, for that Claudius his father being a Client to their family had committed him yet a Boy, when he died, to his protection. In the time of his Guardianship he said it had been cleared to him how Numitoria had procured the Girl of Claudius his Slave, but he thought it more convenient to let the matter rest till Claudius was grown up, either to take, or sell her as he should like best. Since he came into employment he had not meddled with his Clients affairs, but he himself it seemeth making an inventory of his goods, and having notice of this Slave, now challenged his right, and accordingly he both witnessed, and judged him to be the right Lord and owner of her. Great outcries and lamentation being made, as well by the by-standers as the Virgin's relations, Appius commanded all to depart, and gave order to Claudius to take possession of his Slave. Virginus, seeing there was no way but to yield to the Tyrant's lust if his daughter lived, desired he might speak with her a little aside, as to take his last farewell, which being granted, he drew her, hanging upon him, and pitifully bewailing her condition, towards a Butchers stall, whose knife taking into his hands, he said, Daughter, I will send thee to our Ancestors, both free, and of honest repute; for the Tyrant will not suffer thee to be either here; and therewith he stabbed, and dispatch'd her.

14. With the bloody knife in his hand he ran through the Citie, calling the People to their liberty, and coming to the Gate, rode Post to the Army; a company of 400 Plebeians following after. In the same posture he came to the Camp at Algidum, holding the knife, which together with his cloaths was all bloody. Calling the Soldiers together, he took occasion from his own misfortune to let them see in what condition their liberty stood, and with urgent reasons perswaded them to revolt from the ten, and redeem their Countrey. They being conscientious, as to their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had sworn not to forsake their Leaders, but follow them whithersoever, he told them they were discharged from any Obligation, because the Law for the Oath supposed the Captains should be created according to the Laws, which the ten were not, having usurped the power ever since the last time for the Comitia. Being satisfied herewith, the Army departed, some few Centurions onely remaining, and took up its station in the Aventine Mount, and the next day fortifying the Camp chose ten Captains, whereof M. Oppius was the Chief. Presently there came a great party from Fidena, and joyned with them, being offended with the murder of Siccus, and they chusing also ten men out of their body, to the twenty the whole matter now contended for was referred. Appius in the mean while having gone by force to suppress the tumult he had raised in the Citie, was overpowered by the faction of Valerius and Horatius formerly mentioned, and now perceiving that most of the odium lay upon himself as the principal cause, he kept kept himself in his house. Sp. Oppius therefore assembled the Fathers, at which time came the Captains from Fidena, requiring that the revolted might be punished. L. Cornelius accordingly moved that they should all be remanded back to their charges, which if they obeyed, the Ring-leaders only were to be punished, but if they refused, the Senate then should consider how all those might be dealt with, who had betrayed their trust. But the Fathers were too sensible of present grievances, to hear the motion of such corrupt interest, and were prevailed with by Valerius and Horatius, to make Peace with the Army (which by this time was departed to the Holy Mount) on condition that the same form of Government should return, as was in being before the creation of the Decemviri.

15. Valerius Potitius, and M. Horatius Barbatus, both inheritors of popularity, were created Consuls in the Centuriate Comitia, who (according to their promise to the Commons when they procured them to lay down Arms, that they would by all means possible procure their benefit) preferred divers Laws to the regret of the Patritians. One was, that such Laws as the Commons enacted should pass in the Comitia of the Curia, wherein they were more prevalent than the Patritians, as those in the Centuriate, by reason of their influence upon the Equites, and the richer sort of Plebeians, were ever too strong for the multitude, by reason of the distribution of the several Classes into Centuries formerly shewn. After this the Tribunes, whereof Virginius was one, thought fit to call the Decemviri to an account. Virginius being appointed the accuser of Appius, insisted most, saith Livie, upon that Law, which commanded the defendant to have liberty till such time as his or her slavery was proved, which Appius had gone about to violate in his daughter's case. Before the trial, being committed to prison, for that no bail would be taken, he was there found dead, as some thought secretly made away by the Tribunes, but as they and others gave out, having hanged himself. After him Sp. Oppius, as next to him in guilt, was accused, and being condemned, died the same day in prison by his own hands, saith Livie. The other eight banished themselves, and Claudius the pretended Master of Virginius was driven out after them: with which justice the State was satisfied, and indemnity given to all others. Things thus seeming to be settled, the Consuls took the field against the Aequi, Volsci, and Sabines, against whom their success was such, as deserved a Triumph, but the Senate gave them a repulse, being grieved at the Laws they had made in behalf of the Commons. Claudius also the Uncle of Appius accused them of the murder of his Nephew, and other violent courses taken against the Decemviri, and their party, whereas all ought to have been (according to agreement) buried in oblivion. The Consuls appealed to the People, and complaining much of the Senate, procured by the help of the Tribunes a Law to pass for their receiving the privilege of Triumph from the People.

Yet the multitude being insatiable and restless demand the Consulship.

hindered.

16. The Commons by all the privileges already obtained, were but more inflamed with a desire of greater, each morsel out of the prerogative of the Patritians, adding unto their appetite. After three years they required to be made partakers of the Consulship, which hitherto the other had enjoyed, being elected in the Centuriate Comitia, wherein they themselves had the power. The Tribunes provided a bill for making the People free, and at their own choice, whether they would create Patritians or Plebeians at every election, which thing the Senators bearing most hainously, as seeing their privileges utterly ruined thereby, thought all things to be endured, rather than the Law should pass. The Allies of Rome now sent for aid against the Aequi, and Sabines, who invaded them, and news was brought that the Veientes and Ardeates would revolt; but the Tribunes those Popular Tyrants hindered all Levies, suffering none, that refused to be lifted, to receive punishment; neither could the Senate prevail with them, to defer the matter till the Warre should be ended. The Consuls in so difficult a time held a private conference of certain Senators, whereof Claudius, according to the genius of his Ancestors, was all for resistance, urging that nothing was in this matter to be yielded yielded to the Commons, who went about to change the constitution of the State, and thereby were enemies to it. But T. Quintius shewed what inconvenience force and civil War might bring, and the rather, for that their Ancestors had made the Tribunes inviolable, by a curse laid upon themselves and posterity, in case their persons were hurt, or the conditions then sworn to in their behalf should be broken. When the rest were all of his opinion, Claudius proposed an expedient as seasonable in so great necessity. He advised by no means to suffer the Consulship to come into the hands of Plebeians, but to create certain Governours in the room of Consuls, six, or eight, whereof an equal number at least should be Patritians; for hereby they should seem not to take too much power to themselves, and yet not give up the other Office, wherein lay the secret of their prerogative, to be managed by base and unworthy men. When this project marvellously pleased all, that nothing might seem to be designed beforehand, he advised the Consuls not to ask them the graver men their opinions first, as the custom was, when the Senate should meet, but the younger and most popular: and hee appointed T. Genutius the Consul's brother to propound this way of reconciliation as his private sence.

An expedient found out by Claudius.

17. When the Senate was assembled, Canuleius the Tribune, who chiefly prosecuted the matter in hand, without pressing it, inveighed against the Consuls, as holding secret meetings, and hatching clandestine designs against the State: and those Senators who had not been called took the thing in some disdain. But the Consuls protesting their innocence by an oath, said they would also by deeds declare it, and therewith gave any of the younger sort leave to speak, and when none rose up asked Valerius first of all his opinion. He advised the Fathers to favour the Commons, who had deserved so well both in acquiring dominion, and in getting and preserving liberty, and urged that the City could not be free if there were not an equality of right; yet for that the War was now urgent, he desired the thing might at present be forbore till that was finished, upon promise that then the Law should be propounded. Horatius being asked next, and others, seconded him; and at length Claudius being desired to speak, that he might conceal the design, according to his own custom, and that of his Family, flew out into invectives against the Commons, and advised that the Law might never passe, neither then nor ever after. A greater tumult following, T. Genutius was asked his opinion, and as of himself propounded the expedient, that six Governours might be chosen, three out of each order, who having Consular power, when the time of their Magistracy should be expired, then the Senate and People meeting together, might resolve whether they would have the same Office or that of Consuls for the following year; and what was concluded by most voices, should prevail at the end of every year. This was gladly embraced, both by Senators and Tribunes, and leave given to any Plebeians to stand for the new Office. But so fickle a thing is desire without reason, and so easily changing into the other extreme, especially of the multitude, that those who so earnestly before sought that the chiefest Magistracy might be communicated to their body, threatening else to leave the City as formerly, and take arms, when they had their desire, were glutted with it, and changed into the other extreme. For many Plebeians standing for the Office, and using their utmost endeavours to be preferred, they thought none of them worthy of that honour, but bestowed it upon eminent Patritians onely, who appeared as Candidates.

The third grand change of government to the

18. This third change of the Government at Rome, hapned in the third year of the 84 Olympiad, as Dionysius computeth, Diphilus being then Archon at Athens; but as others, in the first year of that Olympiad, which fell in with the 310 year of the City, and the 21 of Artaxerxes Longimanus, M. Genutius and C. Quintius according to him, but L. Papyrius and L. Sempronius according to them, being Consuls. These new Magistrates called Tribuni Militum, were A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Atilius Longus, and T. Clatius (or Cacilius, as Livie hath it) Siculus. Thus at first they were but three in number, afterward it arose to six, and at length to eight. Pomponius the Lawyer writeth, that sometimes there were twenty, and sometimes more, which seemeth incredible, no other Author agreeing with him herein, so that Budens with reason thinketh the place to be corrupted from Seni to Viceni. This number of Collegues, together with the mixture of Plebeians who afterwards pressed in, procured, that although they had both the power and ensignes of Consuls, yet their privilege and dignity seemed unlike, whence a Tribune in way of contempt called them a Proconsular image, and P. Manlius the Dictator, shewing that a Master of horse-men was inferior to a Consul, compareth his power to that of theirs. Having been for some years created, and for others laid aside, at length in the 388 year of the City, they were quite cast off, at what time Q. Sextius a Plebeian was admitted to the Consulship. But these first Tribunes having held their Office 73 days, then were constrained to lay it down, for that the Augurs found some flaw in their election, and the Government returned into it's former course, the Senate naming T. Quintius Barbatus, who in the Comitia created L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Ascratinus, although it be doubtful, to say truth, whether there were Tribunes onely, or Tribunes and Consuls both for this year.

The Censors,
his history is broken off, the following part being lost.

It's commendation.

19. But to be sure, for the year following the People having it in their power whether to elect Tribunes or Consuls, resolved upon the later, and created in December, the Moon being then full, M. Geganius Maccrinus the second time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus the fifth. This year were the Censors made, Officers who being but contemptible at the beginning, rose to great dignity and power. Their original and power might have been more clearly discovered, but that Dionysius his History is here in the beginning of this story broken off, the remaining part being lost, to the great damage of the studious in Antiquity. For not to speak of his smooth style, and the Attrick purity thereof, he hath therein delivered the Antiquities of Rome from the first Original, with such diligence, that he seemeth in this respect to have excelled all Writers, both Greek and Roman. For what Latin Authors have neglected, as vulgarly known amongst themselves, as Sacrifices, Games, Triumphs, Ensigns of Magistrates, the universal discipline of the Roman Commonwealth, the Census, Auspicia, Comitia, that difficult distribution of the whole People into Curia, Classes, Centuries, and Tribes: further, the authority of the Senate, and Commons, with the Power of Magistrates, he of all others hath delivered most accurately. That these things may be better understood, he compareth them with the customs of Greece, as where he speaketh of Clients, he occasionally maketh mention of this relation amongst the Athenians and Thessalians, as Cesar also writeth it to have been ordinary amongst the Galls. He compareth the Roman Dictator with the Harmostes of the Lacedaemonians, the Archons of the Thessalians, and the Æsymnetes of the Attic Athenians. The Laws of Romulus, Numa, and Servius, had perished but for him, as also the knowledge of the Original of Rome in a great measure: and so choice are all his Collections, that they tend, as to the instruction of the Reader in the depth of State mysteries, so also to his acquiring or retaining a religious awe of Providence. Such is his History (saith * one well able to judge) that if it had been kept intire (for it consisteth of twenty Books, as Photius informeth us) there would have been no cause of bewailing the losse of Varro's treasures, with whom he was very familiar, as well as Pompey the Great and Tubero; and from whom he seemeth to have derived his choicest Antiquities. These things render a sufficient account, why he is made use of in the History of Roman matters, rather than any other.

20. Servius Tullius the sixth King of Rome first instituted the Census, as was shewn before, and did the work himself, without any peculiar Officer, as also did the Consuls untill this time. But now in the 66th year from the banishment of Tarquinius, and the 311 of the City, there having been no Census for seventeen years, for that the Consuls were necessarily diverted from

SECT. 2. from that work by more urgent business, the Senate procured out of their own order two peculiar Officers to be created, who were called Censores, because according to their Censio or estimation the People was cessed, saith Varro, or because every one accounted himself worth so much, quantus illi censuissent, as they judged, or estimated, according to Festus.

The duration of the Office of Censors.

21. At the beginning they were created for five years, because according to Servius his constitution the People were to be cessed at ever Lustrum, which contained so many. But their dignity and power so increasing, that they seemed of too long a continuance, nine years after, in the 320 of the City, by a Law which Mamercus Amilius the Dictator preferred, the duration of their Office was confined within the term of one year and an half. Though their Office at first was onely to take an estimate of mens Estates, and describing all publick and private riches, to distribute the People according to their wealth into Classes and Centuries; yet within a while they came to have inspection into manners also. For they upon misdemeanour put out of the Senate, took away publick horses, and cast out of the Tribes. The former kind of punishment was inflicted upon Senators, the second upon Equites, and the last upon meer Plebeians. Their removing Senators, was by passing them by at the new election. For, such Senators saith Festus, as were passed by in former times, were lyable to no disgrace, because as the Kings chose and substituted whom they pleased, so after them the Consuls and Tribunes Military, such as they had greatest interest in; first Patricians, and then after Plebeians, till by the Tribunitial Law of Ovinus, it was ordained, that the Censores out of every order or rank, should (curiam) elect the most worthy into the Senate, whence it came to passe, that such as were passed by or removed, were noted with ignominie. This note out of Festus hinteth to us the antient power of the Roman Kings in making Senators, one of the greatest supporters of the Throne of their Empire.

In voce Prætor. iii.

22. As for the disgrace which they put upon Equites; It was the custome for every Eques at the publick Census to appear before the Censores with their Horses in their hands. If they approved of them, they bade them passe by and lead away the Horse; if they determined otherwise, they took away the Horse, and commanded him to be sold. The third note of disgrace concerned the Plebeians, whom they either removed from their own Tribe into another lesse honourable, according to Livie, or made them Ærarii, and registred them in the tables of the Carites, whereby they were deprived of their Centurie, and remained Citizens onely in this respect, ut pro capitis suis tributum nomine æra solverent, as writeth Asconius Pedianus upon the Oration of Cicero against Q. Cæcilius, called Divinatio, which disputeth who ought to be admitted the Accuser of Verres. Gellius telleth us what was meant by the tabula Caritum. The Carites (inhabitants of Cære in Tuscany, once called Agylla) we understand to have been first of all made Municipals, without any right of suffrage: and it was granted them that they might receive the honour of being free of Rome, without any trouble or burthen, for that they received the Sacra (or idols) of the Romans, and preserved them in the Gallick War; that is, when Rome was taken by the Galls, as Livie hath the story also in this fourth Book. Hence were those called Tabula Caritum, vice versa, wherein the Censores caused such to be registred as they deprived of the right of Suffrage. Although these several sorts of punishment respected the several ranks of men, yet sometimes those of higher degree tasted of all or most of them, so that Senators might not onely be passed by, and Equites deprived of their Horses, but lose their Tribes also, and be reduced to the condition of Ærarii.

Lib. 16. cap. 13

The effects of it.

23. This Office being committed to the prudent management of able persons, became effectual to the repression of such vice, as fell not under the particular cognizance of penal Laws. Private faults, and domestick miscarriages were by them noted, with such actions sometimes as now would not simply incur the censure of precise illegality or indecency. Some of their questions questions upon oath were such as these: (a) Hast thou a wife according to thy mind? to which one once making a jesting answer, was made an Ararius. A certain man yawning before the Censors had been punished in that sort, but that he swore he did it unwillingly, being troubled with that disease which the Romans called Oscedo. P. Scipio Nasica and M. Pompius being Censors, and finding a certain Knight very fat and comely, whose horse was exceeding lean and ill favoured, they asked him the reason of that difference, to which he answered: Because he looked to himself, but Statius to his horse; for which irreverent answer he was registred amongst the Ararii according to the custom. Now Statius was a servile name, given by the ancients to most Slaves, whence Cacilius the famous Writer of Tragedies was called Statius, though it was afterwards as it were turned into a surname, and he called Cacilius Statius. They were wont also to take away horses from very big and corpulent men, as unfit for service, but (b) Gellius observeth, that this was no punishment, as some thought, but a taking away of the employment without ignominy. This Census was managed in the Campus Martius, and it being compleated, the Lustrum was made, with prayers for the publick safety, and a sacrifice of the Suovetaurilia formerly mentioned. Besides these employments, the Censors (c) let to farm the customes, and sent (d) out their constitutions throughout the Provinces, called Leges Censoria. They erected (e) publick buildings, made other publick works, and took care for their repair, as also of the high-ways, in, and about the Citie more early; and in other places afterward: they also provided for the expence of publick sacrifices. But not onely were there Censors at Rome (as the Gracians also used the Census) but the Colonies also had their Subcensors, who gave account to the other, what numbers of men, and what wealth they found in the several places, which upon information was registred in the publick Tables.

24. The power of the Censorship remained untouched (although the power of the Censors was weakned by restraining their time to a year and an half, though they were named every fifth year) untill the Tribuneship of P. Clodius, who by a Law which he preferred (a) forbid any Senator to be passed by, or any of the other Ranks to be noted with ignominy, except lawfully accused, and condemned by sentence of both the Censors. He took an advantage (as it seemeth from (b) Pedianus) at the hatred which had possessed the multitude against the severity of the Office, which procured it to be intermitted for certain years. But afterwards (whether by reason of the corruption that was crept amongst Judges, or for other reasons) Metellus Scipio the Consul procured Clodius his Law to be abrogated, and so the antient Vigour of this office returned. Lipsius writeth, that under the Emperours it was diminished, and lay for dead till the time of Decius. But C. Caesar the Dictator, that he might better execute the Census, went to every ones house; and because the principal part of the Office consisted in forming of manners, he called himself Magister Morum, not Censor. Then the form of the State being changed after the victory of Actium, Augustus having the care of manners committed to him by the Senate, looked to nothing more diligently than the Census, for thrice he performed it, not onely in reference to Roman Citizens, but all Subjects of the Empire, with such care and diligence as none ever before him. Under Tiberius and Caligula the Census was not observed, but under Claudius the 74th Lustrum was celebrated. Being intermitted during the reign of Nero, Vespasian renewed it, and celebrated the 75 Census. Domitian named himself amongst his other titles Perpetual Censor, but made no Lustrum, so that for 160 years the Census was intermitted till Decius the Emper. created Valerian Censor with unlimited power. After this the Censorship was utterly omitted to the great detriment of the Roman Empire, which being at length broken into Eastern and Western, the Emperours of the former (Greekish Emperours) made use of it, as others also of later times, and it appeareth that in the intermission thereof, in the dayes of Trajan, particular Provinces and Towns had their Censors, who made choice of their Senators. Lastly, the Censors during the popular Government were of Consular dignity, ever after the second Punic War, though it was otherwise sometimes before. The same persons were never created twice. And in case one of them died in his Office, his Collegue continued not therein, neither was any put into the place of the dead, because in that year wherein Rome was taken by the Galls it had so hapned; whereupon it was counted ominous, and a Law made against it for the time to come. Their dignity was exceeding great, they being therein though not in power above the Consuls, and having all other Ensigns the same with them except Li-

25. The Fathers rejoiced they had got these Officers Created out of their own body, and the Tribunes counting that power inconsiderable, which at first was pretended to, gave way unto it. But the Commons egged on by the continual complaints of the later, proceeded in their grudge against the Patritians, taking it in ill part that marriage was forbidden betwixt the two orders, and breathing after no lesse than equal power in the State. This animated Sp. Malius, a rich Knight, by his large bounty towards the poorer sort in time of a great dearth, to hunt after popularity, and through it to aspire to the Sovereignty. He was hereof accused by L. Minucius, to whom the care of provisions was committed, and the Senate afrighted with the strangeness of the matter, by the advice of T. Quintius the Consul, commanded a Dictator to be named. Quintius Cincinnatus now 80 years old was the man, who chose C. Servilius Ahala for his Master of horse-men. The Dictator summoning Malius to appear, when he would not obey, Ahala killed him in the Forum, and was justified for so doing by Quintius, who commanded his goods to be sold, and his house razed. It should seem from Livy that Ahala escaped without punishment: But Cicero and Valerius on the contrary affirm, that he was banished by the incensed multitude. This hapned in the 315th year of the Citie after Varro's account. Valerius and Livy say, that the Area of his house for a memorial of his punishment had the name of Aequi-Melium.

26. The Tribunes enraged about the death of Malius, procured for the year following Tribunes Military with Consular power to be created now six years after their Institution, hoping that into the number of six some Plebeian might creep, which thing would give them an opportunity to revenge the death of Malius: But three onely were created, and their expectation unanswered thereby. This year Fidena, a Roman Colony, gave up it self to Tolumnius King of the Volentes, and by his Instigation murdered the Ambassadors sent thither. For this war Mamercus Emilius was named Dictator, who overcame the Enemies in battel, wherein Cornelius Cossus a Tribune in the Army, slew, and spoiled Tolumnius, thereby obtaining Opima Spolia. Varro thought they were called Opima ab opibus for their riches; but Plutarch thinketh rather ab opere, because the consecration of them was granted to a Captain, who with his own hand slew the General of the Enemy. They were consecrated to Jupiter Feretrius, so called, because the Trophy was carried in a Feretrum, or certain little carriage, as some thought, at that time there being many Greek words in use with the Latines, or a Feriendo, from Jupiter his smiting with Thunder-bolts, or else from the blows given in battel. This honour of carrying in Triumph the Opima Spolia hath onely thrice hapned to Roman Captains saith Plutarch untill our time. First to Romulus, who slew Acron King of Canina; secondly to Cornelius Cossus, who killed Tolumnius, (the Etruscan in one place he callerh him, and the Tyrrhenian in another) and thirdly to M. Marcellus, who so killed, and spoiled Britomartus (in one place, but Virdumarus in another) King of the Galls. A controversie there was of old, whether any but a General from a General could take Opima Spolia, which maketh Livy Apologize for what he writeth in honour of Cossus; but Varro wrote, as (*) Festus witnesseth, that a Mani-

27. Two years after this, Fidena was taken by another Dictator, A. Servilius, through the working of a Mine. But when the Consuls had kept the power four years, they were forced again to give way to the Tribunes Military, for the Creation whereof, though the Tribuni Plebis prevailed, yet the Chief of the Commons missing all this while of being joyned with the Nobility in the honour, were much offended. At the end of two years the Senate took occasion from the War wherewith the Aequi and Volsci threatened Rome, to bring in Consuls, which also gave way to a Dictator, A. Posthumus Tubero, against their wills, through the power of the Tribunes. He finishing the War successfully, laid down his Office. And in this year wherein T. Quintius Cincinnatus the son of Lucius, and Cn. Julius Mento were Consuls, Livy by a grosse mistake would have the Carthaginians to have passed over into Sicily the first time, by an occasion of the disagreement of the Islanders amongst themselves. After five years the Commons prevailed to have Tribunes Military created the fifth time, four in number, who shewed how unprofitable the equal command of many in an Army is, and gave occasion to the making of a new Dictator. For, Fidena having now again revolted, and joyned with the Veientes, three of those Tribunes were sent against it and them, and the fourth left to Govern the Citie. When they came to engage with the Enemy, One cried fight, but another said Stay, and each one being of a several mind, matters were at length brought to that passe, that the Roman Army fled. The Citie was struck with great amazement at the report, and was in an uproar, which caused Mamercus Æmilius the third time to be named Dictator, though the Censors had removed him from his Tribe, for that in his second Office (to which he was called, because of the stirrs made by the Hetruscans upon the taking of Fidena) he confined their Office to the term of one year and an half. Æmilius being named Dictator, appointed for his Master of horse-men A. Cornelius Cossus, who obtained the Opima Spolia of Tolumnius King of the Veientes.

28. By the prudence & valour of these two Fidena was retaken, and sacked after the Hetruscans were overthrown; and the Dictator returning to Rome in Triumph, laid down his Office when he had held it 17 dayes. For three years the Tribunes Military continued, at the end whereof the Senate took occasion at the War which threatened from the Volsci, and at their absence, to bring in the Consuls again, notwithstanding the Tribunes of the Commons opposed it. But C. Sempronius, one of the Consuls, managing this War very carelessly, the Tribunes thence took advantage, and the Tribunes Military again resumed the Chief power. This was for one year, at the end whereof the Senate again procured Consuls to be made. When this year was expired, there was so great contention about two Quæstors, which the Commons would have created out of their body, that the State fell into an interregnum. L. Papirius Mugillanus being Interrex for a Composure procured the Tribunes Military to be again admitted, and four Quæstors for the following year to be created, either out of Patricians or Plebeians, as the People should think fit in their Comitia; but this satisfied nor the Tribunes, nor the better sort of Plebeians, nor one of this order being preferred (though some stood) either as Tribune Military or Quæstor. In the second year after this, the Slaves conspired to set fire on the Citie, and seize upon the Capitol; but the plot was timely discovered. The Tribunes Military held the Government for seven years, and then another Interregnum because of the Contention following, Fabius Vibulanus the Interrex brought in Consuls again.

29. The Tribuni Plebis according to their custom made a bid construction hereof, and having now and then mentioned the division of publick grounds, pressed it earnestly with an extent now to all that at any time had been gotten by War. The Patricians no lesse vigorously opposed it, and the Tribunes hindred the Levies of Soldiers, so that with much ado, and upon extream necessity onely could the Consuls procure any to oppose the Aequi and Volsci, who now made incursions. In the fifth year the Com-

Commons being crossed in their intentions by the Senate, of resuming the Tribunes Military, created three of the Quaestors of their own rank, and the chief amongst them designing to be created Tribune Military for the next year, stikled hard for that kind of government. The Senate at length was constrained to yield; else no opposition could be made against the former Enemies, who now again made inrodes into the Roman Territories, and by confederacies exceedingly strengthened themselves. For this cause also, though much against the mind of the Tribunes, a Dictator was named, who overthrowing the Enemy in one battel, wasted his Country and returned. In the third year after this, the two orders were something reconciled, by the plunder of a Town taken from the Volsci, and especially by a Decree of the Senate for the publick pay of the Armies (with brasse money) before which time every one bore his own charges in the War. But such was the contentious disposition of the Tribunes, those grand incendiaries, that they drew this into odium, as grievous to such who had formerly maintained themselves in the Wars, and now were to pay others. They effected, that for a time the pay was denied, and after three years they procured one Plebeian (P. Licinius Calvus) to be chosen amongst the Tribunes Military, wherein they mightily applauded themselves, and readily permitted the pay of the Army to be gathered. Licinius caried himself so well in the Office, that for the year following all the Tribunes Military save one, were Plebeians.

Surprizeth Veii.

30. For these several years the War abroad was carried on with the Hetruscans, with various successe, and Veii the principal of their Cities was besieged, no lesse in compasse than Atheus, and exceeding wealthy, being within twenty miles of Rome. It's Inhabitants, called Veientes, had in behalf of the Fidenates, waged War with Romulus, afterwards being conquered, had seven times rebelled, and ever perfidious in time of Peace, alwaies wasted the Roman Territories. They compelled the Fidenates also to rebel, periwaded them to kill the Ambassadors, and the Romans thither sent to inhabit, for, they vied with the Romans themselves for power and riches. They had moreover injured the Roman Ambassadors, and not once procured Hetruria to rise against the State; wherefore the People offended with so many injuries, resolved utterly to destroy Veii. Whereas the Soldiers untill this time, were wont in Summer onely to be abroad in War, and winter at home in the City, now were they constrained both Winter and Summer to continue the Siege. The seventh year thereof drawing towards an end, the Tribunes Military were blamed of remissnesse, so that for the following year new ones were created in their rooms. Amongst them was Furius Camillus, who having got much credit in the battel fought with the Aequi and Volsci under Posthumius Tubercus the Dictator, was honoured other wayes, as by being created Censor; in which Office he caused the Bachelors to marry the Widdovs of such as had lost their lives for their Country, and first of all others obliged Orphans to pay Tribute, for that the depending Wars, especially the Siege of Veii, were very chargable to the State. Being novv Tribune Military the second time, he did nothing against Veii, it having fallen to his lot to repressse the Falerienses and Capenates, vwho disturbed the Romans in their enterprize. At length in the tenth year of the Siege, they created him Dictator, as the most fit person they had to finish it.

Plutarch in Camillo.

31. Camillus appointed Cornelius Scipio to be his Master of Horse-men, and first overthrowing in a great battel the Falisci and Capenates, went against Veii. Finding it full of difficulty to take a place of such strength by storm, he wrought a mine up into it, through which his Soldiers issuing, he easily surprized it. Being elevated by so great an achievement, whereby he had thus subdued the corival of Rome, in the tenth year of the Siege, he triumphed in a Chariot drawn by four white Horses, which his Country-men thinking proper onely to the King and Father of their gods, were much offended at it: and indeed no man neither before nor after him (saich Plutarch) assumed to himself so much honour. Being offended with this carriage, they found themselves as much concerned in another matter. The Tribunes bunes of the Commons proposed a Law for dividing asunder the Senate and People, whereof the one should stay at Rome, and the other remove to Veis; this parting as they thought, being a ready means for the enrichment of both, by the possession of two such considerable Cities. The Plebeians now many and rich vehemently pressed it, and the Patricians judging it would prove the overthrow of the State, as earnestly opposed the Law, betaking themselves to Camillus, who put it off by diverting the multitude into other courses. Having contracted an alienation of mind from them upon these accounts, another thing cast him into an absolute hatred, and that if not upon a just, yet a plausible pretence. He had made a vow, that if he took Veis, he would dedicate the tenth part of the plunder to Apollo, but when the City was taken, either because he was unwilling to displease the Soldiery, or forgot it, the thing was omitted. After he had laid down the Office of Dictator, he moved the People in it, and the Priests reported that the sacrifices portended the anger of their gods, which must be appeased by gifts; so that the Soldiers who had already spent what they had got upon their necessary uses, were forced upon oath to restore the tenth part, wherewith a present was made to Apollo. Because there was little Gold in the City, the women contributed their ornaments, in way of requital whereof the Senate decreed, that at their burial they should also be commended by funeral Orations, which before this had not been in use.

He goeth into exile.

32. The Tribunes again moving for a separation, the War with the Falisci opportunely fell out to divert the multitude, for which Camillus was chosen Tribune Military with five others. He besieging the Falerii, who inhabited a strongly fortified City, the School-master thereof drew out his boyes into his Camp, and offered to give them up into his hands, which treachery he so far derested, as to cause the Pædagogues to be stripped, and put rods into the hands of his boyes, wherewith they drove him back into the Town. Herewith the Falerii were so affected as they yielded, and the Senate referring them for conditions to Camillus, he onely fined them a sum of mony, and received them with all the Falisci into friendship. But the Soldiers who hoped to have enriched themselves with the plunder of this place, inveighed grievously against him, and now the Tribunes pressing again the Law for separation, he used such freedom in opposing it, that they out of revenge accused him of having pilfered the plunder in the Hetruscan War, whereof some brazen dores had been, as they said, seen in his house. The multitude now upon several accounts exasperated against him, resolved to shew their spleen. So that not having any way to evade their displeasure, he went into exile, lifting up his hands towards the Capitol, and praying, that if he was unjustly and meerly by the lust and malice of the multitude banished, they might sodainly repent it, and that it might appear to all men, how much the Romans stood in need of and desired his presence. Being gone, he was fined 15000 Ara, which sum in Silver made up 1500 Denarii. For Aes or brassie was then used for money, and Dinarium thence had the name, for that it contained ten Asses thereof. But within a while it fell out, that Camillus was both missed and desired, according to his wish.

33. Many thousands of the Galls called Celta, finding their own Country too narrow for them, with their wives and children left it, to seek out new seats. Some of them passing over the Sea, pierced as far as the Riphaean mountains, and placed themselves in the utmost limits of Europe, others took up their habitation betwixt the Pyrenaans and the Alps, near the Senones and Celtorii. These a long time after having tasted of some Italian wine, were furiously transported with a desire of inhabiting so rare a Soil, as brought forth such fruit, and passing over the Alps, got into their power all that Country once belonging to the Etruscans, and which reached from the Alps to both the Seas: for, that the Etruscans once inhabited all this Country, Plutarch proveth thence, that the Northern Sea was named Adriatick, from Adria, one of their Towns, and the Southern, Tyrrhenian, from the Tyrrheni the same with Hetrusci. At this time the posterity of those Galli

SECT. 2.

The Galls besiege Clusium.

Senones under the conduct of their King Brennus, besieged Clusium a City of Heiruria, whose inhabitants sent to Rome, desiring of that State to interpose, by sending Ambassadors and Letters to their unjust oppressors. The Senate performing this neighbourly part, the Galls required part of the Territories of the Clusini, who were, as they said, unable to manage them all, and Brennus not condescending to any other conditions, the Ambassadors (all three of the Fabian family) in great anger went into Clusium, and caused the Inhabitants to make a sally out against the besiegers. It hapned, that in the fight Fabius Ambustus one of the three killing a Gall, whilst he disarmed him, was discovered; whereupon Brennus conceiving just indignation, broke up his Siege, and marched towards Rome.

Defeat the Romans at Alia.

34. Yet because he would not seem to proceed unjustly, he sent thither, requiring that the Ambassadors might be given up to him, as having broke the Law of Nations. But favour so far prevailed above equity, that the matter being referred from the Senate to the People, no satisfaction could be had from either: nay the Ambassadors on the contrary, were with three others created Tribunes Military, for carying on the Warre. Brennus then continuing his march, and breathing revenge, was met by the Tribunes at the River Alia, eleven miles from the City, who scarce striking one stroak, quickly berook them to their heels, and their Army after them. The Galls persued them, being amazed at the flight and cowardize of those who had already obtained for their valour a great name in the World; but were astonished when they found the gates of Rome open, and none upon the walls to make resistance; for it had been resolved to quit the City and secure the Castel. The greater part of the People departed into the adjoining Country; the rest possessed themselves of the Capitol, all but certain old men of Senatorian degree, who in their robes placed themselves in the Forum, resolving to take such quarter, as the disposition of the Enemy would afford them.

Come to Rome which is forsaken all but the Capitol.

Brennus at first fearing some stratagem, after he perceived all to be clear, entred the City. His Soldiers were amazed, to see the grave Senators sitting without fear in the Forum, and hurt them not, till one handling the long beard of M. Papirius, the old man struck him with his staff upon the head, whereupon the Gall slew him, and then all the rest were killed, with all of both Sexes and all ages that were found about the City, which was also now burnt to the ground, and the Capitol closely besieged.

Camillus made Dictator.

35. While the Galls lay before the Capitol, they carelessly demeaned themselves, as secure of any Enemy, and were scattered into the Country adjoining. Camillus at this time living in exile at Ardea, procured the Inhabitants of that City to issue out upon them, and killed many; which the Romans, who lay at Veii, understanding, chose him for their General, desiring him to forget injuries, and succour his distressed Country. He objected his condition of banishment, and refused to act, except by commission from those in the Capitol, whom he considered to be the body of the Roman State yet surviving. There was one Pontius Cominius, who undertook to procure him leave from their friends in the Capitol, whither by a strange adventure he got, passing by the Enemy, and swimming the River till he came to the Rock, which then he made a shift to climbe, and having procured the Senate to pronounce Camillus Dictator, returned in the same manner. By this time as well the besiegers as besieged were well wearied, both parties for want of provisions, and the Galls by reason of a Plague which raged amongst them; so as (having once attempted to surprize the Castel, by climbing up the Rock, they were discovered by the crying of the Geese, consecrated to Juno, and repelled by the valour of one Manlius especially) they agreed for fifty pounds of Gold to rise and depart. Yet so covetous were they, that they took out the Gold as it was weighing, and added to the weight, which being complained of, Brennus cast in his Sword also, crying Va victis, which afterwards became a proverb. But in the mean time came Camillus, and nulling this compact, as made without his consent, who before was Dictator, and therefore alone had power of making Peace, overthrew them in fight, and did such execution upon them in pursute, as what remained of them, was overpowered and cut off by the Country. Thus Rome, which was unexpectedly taken by the Galls about the Ides of the moneth Quintilis, was more unexpectedly recovered about the Ides of February, so that as Plutarch writeth, the Barbarians held it seven moneths, in the 365 year of the City, and the sixteenth of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

ing to Vei.

36. The Tribunes now renewed their importunity about removing unto Vei, which caused the Senate to procure Camillus his holding of the Office of Dictator, though contrary to the custome, for the whole year. He with gentle language appeased the multitude, shewing them, how unworthy a thing it was to forsake the seat of their Ancestors, and of their Country rites (which were appropriate to the same place) for to inhabit a conquered and enslaved City. Then was Rome rebuilt in great haste, whereby afterwards it became rather an heap of houses than a well ordered Town, and that the watercourses formerly laid in the streets, now ran for the most part under private houses. Camillus having laid down his Office was forced the year following to reassume it, because of the Volsi, who now took Armes, as also the Aequi and Etruscans, all which he overthrew, and forced the Volsi to yield themselves after the War had continued with them for 70 years. In the third year after this he overcame them again, and with them the Hernici and Latines, whereof the later had ever from the battel at the Rhegillan Lake been trusty and faithful until now: and from the Etruscans he recovered two Towns which they had taken from the Allies of Rome. This he did being Tribune Military, though envied by M. Manlius, who having done special service in the Capitol, by repelling the Galls, obtained the Surname of Capitolinus. Being naturally haughty and ambitious, he was herewith puffed up, so as to extenuate the deserts of Camillus, and by ingratiating himself with the common sort, through paying their debts, and railing against the great ones, plainly to aim at the Sovereignty. This, together with the War depending with the Volsi, which was also aggravated by the defection of the Hernici and Latines, caused the Senate to resolve that a Dictator should be created.

37. This was A. Cornelius Cossus, as Livie writeth, though Plutarch nameth Quintilius Capitolinus, whom the other reporteth to have been Master of the Horse-men to Cossus. He triumphing over the Enemies from without, called also by the help of the Tribunes Manlius to account, and shut him in prison. The multitude much afflicted hereat, took mourning garments, and made such disturbance, that after some time he was set at liberty. But holding private meetings in the night, and growing more bold in his design, the Senate committed it to the care of the Tribunes Military, whereof Camillus was one, (as afterward in cases of great exigency to the Consuls) to take care that the Commonwealth should receive no damage. Being then brought to his trial again in that place, whence a view of the Capitol might be had, he would ever point to it, and put the People in mind of what he had done there for them; whereupon Camillus caused his Judges to remove without the gate, into the grove called Lucus Petelinus, where being no sight of the Capitol, he was condemned. He was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian Rock, the place both of his honour and infamie: and it was decreed, that none of the Manlii should afterward be called Marcus.

38. After these things the Latines rebelling, and the Volsi, were severally overthrown without, and great tumults hapned within, by reason of the debts of the Commons, now again exceedingly increased. Their Tribunes incensed them against the Patritians, and the contest was sharpened by Fabius Ambustus one of this order, who having married one daughter to a Patritian and another to a Commoner, this took such distaste at her husbands condition, being void of honour, that Fabius told her he would so order the matter, that the same dignity should be communicated to her house, as was to that of her Sister. From this time he consulted with Licinius Stolo her husband, and L. Sestius, about the preferring of a Law, for making one Consul out of the the Commons. These two being made Tribunes of the People, laboured so vigorously about it, that after long and great contention it came to that passe, that for five years they suffered no Supreme Magistrates to be created. Nine years this dispute continued, those two continuing Tribunes still, and the matter had come to another separation or worse, but that Camillus reconciled the parties. He was made Dictator the fourth, saith Plutarch, for this purpose, but finding the multitude too stubborn, which threatened to Fine him except he complied, he again laid down his Office. The Senate then caused another Dictator to be named, under whom Licinius Stolo preferred a Law, which forbad any man to possesse above 500 Akers of ground, and afterwards being found himself to have above, was punished by virtue of his own constitution. Whilest the Contention was on foot about the Consulship, news came that the Galls, many thousands in number, were marching from the Adriatick-Sea towards Rome, which composed the difference for the present, and made them cast their eyes upon Camillus as Dictator the fifth time. He being near 80 years of age refused not the employment in this time of so great danger, and perceiving the Galls to fight with swords, striking at the heads and shoulders of their Enemies without any art or dexterity, he furnished his men with light iron Helmets, and bound their Targets about with brasse, teaching them how to sence, and receive the stroaks. By this device he rendred the swords of the Galls so unserviceable, that giving them battel at the River Aniene, he easily overthrew them, in the 23th year after he had recovered Rome from their Countrey-men.

39. After this fight the Romans despised the Galls whom before they exceedingly feared, insomuch that wheras by a Law immunity from War was granted to Priests, an exception and Proviso was added as to that with the Galls. Camillus in his retreat had Velitra given up into his hands; but having now finished all his warlike exploits, a very considerable one remained to be performed by him at home. For at his return he was received with fierce and impatient Contestes betwixt the Senate and Commons about the Consulship, and retaining his power, that thereby he might serve the interest of the Nobility, an Officer was sent from the Tribunes to pull him down from his seat in the Forum, and bring him before them. His attendants repelling the man, such a noise and tumult followed as never before had been known, the multitude crying out, pull him down. He laid not down his Office, but departing to the Senate-house, had a serious debate with the Fathers about the matter, and after a great and various Contention, that party prevailed which granted to the Commons that one of the Consuls might be created out of their body. For this they desired, and obtained of the Commons, to have a Praetor created yearly out of the Patritian order for administration of Justice in the Citie. By this agreement a good understanding being revived betwixt the parties, for as long a time as the infirmity of the Government could bear, a Temple was dedicated to Concord, which Camillus had vowed, moreover a fourth day was added to the Latine Feria, and the greater sort of Games were solemnized, which when the Adiles of the Commons refused to manage, the young Patritians offered themselves, and the Senate procured also of the People that two Patritians every year might be made Adiles, who from the Chair called Sella Curulis, had the name of Adiles Curules. What their Office was hath been shewn before. As for this Chair, Gellius writeth, that anciently such Senators as had born a Curule Office, were for honour's sake wont to be drawn to the house in a Chariot, wherein was a Chair in which they sate, and which thence (from the Chariot or Currus) was called Curulis. But others think that both the Orthography of the word, and the dismenfion of the thing crossed this derivation, and that it was called Curulis from Cures, a Town of the Sabines. The form of it upon old Coins represents that of Spanish Chairs, used by Princes as Chairs of State: It had also crooked feet, as Plutarch in the life of Marius describeth it; several ascents there were to it: it was covered with Ivory, as several Authors shew, and carved or ingraven, according to Ovid.

40. But

Prætorship.

SECT. 2.

40. But as for the Prætor, there were two causes of the Creation of this Officer: Emulation and Use. The former was wrought in the Partitions by the Commons, who now had wrested into their own hands the Consulship. The later was brought about by reason that the Consuls were for the most part employed abroad in Wars, and therefore there was a necessity of a Magistrate, whose peculiar work it should be to administer Justice in the Citie. The Prætor was so called a prætor, as write both (a) Varro and (b) Cicero, and agreeably with this Etymology it was once the name of (c) Consuls also, as we shewed before, and of all, or most other Magistrates, Civil or Military. It is probable, that this name, as the other of Dictator, Ædilis, and Duumvir, might come out of Heituria, there being such Officers there of old, as Spartianus seemeth to hint, and otherwise may be gathered. There being but one created at his time, viz. in the 288 year of the Citie, afterward about the 500 year another was added, who administered Justice unto strangers, so that for distinction the one was called Prætor Urbanus, and the other Peregrinus, the former being in Dignity above the other, and his Constitutions called Jus Honorarium, as we shewed before out of Pomponius. This same Author (having shewn, that after the bringing in of this Prætor Peregrinus; the Decemviri for judging of Causes, the Triumviri for coining of Brass, Silver, and Gold, the Triumviri Capitales for keeping of Prisons, and the Quinqueviri for both sides of Tiber for executing what belonged to Magistrates in the evenings (at which time they were not to be abroad) were created by degrees) writeth further, that Sardinia being made a Roman Province, after that Sicily, then Spain, and after Norbonensis; so many Prætors were made as there were Provinces, who partly governed at home, and partly abroad. Lipsius more particularly affirmeth, that, in the 520 year of the Citie, Sardinia and Sicily being both made Provinces, there were two added, who as the former two assisted the Consuls in administering of Justice, so these in the government of the Provinces. When Spain (Hispania in the plural number) was subdued, in the year 557. two more were added. So there were in all six Prætors, whereof two onely remained in the Citie, and the other, as soon as declared, departed into the Provinces, as they fell to them by lot: this order continued till the examinations called Quæstiones Perpetuæ were appointed, at which time the Senate resolved that all the Prætors for the year of their Office should continue in the Citie, and judge some controversies, either publick or private.

41. Pomponius proceedeth, saying, that Cornelius Sulla appointed other publick Examinations or Inquisitions: As, for example, De falso, De Parricidio, and de Sicariis, for which he added four Prætors more; but Lipsius saith he is mistaken in the number, proving out of Cicero that he made but two. C. Julius Caesar appointed other two, as also two Ædiles called Cereales, and afterward 16 Prætors, as appeareth from Dio, who also rethreth the Triumviri with greater liberty to have made 64. Augustus filled up the number to 16. saith Pomponius, though first Lipsius will have him to have confined the number to 12. Claudius added two, who where to judge onely concerning Fidei Commissa, as the Law term is. Titus took one from the number: but Nerva restored and appointed him to hear and determine Causes betwixt the Exchequer and private persons. Another was appointed by M. Antonius Philosophus, called Prætor Tutelaris. So, in all there were 18. till, as the Empire decreased, they decreased also in number, and at length were reduced to that of three by a Law of Valentinian and Marcian. As for the Office of Prætors, the Prætor Urbanus, who was also called Præfectus Urbi (though the Præfectus was afterward onely chosen for the Latine Feria) in the absence of the Consuls executed their Office in the Senate and Comitia. But three things especially belonged to them: Games, Sacrifices, and Judicature. The former onely continued to them in a manner when the Empire decayed. Their Judicature was either in publick or private matters. Private causes concerning memum and numm, two onely handled, viz. the Urbanus and Peregrinus; Publick or Criminal matters were managed by all the SECT. 2. rest, who yet had their several and distinct Crimes, one or two, which they judged; and yet sometimes in their Provinces they managed Civil matters also. They had the same Ornaments and Ensigns of power as the Consuls; onely but six Lists apiece, whereas the other had twelve. In respect of their power and honour, as also because they were created by the same Auspicia, Livy calleth them the Collegues of Consuls.

The many alterations in the Roman Government.

42. The first Consul out of the body of the Commons was L. Sextius, by Liv. Lib. 7. whose Law the privilege was obtained; the first Praetor Sp. Furius, the son of Camillus, and the first Ediles Curules were Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. To Sextius was given as Collegue from amongst the Patritians L. Aemilius Mamercus, and so the Consuls again returned after 23 years, these being the 88 pair as they are found in Livy, and the Tribunes Military were for ever laid aside after 48 courses of that Office, and fifteen changes from the Consulship to it, and from it to the Consulship. Besides these changes of Government in Rome, there were the two Grand ones from Kings to Consuls, and from Consuls to the Decemviri; and to this time from the first of these alterations had intervened 20 Dictatorships, besides the several Interregnums. The first Interregnum was extraordinary, being betwixt the reigns of Romulus and Numa, when the Senate governed for the space of a year: the other were ordinary, and continued but for five dayes under particular men, at the end whereof another was Elected, and called Interrex, having for that time the power of Consuls. All these changes of Government, except the Interregnums betwixt the reigns of the Kings (whereof none but one is considerable) hapned to the Commonwealth of Rome within the space of 134 years, scarce so many having compleatly passed from the banishment of Tarquinius, to this alteration in the Consulship. It is not in vain to have made these observations, that the Reader may plainly see the ridiculous ficklenesse, weaknesse, and danger of the Roman Government after that it came to be Antimonarchical.

Camillus with many others dieth of the plague.

M. Curtius.

43. In the beginning of the year, news came of the Galls their meeting together, who had before been dispersed through Apulia, and of the intended revolt of the Hernici; but all preparations were deferred by the Senate, because it troubled them that any thing should be done by a Plebeian Consul, and there was a great silence with a general intermission of businesse as in some great Vacation. Onely the Tribunes were not silent, because that for one Plebeian Consul the Nobility had got three Patritian Magistrates, who sat as Consuls in their Curule Chairs, and their Prætexta: especially were they concerned about the Praetor, who administered Justice, was a Collegue of the Consuls, and created by the same Auspicia. Modesty therefore suffered not the Fathers to create both the Ediles Curules out of their own body; so that it was agreed first that every other year they should be chosen out of the Commons; but afterwards they were Elected promiscuously. The year following fell a grievous plague upon the Citty, which took away, besides great multitudes of the common sort, One Censor, one Edilis Curulis, and three Tribunes: And who was more than all, Camillus himself now died, having born the Office of Consul more than once, been five times Dictator, having Triumph four, and done such things as he deservedly was written the second founder of Rome. The plague raging both in this and the following year, gave place to no means that were used, so that all mens minds being superstitiously bent, the Stage-plays were brought up to appease their impure gods. The Actors were sent for out of Hebruria, in the language of which Countrey Hister signifying a Player, thence was derived the Roman word Histrion: these plays were very barbarous and antick at the first. Two years after this the ground cleaving asunder in the Forum, M. Curtius is said to have rode into the hole, and so being swallowed up, purchased conquest for his Countrey, according to the Declaration of their gods. After this there was action abroad with the Hernici and the Galls. One of these provoking any one Roman to a single Combat, T. Manlius accepted of the challenge, and killing his Enemy took took a Torques or chain from his neck, whence he and his posterity obtained the Sirname of Torquatus. In this fight the Galls had the worst, so also three years after, and eight years after that, when M. Valerius a young man, and Tribune of the Soldiers, fighting with another Gall, as Manlius did, had the same successe. As he was fighting a Crow came, and sitting upon his head, with beak and wings assisted him in his combat, whence he had the Sirname of Corvinus. At this time also were several Victories obtained against the Latines and Hetruscans.

The War
with the Sam-nites.

44. But, (that we may joyn domestick affairs with those of the Camp) after the Commons had enjoyed the Consulship nine years, the Patritians took it from them again, out of disdain that the year before C. Martius Rutilius a Plebeian had been Dictator. Hereat the multitude was so enraged, that at the end of three years more, the Senate was forced to restore the Office, and because Usury was again grown exceeding burthenfome to the poorer sort, they appointed five men to order the payment of debts out of the Treasury. For the following year also one of the Censors was chosen out of the Plebeians. Hitherto were the Wars of the Romans as it were at their gates: now they were removed further off, and henceforth continued longer: For in the 412 year from the founding of the City, and the 46 from it's restauration, began the War with the Samnites, a People of Italy, * descended from the Sabines, from whom also they had their name, or from Sannia or Sannia, which in the Greek tongue signifie Spears; or from the hill Samnium, where, as they came from the Sabines, they seated themselves, according to Festus. They had the Sabines, Peligni, and Aequi on the West, the Picemini and Apuli on the East, on the South the Campanians and Sidicini, and on the North the Marucini, Dauri, and Apuli, as is observable out of History, saith * Joh. Stadius. It was the custome of the Romans by helping others to espouse quarrels. The Samnites having unjustly molested the Sidicini with War, they betook themselves to the Campanians for succour. These being luxurious and effeminate, were easily worsted, and sent to Rome for aid, their Ambassadors imploring it with tears, and giving up themselves and Country into the hands of the Senate and People. The Senate was at first unwilling to use any force, for that the Samnites were their friends in confederacy; but upon the importunate cries and prayers of the Ambassadors, and the scornful denial of the Samnites to abstain from the Territories of Capua and Campania, their request was granted, and the Consuls sent forth, the one to Capua, and the other into Samnium, vvhether the Samnites vvhere overthrown in both places, and many thousands of them slain: For, in Campania, Valerius after a bloody battel became Master of their Camp. In Samnium Cornelius having unvvarily led his Army thither vvhere they lay in vvait for him, P. Decius a Tribune in the Army, possessed himself of an hill above the Enemy, vvho much vvondring thereat, applied themselves thither, and so gave liberty to the Consul to dravv forth his men into a more convenient place. Then brake he through, though besieged, vvhereat the Enemy vvvas so much astonished, that the Consul falling on obtained so great a Victory, that 30000 of the Samnites vvwere slain.

c. 16.

45. This defeat, together with inroades made upon them the next year, drew them to make a peace, the Sidicini being left to their mercy. They desired that the Latines and Campanians might be commanded not to assist the Sidicini; but because the Senate would not deny that these Nations were under their command, and were also afraid to provoke them, so ambiguous an answer was made, as the Samnites being left but dubious, the Latines and the other thought themselves so far disobliged as to rebel. T. Manlius Torquatus now Consul the third time, with Decius Mus his Colleague, was sent to chastize the Latines. Upon dreams which they both had, that one General on the one part, and the Army on the other, belonged to the Di Manes and Tellus mater, they agreed, that in what part the Roman Army should be distressed, he under whose command it was should devore himself, and that strict discipline should be observed, so that all were forbidden to fight without orders. The Army being sorely put to it in Decius his wing, he devoted himself, and rushing into the midst of his Enemies, after great slaughter made, lost his life. L. Manlius the other Consul's Son, passing with his Troop, before the bivouac, near the Camp of the Enemy, was challenged by Geminus Motius Captain of the Tusculans, whom when he had slain and stripped, his Father for a reward caused him to be put to death; whence cruel Commands were wont to be called Manliana Dicta. Of the manner of the Combat * Aulus Gellius, or Agellius is to be consulted. The Latines being overthrown were wholly subdued, and begged Peace; which being given to them, though not with the same conditions to all, Manlius returned, and was met by ancient men onely, the young ones refusing to do him that honour, who ever after both hated and cursed him in reference to his son.

overthrown.

46. After his return, the Antiates and Ardeates made incursions into the Roman Territories. Being by sickness rendered unfit for War, he named L. Papyrius Crassus for Dictator, who appointed L. Papyrius Cursor his Master of Horse-men; but nothing memorable was done. The Consuls for the following year, T. Amilius Mamercus and Q. Publius Philo, overthrew the Latines, who had rebelled because of the grounds taken from them. Publius, by whose conduct and auspicious the Victory was obtained, receiving into amity such Cities as had been worsted, Amilius led the Army against Pedus, which received supplies from several places. Though he had the better in all skirmishes, yet the Town holding out, and he hearing that his Colleague was returned home to his decessed Triumph, he also left the Siege, and departed to demand that honour. The Senate was offended, and denied to permit him the honour, except Pedus was either taken, or surrendered, which caused him out of revenge all the year following to joyn with the Tribunes against the Fathers, his Colleague not opposing it, because a Plebeian. The Senate having a desire to be rid of them, commanded a Dictator to be named, but it belonging to Amilius to name him, he whose were the Fasces for this month, named his Colleague, who appointed Junius Brutus his Master of Horse-men. And his Dictatorship was very grievous to the Nobility, being full of investives against them, and the procurer of three Laws, whereof the first altered the very constitution of the State. This was, that the Plebeiscita should bind all the Quirites, or the whole People, comprising all ranks, and degrees. The second, that such Laws as passed in the Centuriata Comitia, should be proposed by the Fathers before the Suffrage. The third, that one of the Censors at least should be a Plebeian, whereas now it was come to that passe, that both might be such. Thus did the Government of Rome devolve fast to a Democratical temper, the interest of the Patricians being now quite broken by the force of the former Law (which proved as a Lex talionis to them, and as a punishment for their rebellion against their Kings) in the 416 year of the City, after Varro's account, which fell in with the first of Arses King of Persia, and the 23 of Philip King of Macedonia.

The very constitution of the State changed.

All Latium
subdued.

47. In the following year, wherein L. Furius Camillus and C. Manius were Consuls, Pedus was taken by storm, and the Consuls in pursute of the Victory subdued all Latium, for which they triumphed, and had Statues on horseback set up in the Forum; an honour but rare in those dayes. The several People of Latium, had several conditions of Peace set them. To Anonium was sent a new Colony, and the old inhabitants were forbidden the Sea, had all their long-ships taken from them, had leave to enter themselves in the Colony, and were made free of the City. The ships were partly brought into the Roman Arcenal, partly burnt, and with their Rostra or beaks was the Gallery or Pulpit for Orations adorned, which was built in the Forum; whence that Temple was afterwards called Rostra. The year following Minucia a Vestal Nun was buried quick in the Campus Sceleratus, which I believe, saith Livie, had it's name from Incest; for so the fault of incontinency in those women was termed. And in this same year Q. Publius Philo was made the first Prator out of the Commons; the Senate not regarding now what hapned in this kind, because they had been overpowered in things of greatest greatest consequence. Now also a War arose betwixt the Aurunci and Sidicini, whereof the former were constrained by the other to forsake their ancient seat, and depart to Suessa, which was afterwards called Aurunca. The Aurunci had given up themselves to the Romans, who thereupon ordered them relief, but the Consuls deferring it, this fell out in the mean time. But the next year the Sidicini and the Aufones who inhabited Cales were overthrown, and Valerius Corvinus now the fourth time Consul for the following year, and the greatest Roman Captain of this time, took Cales also, where a Colony was placed. In the second year after the taking of Cales, the Census was solemnized, and two Tribes added, Metia and Scaptia, for the newly admitted Citizens: the Acerrani were also made free of the City, without the privilege of Suffrage, by a Law preferred by L. Papirius the Praetor.

48. In the year following, above 170 women were put to death for the art of poysoning, being discovered by a free Slave, whereas heretofore there had been no inquisition made after this crime, which therefore was counted such a prodigie, that a Dictator was made for fixing of a nail, which they had read in their Annals to have been a remedy for the distempers of the State, when the Commons separated from the Patritians. For the two succeeding years a War was managed against the Privernates, who were drawn into it by Vitravius Vallus, a man of principal note amongst the Fundani. In the first year they were overthrown, in the next he was either taken or delivered up, and Privernum either stormed or surrendred, both being affirmed by Writers, of whom Livie is to be consulted: the principal actors were together with Vitravius put to death, and the rest of the Inhabitants made free of the City. The first year of this Warre fell in with the last of Darius Codomannus, the last King of Persia, being the 424 of the City, when L. Papyrius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantius Venox (or Venus) were Consuls.

*A*lexander riding hard after Darius, came a little after he had expired, saw the body, and bewailed his death with tears: he cast his own Garment over him, and sent him to his Mother to be royally interred amongst his Ancestors. His brother Oxyabres he received into the number of his own friends, and maintained him in his former Dignity. Then did he begin to pursue Bessus; but finding that he was fled far before into Bactria, he left off his pursure, and returned to Hecatompolis in Parthia, where his Soldiers being tickled with a rumour that the Macedonians should should have leave to return home, roused him up from his idleness and luxury, to which now he began to give way after the Persian fashion: but they were at length quieted, and persuaded by him to perfect the work thus far carried on in Asia. Leaving then Craterus in this Countrey with some Forces, he marched into Hyrcania which Nabarzanes had seized on, who yielded it up, and himself to him. After this he invaded the Mardi, a neighbouring people, who, not being wont to be thus provoked by any, made resistance with 8000 men, and intercepted Bucephalus his most beloved horse, which, being given him by Demaratus the Corinthian, when unsaddled would suffer none to come on his back, and when adorned, none but the King himself, whom to receive he bowed down. Alexander exceedingly moved with the loss of him, after he had slain, and taken most of these men, cut down all the Trees, and threatened the Nation with utter destruction in case they did not restore the horse, so that for fear they did it, and with him sent their Presents, and asked pardon, by 50 Messengers.

2. Returning back, he received 1500 men which had been sent out of Greece to Darius, with 90 Ambassadors. Over this party he made Captain Andronicus, who brought them to him, and then went on to Zadracarta, the principal Citie of Hyrcania, where he staid fifteen dayes. Hither Thalestris Queen of the Amazons, is said, with 300 women, to have come to have issue by him, which story, though it be delivered for a truth by some, yet is there better ground to suspect it, seeing that neither Ptolomy the son of Lagus, who was then with him, and wrote his Acts, neither any other good Author of those times approved of it: and Alexander himself in his Letters to Antipater, wherein he gave him an account of his affairs, mentioned how the Scythian King offered to him his daughter in marriage, but not a word of this matter. After this, he returned into Parthia, and purposing now to go against Bessus (who in Bactria had taken upon him a royal Robe, and the name and title of Artaxerxes King of Persia) he thence removed into the Countrey of the Arii. Satibarzanes the Governour thereof meeting him at the City Susia, he confirmed him in his place, but after his departure he revolted from him, whereby the King was constrained to march back against him, which he hearing fled with 2000 men towards Bessus; so as Alexander following him some time, but in vain, reduced the Countrey to obedience, and returned to his former expedition. Then came he into the Countrey of the Zarangei, which was governed by one Barsaenes, who having had an hand in the murder of Darius, now fled into India, whence he was afterwards sent, and put to death. Here in this Land of the Zarangei (or Dranga) was a conspiracy against Alexander discovered; first by Dymnus to Nicomachus, who, though he swore secrecy, communicated it to Zeballinus his brother. Zeballinus (or Ceballinus) acquainted with it Philotas the son of Parmenio, who, delaying to tell it to the King, either through heedlesse, or on purpose, thereby procured the destruction of himself and family.

3. For, Ceballinus suspecting him to be in the plot, because of his delay, discovered the matter to Metro a young Nobleman, and Master of the Armory, who acquainting the King therewith, he presently caused them all to be apprehended. Dymnus knowing wherefore he was called, killed himself. Ceballinus cast all the blame upon Philotas, who denied not that he had been told of such a business, but said he revealed it not to the King onely through neglect, and because he esteemed it of no consequence. Being brought to the Rack, he either confessed the thing as it was, or feigned a story, and wrongfully accused himself to escape the extremity of Torment; after which he was put to death. Now was Parmenio his father, a man of 70 years of age, Governour of Media, one who had done especial service for the King, and his father Philip. Alexander, either for that he feared he was privy to the conspiracy, or thought it not safe that he should outlive his son, sent one away with speed, who delivering a counterfeited Letter to him as from Philotas, slew him as he read it. Amongst others that were shot to death for this conspiracy, was Alexander Lyncestes the son-in-law of Antipater, who had conspired the destruction both of Philip and Alexander, and for his treason been kept in durance now three years. This being done, the King proceeded in his Expedition against Bessus.

4. Though the Soldiers condemned Parmenio and his Son while living, yet they pitied them when dead, and conceived great indignation against their Judges. Alexander understanding this, that he might know their several minds, gave out, that he was sending into Macedonia, and whosoever would, might have an opportunity thereby to write to their friends. By their Letters, all which he caus'd to be opened, he knew who were discontented and ready to Mutiny, and all those he gathered into one company, lest they should corrupt the rest, setting over them one Leonidas, an intimate friend of Parmenio. The King in his March came to the Country of the Arimaspi, or Agriaspæ, called also Euergetæ by Cyrus the Great; for that when he went against the Scythians, they furnished him with Provisions in his great necessity. He us'd them very courteously, bestowing upon them Money, and as much Ground as they would ask, which was not much: And here he heard that Saribarzanes, being returned from Bessus, had withdrawn the Arii from obedience. Against him he sent 6000 Greekish Foot and 600 Horse, under the command of Erygius and others, who joyning Battel with him, he pulled down his Helmet, and challenged any one to a single Combat. Erygius accepting of the Challenge, slew him in the place, and then his Soldiers, who had followed him rather by constraint, than out of any good will, yielded themselves. Alexander having staid among the Euergetæ 60 days, passed on, and in his way subdued the Gedrosians, the Drangi and Dragogi, as also Arachosia, where he got that Army into his power of which Parmenio had the command, consisting of 6000 Macedonians, and 200 Gentlemen, besides 5000 other Greeks, and 600 Horse.

5. The next People he passed through were the Paropamisadæ. This being in the Winter-season, his Army suffered extreamly through the coldness of the Climate: Thence he came to the Mountain Caucasus or Paropamisus, (as that part of it was call'd) which he passed in 17 days, and built some Cities about it. Bessus had now in Bactria about 8000 of the Inhabitants up in Arms, who thinking that Alexander would rather turn towards India than come against them, kept with Bessus, till they plainly perceived that the King invaded their Country: Then they all betook them to their own homes, and Bessus with his other followers passed over the River Oxus into the Country of the Sogdians, being still accompanied with Spitamenes and Oxyartes, in whose fidelity he confided. But Alexander invading Bactria, after he had taken divers Cities, had the whole Country yielded to him; after which he passed to the great River Oxus, but in his way was so distressed for water, that his Army languished; and when it came at the River, so many drunk intemperately, that he lost more men thereby than he had formerly done in any Battel. Ere he passed the River, he sent home 900 Macedonians and Thessalians, the former being old and wounded, and the later the remnant of the Volunteers: those he rewarded, and gave thanks to such of the rest that remained as were willing to serve in the Wars yet behind. He passed over the River upon Skins and Bladders joyned together, wanting materials to make a better Bridge, and came to the place where he heard Bessus lay with all his Forces. Bessus was now forsaken by his friends; for Spitamenes conspiring against him with Dataphernes and Catanes, snatched the Diadem from his head, tore Darius his Robe from off his back, and gave notice to Alexander, that if he would send any of his Captains with some Forces they would deliver him up. Alexander sent Ptolomie the son of Lagus, and one of his Guard, who brought him to his presence in an Halter, whence he was delivered to Oxyartes the brother of Darius, to be tormented to death in that place where he had most wickedly slain his Sovereign, his Lord and Master.

He destroyeth Xerxes flying out of Greece, they betray'd the Treasures of Didymaan Apollo the Branchidae, into his hands; and for this, not daring to stay behind, they left Miletus and followed him, who gave them this place, where their Posterity dearly paid for their fault. After this, he marched to the River Tanais, (another than that which severeth Europe from Asia) falling down from the Mountain Caucasus into the Hyrcanian Sea. Here some of his Soldiers going forth to gather forage, were intercepted by the Enemy, which to the number of 20 or 30000 betook himself to an Hill, and thence was beaten down and wasted to 8000, yet with great difficulty, and hazard to the King himself, who received a wound in his thigh. Thence in four days he marched in a Litter to Maracanda, the chief City of Sogdiana, where leaving a Garrison, he over-ran the neighbouring Territories; and shortly came an Ambassage from the Scythians, called Abii, who thereby gave up themselves into his power. But in the mean time the Barbarians of Maracanda slew the Garrison of the Macedonians, being, together with the greatest part of the Sogdians, drawn back by those that took Bessus, who also drew to their party some of the Bactrians and Susians. Alexander sent to suppress them Spitamenes and Catenes, who had delivered up Bessus; but they confirmed them in their Rebellion, and became Leaders in the Revolt, giving out, that the Bactrian Horse was sent for by the King on purpose to be made away.

7. To reduce these Revolters, Alexander presently sent Craterus, who besieged Cyropolis the chief City, so called, because built by Cyrus the Great; and he himself besieged another called Gaza, which he took, and put all of ripeness of age to the sword, for a terror to their Country-men. After this he reduced several other Cities, and then went to the assistance of Craterus against Cyropolis, which was defended by 18000 men. Here he lost many a valiant Soldier, and by a stroke of a stone on his neck was fell'd down senseless; but this increased his natural vigor, so that out of indignation he set furiously on, and presently took the place. Eight thousand of the Inhabitants were slain, and the rest retiring into the Castle, shortly after yielded for want of water; and then one City remaining onely of seven, whither the Barbarians had fled, he reduced that also in a short time. Spitamenes now had shut himself up in Maracanda, where he besieged the Macedonians in the Castle. Against him he sent a Party, and began to build a City upon the River Tanais, which being raised in few days, with a wall six miles in compasse, he called after himself Alexandria. His design was to have a convenient Fortresse for the Invasion of Scythia, which the Scythian King, inhabiting beyond the River, suspecting, sent his brother with a party of Horse to beat away the Macedonian forces, and demolish it. Coming to the narrowest place of the River, they not onely cast over their Darts, but opprobrious speeches, which so incensed Alexander, as though he was extream ill, and for some time had nor been able as much as to speak to his Soldiers, yet he resolved to passe over against them.

8. With admirable industry he got over his men, partly in Boats, and partly upon Bladders, notwithstanding the earnest opposition of the Enemy, whom he put to the Rout, and, though he was very much indispos'd in his own person, pursued them 80 furlongs, then fainting, he commanded his men to follow the chace as long as the day would permit. The want of water in this place was such, that the Army was thereby exceedingly distress'd, and the King himself drinking of some that was corrupt, fell into a Diarrhea. But not long after the Scythians sent to excuse themselves, denying that the War had been undertaken by their general consent, but onely by a certain party that lived upon robbery. Giving themselves up into his hands, he dismiss'd the Ambassadors courteously, and with them the Prisoners he had taken. By this time Spitamenes had cut off the party sent against him, which Alexander understanding, in three days time marched 1500 furlongs to Maracanda, whither he had notice that he was returned; but hearing of the Kings coming, he fled again, and was pursued for some time, but to no purpose. Alexander then dividing his forces, over-ran the Country which had had revolted, and gave command, that all of ripe age should be put to the sword, for a terror to others, by which severity fell 120000 of the Inhabitants of Sogdiana. Leaving Pencolans there with 3000 Foot, he departed to Bactra, (a City so called from the River Bactrus which runneth through it, being otherwise named Zariaspa) where he caused Bessus to be brought to the head of his Army: Here he made his nose and ears to be cut off, and then sent him to Ecbatane to be judged and executed by Sentence of a Council of Medes and Persians. Thus Diodorus relateth the the story; but Plutarch writeth, that by Alexanders command, the boughs of two Trees being first drawn together, and he made fast to them both, they then were suffered to return to their natural site, and he was thereby pulled assunder.

9. Having much encreased his forces by the comming in of fresh supplies, Arrianus. he once more over-ran the Country of the Sogdians, as yet not fully subdued, and the five parts of his Army afterwards met and united at Maracanda, whence he sent Hephestion to lead out Colonies into the Cities of Sogdiana, as Cenus and Artabazus against the Scythians, for to them he heard that Spitamenes was fled, who with a company of Bactrians and Sogdians, and about 800 Horse of the Massagetes, got a Castle near Bactra into his hand; then came against Zariaspa, or Bactra, & by an Ambush cut off many of the Defendants in their Sally out against him. Upon Cenus his approach the Massagetes fled, but he pursued & killed many of them. Alexander having subdued more of the Sogdians returned to Maracanda, whither the King of the Europaean Scythians inhabiting above Rosphorus, sent to him, offering him his daughter in marriage; or if this liked him not, he desired, that the principal Macedonians about him might contract affinity with his Nation; moreover he offered to come in person and receive his commands: After this, Alexander hunted in the Forrest of Bazaria, which had been untouched for four Ages. Herein a Lion coming upon him, Lyfimachus (who afterwards reigned, and had slain a Lion ere this) went about to stave him off; but the King forbade him, and receiving the Beast, slew him at one stroak. Four hundred Beasts more being killed, he feasted his whole Army, and again repaired to Maracanda, where he slew Clytus.

10. In a Feast (to which he had invited him) being heated with Wine, he fell of commending his own acts, and therein soared so high, as to speak scornfully of the things performed by his father Philip. Clytus having also drunk sufficiently was nettled with this, and defending Philip, in his replies plainly reproached Alexander; who therefore ran him through and killed him outright, having a little before designed him to the Government of Sogdiana in the room of Artabazus, who excused himself by his old age; For being the son of Dropis, and brother to Hellanica Alexander's Nurse, he had done good service to both Kings, and was now an old Soldier. Alexander, when he came to himself, considering what he had done, would have made way for following him by his own hands, and when he was hindred by his friends from violent attempts, would have done it by fasting four days. On the fifth, his attendants brake into his Tent, and comforting him, caused him to eat. The Macedonians judged Clytus rightfully put to death, and decreed he should not be buried; but he commanded this last office to be performed to him. Leaving a good Guard with Cenus to defend Sogdiana, and take Spitamenes if he should come that way in Winter, he marched to Xenippa, where, after a sharp Encounter, he received the Bactrian Exiles, who having revolted had betaken themselves to that place, lying upon the confines of Scythia. In the Spring following, being the 10th. year of his Reign, he set upon a Fort in Sogdiana, situate upon a Rock, so strong by Nature through its excessive height, that the Defendants counted it invincible, (many having fled thither out of the Country) and upon his summons, Arimazes the Governor, who held it with thirty thousand armed men, demanded if the Macedonians could flie? But he proposed large rewards to such as would first mount it, whereby certain young men being animated, made a shift to climb and help one another up, and being got to the top, the besieged were amazed, and thinking their number greater than it was, yielded the place. In this Fort amongst other was Oxyartes the Satrapa or Governour (who had revolted from Alexander) with his wife and children. Of his daughter Roxane the King was so enamoured, as he shortly after married her, and perswaded the great ones about him to take them wives out of that place.

11. Hethence departed into Naura (or Paratata) where he understood that many Barbarians had possessed themselves of another Fortresse, situate as the former, and fortified moreover with an exceeding deep ditch. This yielded to him through the perswasion of Oxyartes, and then with his Horse he cleared the Country of the revolters. About the same time Spitamenes coming into Sogdiana was encountred by Cannus, who drew from him the naturals of the place, and the Bactrians, so that he had onely left him a Company of Massagetes. Those flying with him into the Wildernesse, when they heard that Alexander pursued them, cut off their Captains head and sent it to the King, though some write, that his own wife cut it off, and presented it to Alexander, who detesting the treason, commanded her to depart his Camp. After this the Daba who had revolted by the procurement of Dataphernes, delivered him up, and returned to obedience, and Craterus with Polyperchon having finished the War against the revolters in a short time, they all met at Bactra. Alexander was now so puffed up, as to require divine honours from his followers; which Callisthenes the Philosopher stiffly refusing to give him, felt the effect of his ambition.

12. It hapned that the King hunting on a time, one Hermolaus a Gentleman of his guard, and Scholar to Callisthenes, killed a wild Boar, which Alexander himself intended to have struck, for which he was beaten by his Command. The young man bearing the disgrace most heavily, as also Sostratus his inward friend, they conspired with others of the Guard to kill the King, which to perform, they agreed that one night they would all watch together. It was long ere they could so change their courses as to bring this about, but at length having done it, it chanced that the King fate up drinking all that night, so then the matter being frustrated, was revealed by one of them, and they were all stoned to death. Now whether any of them accused Callisthenes, as some reported, or Alexander did it himself, he was made away, though as to the manner of his death, they who were present themselves agreed not in their relation. Callisthenes was the Scholar of Aristotle, and the son of his Cousin germane, of so severe a temper, that he could not order himself according to his Master's directions, who when he sent him to Alexander, advised him, Either very pleasantly or very rarely to converse with him, that so he might be either more acceptable for his discourse, or safe by his silence. Aristotle also himself seemeth to have been threatned in a letter written by the King to Antipater in Macedonia.

13. Alexander had ere this time resolved to make War upon India, and bound his Conquests with the East. That he might not leave any impediment at his back, he commanded 30000 men to be raised out of the Provinces, that he might have them both as Soldiers and Hostages. Out of a conceit of the glory of the Expedition, he adorned the shields of his Soldiers with silver plates, their Horses with golden bridels, and their Armour was set out with gold and silver. Leaving then Amyntas in Bactriana with 3500 Horse, and 10000 Foot, he set forwards in the Spring, leading an Army of 120000 men. In ten dayes he passed over Caucasus and came to Alexandria, which he had caused to be built in the Country of the Parapomisade, whence he marched to the River Cophenes, and sent to Taxiles to meet him, who came with such presents as India afforded. Dividing now his Army, with one part of it he sent Hephestion and Perdiccas another way, with command, that when they came at the River Indus, they should provide things necessary for passing over it. He with the other invaded the Aspians, Thyreans, and Arasacans; and crossing the River Choë, the first City he came at opposed him. He himself and Ptolomy the son of Lagus were wounded in the storm, but he took the place, and putting all the Inhabitants to the sword, burnt it. In the Country of the Aspians he got a booty of 40000 men, men, and 230000 head of cattel, whence marching toward the Grurians, Curtius, with difficulty he passed over the River Grurans. Invading the Affacenians Justin lib. 12. he took the City Massaga, the King whereof being lately dead, his mother Cleophs reigned, and by the prostitution of her body to Alexander, procured a confirmation in the Kingdom.

14. After this, he took Bazira, and Nora was forsaken by it's defendants, who berook themselves to a strong rock called Aornos. This place was exceedingly fenced by it's wonderful height, and the River Indus which ran by one side of it; as also by deep pits and craggie rocks, by reason whereof the report went, that Hercules himself attempted, but could not take it. The story of Hercules inflamed the King with a desire to master it, who having first taken several other places, brought his forces, and by means of an old man who shewed him the onely passage, closely besieged it. By incredible diligence he filled up the ditches, so as he could bring his men to fight, but yet he was not able to storm the Rock, and therefore resolved to starve them out, leaving a way for their escape; and they seeing his resolution, took the advantage, but many were slain in the persute. Taking order then for the full clearing of the Country, he passed on to the River Indus, near to which he hunted Elephants, and continuing in the plains thirty dayes for the refreshment of his Army, sacrificed to his gods, and celebrated games and exercises. Now Hephaestion and Perdiccas had finished all things necessary for passing the River; and not of this onely, but others also with one (almost) and the same labour. For, divers Rivers runing through India (as besides Cophenes, Coer, and Indus; Hydaspes, Acesines, Hyarous, Hyparus, and Ganges;) they so framed the boats, as they might easily be taken in pieces, and being conveyed in carriages, be as easily, upon occasion, again joyned together.

15. In the eleventh year of his reign, and the fourth after the death of Darius, in the Spring, Alexander passed over the River Indus, and was received above his expectations. For, Ompis, or Mophis, King of the Country, had perswaded his Father when yet living to submit himself, and now having succeeded in the Kingdom met him in the way, and gave it up into his hands, who restored it to him, and permitted him to assume the name of Taxiles, common to all Kings of that Country, of what family soever. Coming to Taxila the Metropolis, he was sumptuously entertained, and receiving great gifts, gave also very liberally, to the disdain of those about him, of whom Meleager in his cups congratulated with him, that at length in India he had found a man worthy to receive from him in way of free gift 1000 Talents. Alexander remembring how he had repented the killing of Clytus, contained himself, but not impertinently answered him, that Envious men are nothing else than their own torment: The next day Abisarus King of the Indians inhabiting the mountains, and who together with Porus had wars with Taxiles, by Ambassadors gave up himself and Kingdom. Alexander leaving a Garrison in Taxila, marched towards the River Hydaspes, beyond which reigned Porus: Thinking by the terror of his name to affright this Prince into obedience, he sent to him beforehand, willing him to pay tribute, and meet him on the frontiers of his Kingdom, to which he answered, that he would do the later onely, and that armed. Near unto Porus reigned another of his name, and his Nephew, who out of hatred to him, sent Ambassadors, and gave up all he had into the hands of Alexander.

16. The boats formerly spoken of being conveyed from Indus to the River Hydaspes, Alexander with Taxiles, several other great persons of the Country, and 5000 Indians more came thither: Barsaentes the Governour of the Dranga being presented to him in his way, whom he afterwards put to death for his treason towards Darius. On the opposite bank of the River lay Porus with an Army very great indeed, though the dissention of Writers about the numbers almost equalize the bignesse of it. He had his Elephants ready to affright the Horses, and keep the Army from landing, which Alexander perceiving, made as if he intended to passe the River at the place over

And Hydaspes. over against which Porus stood, leaving some there to make a noise, as if he still remained, and in a dark and rainy night got into a little woody Island, which lay lower down the River, whence in the morning, though with much difficulty (through the rising of the water by abundance of rain) recovered the further bank, where he defeated a Party led by Porus his Son, who by some is said in this engagement to have lost his life. Porus, understanding this, drew down his battel in the form of a City, whereof the Elephants, being many in number, were as walls. They grievously distressed the Macedonians for some time, and the Indians continually retired to them as a bulwark; but at length being driven up close together, they made great slaughter of the Indians themselves, whom Alexander also encompassing with his men did great execution upon them. Porus himself, a person terrible to encounter (his height, as is said, being five cubits, and his breadth such as his Armour extended it to the proportion of two lusty men) fought himself most valiantly, and encountering Alexander hand to hand, slew his Horse under him, so that he was saved meerly by the interposition of his Guard, many of his men having fallen at his side.

17. Porus gave not over as long as he had any to stand to him; when all had left him, he retreated on his Elephant most stately to behold. As many of the Indians were slain in the chace as had been in the battel, by reason that Craterus and others, who had been left behind, came over afresh to the pursuit. Alexander having a great desire to save their King, out of respect to his great valour, sent after him Taxiles the Indian, whom perceiving to come towards him, he ran at him with his lance as his ancient Enemy. But others being still sent, and amongst the rest Meroes an Indian, Porus hearing his voice, and being sore distressed by thirst, stood still, and then alighted from his Elephant. Alexander coming on spake to him first, and asked him what the thing was which he desired, to whom he answered, that he might be used like a King. The other replied, that this should be done for his own sake, and bad him ask for his own commodity what he pleased, to which he made answer, that all things were contained in his former demand. With this the Conquerour was so well pleased, that he received him into the number of his friends, and restored to him his Kingdom, enlarged with new Territories. Alexander hoping that by his late Victory all India was laid open to him, intended to sail into the Ocean; and perceiving there was in this place much wood, he caused such a quantity to be cut down, as might suffice for the building of ships. He gave order also for the building of two Cities: one in the place where the battel was fought, which he called Nice, and another on the other side of the River, named after his Horse Bucephalus, who here died, being about thirty years old.

18. Leaving Craterus to perfect these Cities upon the River Hydaspes, he marched into the Country adjoining to that of Porus, which having subdued he bestowed on him, and also the Kingdom of the younger Porus, who out of fear of his Uncle had now fled, with as many as he could draw after him to the Gangaride. After this he subdued several Nations beyond the River Hydraotes, and invaded the Cuthians, who together with the Ocydrace and Malli opposed him, of whom in the siege and storming of the City Sangala perished 17000, and about 70000 were taken Captives. These Cuthians had a Custome, that when any man died, his wife was to be buried with him, to which the wickedness of one woman that poisoned her husband gave occasion. The City Sangala was destroyed, and their Lands given to certain Indians, who lived in the form of a Commonwealth, and had formerly given themselves up into the hands of the Conquerour. This severity made other Cities without any resistance surrender themselves. Then advanced he into the Kingdom of Sopithes, who meeting him with his two Sons, with a Rod of Gold adorned with precious Stones, delivered up into his hands himself, his children, Kingdom, and all he had. Having received back his Kingdom, he magnificently entertained Alexander and his whole Army. Amongst several other presents, he gave him 150 Dogs begotten of

19. Ere Alexander stirred from this place, Hephaestion returned to him from his expedition, (having subdued India in a great compasse that way he was sent) whom he received with honor suitable to his worth. Afterward he departed into the Kingdom of Phagens (or Phagelus) who also submitted himself, and receiving the Conqueror, entertained him very magnificently. After two days he marched toward the River Hyphasis (or Hyparis) taking Phagens and Porus along with him. At the River side he enquired of Phagens what Countries lay beyond it? He answered, That there was a vast Wildernesse of 11 or 12 days journey, and next to that ran the River Ganges, beyond which inhabited, besides others, the Gangarida, over whom reigned Aggrammes (or Xandrames) provided of 20000 Horse, 200000 Foot, above 2000 Chariots, and about 4000 Elephants. These things seeming incredible to the Macedonians, he asked Porus of the truth of them, who confirmed what the other had said as to the strength of that King, but withall added, That being by a Barber begotten on the Queen, who had killed her Husband that he might reign, he was for this cause despised by his People. Alexander now considered the labors and perils undergone by his Soldiers, who from the beginning of his reign had followed him eight years; withall, how of late for 70 days together they had been sorely distressed by Rain, Thunder, and Lightning; that he might oblige them, he gave them the plunder of the enemies Country, being very rich, and in their absence gratified their wives and children. Then after their return to the Camp, with a premeditated Oration he laboured to perswade them to undertake the War with him against the Gandarida, but in vain.

20. For, Cenus the son of Polycrates, answered him in such a manner, as he might easily perceive how contrary the affections of the Soldiers were to the Expedition. After which, as Arrianus writeth, he kept himself close in his Pavillion for three days, and would admit none of his friends to his presence. Then sending for his Officers, he told them, That seeing the minds of his men were averse from proceeding any further, he intended to return home; yet, ere this, he had sacrificed for passing over the River, but finding that the Intrals of the Beast were not lucky, he settled himself in a purpose to retreat. He caused twelve large Altars of fifty cubits heighth, like to some warlike Towers, to be erected near the River, whereon he sacrificed according to the custom of his Country, and he celebrated Games in the grounds adjoining. After this he caused to be made a Ditch 15 foot broad and 10 foot deep, whereon, of the earth, he raised a considerable Wall, making the compasse of his Camp seem three fold larger than indeed it was. He commanded the Foot, that each one in his Tent should get two Bedsteads of five cubits apiece, and the Horsemen to make theirs with the Mangers of their Horses as big again as they were wont to be. He caused Arms, Bridles, and other things to be framed after the same proportion, to amuse posterity with a false appearance of a Gigantick proportion of his own person and his followers.

He retreated.

21. He returned the same way he came, settling the Government of the Provinces in his passage, till he arrived at the River Hydaspes. Ever since his departure hence, the weather had been rainy, which spoiled much of his new City Bucephalea; but he caused it to be repaired; and here died Cenus his trusty and faithful friend, but one who had grieved him by his Answer to his late Oration. Down this River Hydaspes he resolved, according to his former purpose, to sail into the Southern Ocean, and therefore providing for such places as he should leave, he reconciled Porus and Taxiles by affinity contracted betwixt them, and made the former King, not of that Country only lying betwixt Acesines and Hydaspes, which formerly he had given to him, but also of such free Nations, as lying betwixt Acesines and Hyphasis he had lately subdued. Having increased his Army by a new supply sent him out of the West, he divided it into three parts, whereof two he committed to Craerus and Hephestion, commanding them to march on either side the River, down which he sailed with the third in a Fleet of 1000 Vessels. Loosing from shoar about the beginning of November, he first landed upon the coasts of the Sibari, who being reported to be descended of thole Greeks that with Hercules attempted the storming of the Rock Aornos, claimed kindred of him, and submitted themselves. Making excursions into the neighbour Countries, he destroyed many thousands of the Inhabitants that would not yield; and then returning aboard, halted against the Oxydrace and Malli, who, as he heard, had carried their wives into their strong Towns, and intended resistance.

22. Comming down thither where Hydaspes and Acesines meet, the Chinel being narrow, and the Stream exceeding great, two of his tallest Ships miscarried, and he himself missed narrowly of being Shipwrack'd: Here his Soldiers also began to murmur that they should begin a new War, but he quieted them easily by a Speech. The Indians having gathered together 80000 Foot and 10000 Horse, shewed themselves near the River, having chosen their General out of the Oxydrace, who made many fires, and used other vain attempts to affright the Macedonians; yet as soon as these began to Arm, either out of fear, or by reason of dissention amongst themselves, away they fled to the craggy Mountains. Alexander then marched with all speed, through a large, drie, and barren Country, against the Malli, to defeat them ere they should joyn with the other; and coming unexpectedly upon them, many he slew, both in the Country, and those strong places which he stormed. After this he marched to the River Hydraotes, where he killed many of them, and thence to a City of the Brachmans, whither he heard that some of them had fled: This he took, with the Castle into which they retired, as also the chiefest City of the Malli, whence they fled beyond the River Hydraotes, on the bank whereof they drew up into a Battalia. He followed, and with his Horse skirmished a little, not thinking it fit to engage with them in Battel, being 50000 in number, till the Foot came up. Then they betook themselves to the next fortifi'd Town, where by his hardinesse he ran into extreme danger.

23. Demophon his Priest acquainted him, how that by his art great danger was portented to his person, and therefore he advised him, either to omit, or at least to defer the siege. But he rebuked the man, because hereby he weakened the valor of his Soldiers, and dividing them into two parts, set upon the Town, whereat the Defendants left it and fled into the Castle. The King with those about him broke open a Gate, and entred first; Then he commanded Ladders to be set to the Castle wall, which being but slowly performed, he took one from a Macedonian, and rearing it mounted himself: after him went up Peucestes, who bore usually his Shield before him, (which being taken out of the Temple of Pallas at Ilium, he would always have so carried) and after him Leonatus by the same Ladder, and one Abreas by another. The Argyraspides also, (or those who used the silvered Shields) solicitous for the Kings safety, mounting hastily broke the Ladders, and thereby hindred others as well as themselves. The King upon the Wall was laid at with Darts on every side, and when his left arm was wearied with holding his Target, his friends would have had him leap down again unto them, who were ready to receive him in their arms. But by an unparallel'd attempt he leaped down on the other side into the Fort, where if he had not by good chance light upon his feet, he might presently have been slain or taken. But casting himself to fall upon them, and seeing a Tree hurd by, he applied himself to it, so as he had it on his right hand, and the wall on his left.

tream danger.

24. None of his enemies were so hardy as to come near him, onely they plied it with Darts afar off, whereof the greatest part being kept off by the boughes and leaves of the Tree, the rest he received on his Target. But the Indians drawing neerer, threw showers of Darts upon him, and with stones broke his Helmet. Being spent, and not longer able to stand, he fell upon his knees, whereupon despising him they came to him; and yet he so received them them with his sword, as two fell down dead before him, and after this he killed their General who boldly set upon him; then none would venture to approach nearer, but plied it with Darts afar off. By this time those three that mounted the wall after him were got down, and fought stoutly for him, of whom Abreas was shot in the face and fell; the King also in the breast with an Arrow, which piercing through his Armor near his Pap, some affirmed, that blood and breath issued together out of the wound, and he swooned, being covered by Peucestes with his shield. Now the Macedonians brake into the Castle, and put all to the sword, sparing neither Sex nor Age. They carried their King out on a Target, nor knowing whether he was alive or dead; but shortly after he came to himself, and his wound was dressed, (some say by Critobulus the Physician, others by Perdiccas) out of which much blood issuing, he swooned again, and that very thing stanch'd the bleeding. While he lay'd a little in this place, a report flew to the Army then lying with the Fleet at the meeting of the two Rivers Hydraotes and Acesines, that he was dead, and it gained such belief, that the Letters he sent were taken but as counterfeit. Therefore he hast'd to the Camp, where he presented himself to the view of them all there.

25. Having escaped this great danger amongst the Malli, (for amongst them it was, and not amongst the Oxydraca as some have mistaken.) and returned to his Fleet, he sail'd down the River, and on the fourth day came to a place forsaken of its Inhabitants, but convenient for to make some stay in. Here he rested many days for the better curing of his wounds, and employed his men this while in building of ships. Hither the Malli and Oxydraca sent to ask pardon, and submit themselves. After which he sail'd further, and came to the confluence of Hydraotes and Acesines, the former whereof loseth it self in the later. Proceeding further, he came through Acesines into Indus, subduing a certain People in his way who lived in a Free State; and here he made Philip Governor of the Malli and Oxydraca, with all the Country down to this place, wherein he also gave order for a City to be built. Following on his voyage, he arrived at the Country of the Sanbesta, (or Sabraca) who living also in a popular way of Government, were very populous and strong, and hearing of his coming had got together 60000 Foot, and near 8000 Horse, but upon a sight of his Fleet they let fall their courage, and sent fifty of their principal men to ask peace. From this place on the fourth day he came to the seat of the Sogda, who also yielded themselves; and here by the River Indus he caused to be built another Alexandria, which he furnished with convenient Havens and Arsenals. Thence he sail'd down with such expedition into the Country of Musicanus, that he was upon him ere he heard of his coming; therefore the Indian met him with such gifts as his Country afforded, and gave up himself with all he had into his hands, acknowledging his fault that he had no sooner done it.

26. Having here commanded Tergestes, whom he had set over the Paropamisada, to be put to death, for abusing that People by a covetous and tyrannical Government, he caused a Fort to be rais'd in the chief City of Musicanus, wherein he left a Garrison, because the place seem'd very convenient for keeping the neighbouring Nations in obedience. Leaving Musicanus in his former power, though not authority, he sail'd down to the Prasti, another Indian Nation, over which ruled Oxycanus. Here he storm'd two Cities, in one whereof their King being retired into the Castle, sent to him to beg pardon, but too late; for ere the Messengers could come at Alexander, two Towers fell down, which made way for the Macedonians, who entring, killed Oxycanus amongst the rest; which being reported to the other Cities, they all yielded themselves. After this he came into the borders of the Brachmans, whose King Sabus (or Sambus) caused the Gates of his principal City to be opened, but afterwards revolted at the instigation of his Subjects, some of whom paid dearly for it in a certain City wherein they were taken, Sabus himself with thirty Elephants escaping. Some of them were upon pain of death to answer to certain hard Questions, which having done, they were dismissed with rewards, as Plutarch informeth us. But ere this, Musicanus had revolted, against whom Pithon was sent, who overpowering him took him prisoner. He was Crucified in his own Countrey by Alexander's Command, with all such Brachmans as had drawn him to revolt.

27. Returning to the River Indus, in the fourth day he came to a Citie of the Brachmans, called Hamatelia, the inhabitants whereof hearing that he was invincible, poisoned the heads, of their Arrows, trusting to their own valour, and the natural strength of the place. He sent a party, which by approaching their Walls, and then retreating, drew them forth, by which stratagem, of 3000 he took 1000. and killed 600. Many of his own men died, and those who survived were brought into extream danger, amongst whom was Ptolomy the son of Lagus. He being almost ready to die, the story goeth, that Alexander in a Dream had an Herb shewed to him, which drunk, and outwardly applied, helped against the poyson; the truth being, that the virtue of this plant was by some declared to him, and this story feigned out of flattery. For all this, the besieged yielding, had indemnity granted to them, and then came Maris King of the Island Pattalena, which he gave up into the Conquerours power. Alexander restored, and sent him back, commanding him to provide all necessaries for his Army; but sailing down thither he found that he had left the Citie, and retired to the Mountains, with all his subjects, both of Town and Countrey. Alexander sent some horse-men to perswade them to return, which accordingly diverse did. Then did he order Hephestion to build a Fort in the Citie, and sent a party to dig Wells in that Coast of the Countrey which wanted water. The Enemy fell upon these men out of the Wildernesse, and killed many of them, which forced the King to send others for a supply. Now had he sayled almost 10 moneths when he came to Pattalena.

28. At this Island the River Indus parteth into two branches, whereof both retained the name as far as the Sea it self. Alexander taking the right hand sayled down that Channel, his Army being led according to the custom, near the Rivers side. The next day arose such a Tempest, as exceedingly distressed the Fleet, some ships being driven so far as scarcely could they be recovered; whereupon for some time the King stayed here at a certain Island, and sent men on shore to take up some Natives to be their Guides. Coming lower, where the Chinel was very broad, another Tempest forced them into a certain Creek, where as great a fear seized on them, and so much the greater, because they were unacquainted with the occasion of it. It hapned, that the Tide being exceeding high (as it is at this day at Cambaia, where the River Indus falls into the Sea) all the grounds near the River were overflown, except certain Hills, which appearing like so many Islands to them, the Macedonians swam, and left their Boats. When the water fell again, the Vessels were left on the drie ground, some being overwhelmed, and others turned upon their sides. But the River according to the course of the Tide overflowing again at the due time, such Vessels as stuck fast in the Mud were lifted up unhurt, but those that the water found otherwise placed, were either dashed against one another, or miscarried after some other fashion.

29. Repairing his Navy, as he could, he sent before two Boats to make discovery of another Island below, by the Indians called Cikura, but by him Scillastus, near which he must needs sayl down into the Ocean. Hearing that it was large, and very Commodious to harbour in, he gave order for the Fleet to go thither, but he himself proceeded further, to search whether there was easie passage at the River's fall for the whole Navy into the Sea. Having passed some 200 furlongs, he discovered another Island, and then returned to the Fleet, where having sacrificed to some gods, he went back, and performed this service to others after another fashion, saying, he was commanded so to do by the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon. Sailing out of Indus into the Ocean, he sacrificed Bulls to Neptune, and after the burning of Incense cast out a Golden Vial with Golden Cups into the Sea, praying for a prosperous voyage to his Navy, (which he intended under command of Nearchus his Admiral should sayl through the Ocean into the Persian Gulf, and so up Euphrates and Tigris) and that no mortal after him might passe the bounds of his expedition. Then returned he up the River to Pattala, whither he found Pithon come with the Forces, purposing to leave half the Fleet at the Citie (to this day called Pattala in Cambaya) he commanded Hephestion there to make an Haven, and provision for shipping. He himself sayled down the stream on the left hand, which first lead him to a Lake, where he left Leonnatus with most of the Soldiers, and with 30 ships passed through this Mouth of Indus into the Ocean.

30. His design was to see whether the Fleet might not best sayl this way into the Sea; and he satisfied himself that it might. Then did he Travel up the shore, and caused Wells to be digged thereon to furnish the Navy with water. Returning then to Pattala, he sent part of his Army to dig more, and going to the Lake, he caused Havens to be made, and provision for shipping: he also left there a Garrison with necessaries for 8 moneths. At this time the Etesian vvinds in this Countrey blowing from the South (though in other places from other quarters) hindred Navigation, wherefore he was constrained to leave Nearchus at Pattala with the Fleet till they should cease. He journeyed through the Countrey of the Arabita (or Arbita) to the River Arabius (or Arbis) digging pits on the shore for the use of the Fleet in its passage by these Coasts. Nearchus and his followers were two moneths after Alexander's departure driven out by the Inhabitants of Patalena, and compelled to begin their Voyage ere the season of the year well served. Coming to the mouth of the River, they were forced to cut through a Rock (for some way) such a Ditch as by the help of the Tide might convey their ships safe into the Ocean. The Arabita hearing of Alexander's approach, fled into the Mountains, so that without opposition he passed over the River Arabius, and came into the Countrey of the Orita, of whom killing some, and taking others, (because they had not submitted themselves) he thence marched into the Borders of the Gedrosians, with whom the Orita had joyned, but upon his approach sent and begged peace, which he granted, on condition that they would depart to their dwellings. He set over them Apelophon with whom he left Leonnatus one of the keepers of his body, with a party of horse and foot to expect the coming of the Fleet, and in the mean while to build a new Citie, and settle the affairs of the Countrey.

31. In his passage through the Countrey of the Gedrosians, greater losse and damage hapned to him than in all his expedition through Asia besides; because, what for want of water, by excesse of heat, ill diet and hunger, he carried not out the fourth part of those forces he brought into India. Yet was not this losse sustained through ignorance; for some tell us that he knew of the danger very well; but hearing that this Countrey had been formerly invaded both by Semiramis and Cyrus, whereof the former was forced to fly but with 30 Attendants, and the later with 7. he had an itching desire to passe through it, and in the glory of his adventure to excell them. After incredible trouble undergone, for 60 dayes, he came to Pura the chief Citie, where (as it was time) he refreshed his Army, and thence marched towards the Borders of Caramania. Hither news came that Philip, Governour of the Oxydraca, and of other Indians, vvaskilled by the Mercenary Soldiers; but that his death vvwas revenged upon them by the Macedonians; vvhereupon he vvrote to Taxiles and Eudemus to take care of the Countrey, till such time as he could send one to succeed Philip. Coming into Caramania not far from Persia, he animadverted upon the Governour, as upon Cleander and Sitalces, vvho being sent to kill Parmenio, had after his death committed grievous outrages upon the people in those parts. He also punished Ozines and Zariaspes, who had solicited the Persians to revolt, and Heracon, who had rifled the Temple at Susa: here also he made Pucestes one of the keepers of his body, they being before this seven in number. In the mean time Nearchus having passed the borders of the Arabii, Orita, Gedrosians, Ichthyophagi, came into the Persian Gulf, and arrived at Armusia (now called Ormuz) where understanding that his Master was but distant five dayes journey, he went to him, and having made a report of his Voyage, returned presently to the Fleet, with order to passe up to the mouth of Emphrates, and thence row unto Babylon.

32. It beng now very good sailing, Alexander sent Hephestion by Sea into Persia, with the greatest part of his Army, and shortly after departed himself and came by Land to Pasargada, where he bestowed money on the women, according to the custome of the Persian Kings when they came thither. Here he much lamented the violation of Cyrus his Sepulchre, which since his former being here, had been robbed of all it's riches, except a Litter, and a golden Urn wherein was the body; and this also was cut and mangled, the cover being taken away, and the body cast out. He commanded the Urn to be repaired as well as might be, and the reliques of Cyrus being therein deposited, the dore-place to be walled up. From Pasargada, now called Che'quera, he came to Persepolis, the seat of the Persian Kings, where great complaints being made against Orxines (who being descended from Cyrus and the seven Conspirators, had contained the Persians in obedience after the death of the Governour Phraortes) he was crucified through the malice of Bagoas the Eunuch, Alexander's minion, who hated him, upon no other account, than for that bestowing great gifts upon the Courtiers at their return, he neglected him. Phradates also, who had been Governour of the Mardi, Hyracians, and Tapyri, was here put to death, for affecting Kingly power. But, Peucestes who protected the King among the Malli, and as a reward had been received amongst the Keepers of his body, was now further made Governour of Persia, and thereupon fully conformed himself to the fashions of the Country.

33. Alexander had a great desire to sail through Euphrates and Tigris into the Persian Gulf, to compass about Arabia and Africk, and so to passe through the Straights leading into the Mediterranean (now called the Straights of Gibraltar) for which purpose he commanded wood to be cut down in Libanus, to be caried to Thapsacus in Syria, and being made into ships, thence to bee conveyed to Babylon. Not long after, Nearchus brought the fleet up Pasitigris to a bridge newly made for the passing over of the Land-army, where for the meeting of both the Armies, after six moneths sail, Alexander sacrificed, and celebrated games. Thence marching to Susa: the Provinces by their Deputies there accused many of their Officers, besides other offences, of violating their Temples. He caused them all to be put to death, without respect to any former friendship, and with them Cleander, Sualces, and Heracon, whom he had formerly condemned in Caramania. This severity noised abroad, netled many that knew themselves faulty; Some scraped together much money and fled, and others that commanded the mercenaries revolted, which caused him to send up and down Asia to disband the Stipendaries, who being thus put out of employment, robbed all over, and at length met at Tenarus, a Promontory of Laconia in Greece, whither many of their Captains fled to them. Alexander now married Statira the daughter of Darius, and gave her younger sister Drypetis to his beloved Hephestion, having a great desire that his children might be cousins to him. To some 80 more of his Commanders he gave wives of the daughters of the chiefeft Medes and Persians, to which he assigned dowers. He made one great wedding-feast for himself and them all: and to the other Macedonians that had married wives in Asia he gave gifts.

34. Moreover he paid the debts they had contracted in Asia, and because they were unwilling by giving up their names to let him see how bad husbands they had been (for they suspected him of such an intention) he caused the mony to be given them, without taking account to whom, and this expence reached not fully 10000 talents (as appeareth from Diodorus, Curtius, and

Plutarch;

Plutarch; though Justin and Arrianus mention 20000) so that as Curtius observeth, this Army which had conquered so many Nations, brought more victory than booty out of Asia. He also rewarded them severally, as they had done him most eminent service; and to Pencestes, Leonarus, Nearchus, Onesicritus, Hephaestion, and other keepers of his body, he gave golden crowns. But this did not satisfie the Macedonians, so as to keep them from mutinying. For, having sailed the River Eulans to the Sea, thence to the mouth of Tigris, and up this River as far as Opis, he there calling them together, gave liberty to all who were rendred unfit for service, either through age or maimednesse, to return home, promising great rewards to such as would voluntarily stay and finish the War with him. Though he intended hereby to gratifie them, yet they made a bad construction of it, as proceeding from contempt of them and their service, as counting them unfit for War. They called also to minde how he used the Persian habit and customs, as did some of his favourites; that the barbarous Nations were admitted amongst that Troop called his friends; and that he had lately caused 30 odd young men to be picked up out of the Provinces, whom trained up in the discipline of Macedonia, he called Epigoni, or his posterity. Considering these things, and thinking that he now despised their persons, fashions, and Country, they all desired to be disbanded, and bade him go alone to the Wars with his father Hammon, seeing he set so light by his Soldiers.

35. The King enraged, presently caused thirteen of the ringleaders to be apprehended, and drowned in the River; and reviling the rest bade them all be gone home. Then entering his Palace, for that day and the next he would admit none to his presence. On the third, having confined the Macedonians to their tents, he called such strangers to him as followed his Camp. Their faithfulness to him and the former Kings he commended, he related what favours he had shewed them, and told them he now took them as fellow Citizens, gave them the Arms of the Macedonians, and would have the Kingdom of Europe and that of Asia the same thing. Out of them he chose 1000 young men, to whom he committed the charge of his person in the Court; he bestowed the commands of the Army amongst them, and made choice of some, whom naming his kinsfolk, he permitted to kisse him. These things cut the Macedonians to the heart, and made them seriously repent of their rashnesse. Coming to the Palace, they threw down their Arms at the gate, and with great lamentation desired to be admitted, offering to give up the incendiaries, and desiring him rather to kill than thus disgrace them. He refused to admit them, but they continued still two dayes and as many nights before the gates, professing that they would not depart till he had compassion on them. On the third day, perceiving them thus humbled, he came forth to them, and Callines after mutual weeping, told him, that it troubled them to know others received into his kindred, and themselves excluded from it. He answered, that he received them also, and so would call them thenceforth; then he offered himself to be kissed by as many as would. Being thus received again into favour, they returned with great joy to their tents, and afterwards were feasted by him, together with Persians and others, to the number of 9000 guests.

36. He dismissed now such as were unserviceable for the Wars (though some say it was not till a little before his death) to whom he paid not onely their arrears, but gave them money to bear their charges, and a talent to every man besides. He sent home with them Craterus his beloved friend to govern Greece and Macedonia in the room of Antipater, who was to bring over a supply of men. Then made he a progresse through several places, and came to Ecbatane the chief seat of Media, where Hephaestion by drinking got a Feaver, and then impatient of a strict diet, died of it in seven dayes. In the absence of Glaucus his Physician (who was gone to the Theater to behold the sports) he eat his dinner, and after it drank a cup of cold wine, which, as it was thought, increased the distemper. Alexander took his death most heavily, fasted three dayes, and refused to be comforted. He commanded the Physician

Physician to be crucified, bespoke an universal mourning, wherein the Cities shared by the removal of their ornaments from the walls. He ordered Perdiccas to convey the body to Babylon, where he intended him a most sumptuous monument, and refused to fill up his place of Captain of his Thousand friends, lest his name should be forgotten, by which he would have the Company still called. Then, for diversion, he made War upon the Cossai, a People bordering on the Oxii, which having stood out against the Persians, despised him also, in respect of their valour, and the strength of their Country, situate upon the mountains of Media. Yet for all this, and the coldness of Winter, he brought them under within 40 dayes.

37. Having a great desire to sail the Caspian Sea, he sent Heraclides with divers Ship-carpenters into Hyrkania to build ships, and then he took his journey towards Babylon. Being distant from the City two or three dayes journey, the Chaldeans sent to warn him that he should not come into the City, for they were told by their god Belus, that, if he did, it should be fatal to him. He intended to follow their advise; but being perswaded otherwise by Anaxarchus and other Gracians, at length he resolved on the contrary. Then they desired him that he would not enter with his face upon the West; but it being difficult not so to do, by reason of the Fens about the City, having slighted their former advice, he also rejected this. Being arrived, he gave audience to Ambassadors sent to him now from all parts, not onely out of Asia, but from Africk and Europe also; Out of Africk, from the Nations situate upon the Sea-Coasts as far as the Atlantick Ocean: from Europe, besides the Gracians, Thracians, Illyrians, and Seythians, from some Nations of Italy, as the Brutii, Lucani, Tusci; from Sicilie, and Sardinia; as also from the Spaniards and Galls, then first known to the Macedonians; but as for the Romans, though some ranked them in the number, yet have we no reason to give credit to their report. At the celebration of the Olympick games, he caused it to be proclaimed, that all Greek Exiles might return home, except such as were banished for Sacrilege or murder, against which the Athenians and Ætolians onely made resistance. Then celebrated he the funerals of Hephestion with vast magnificence, and sacrificed to him as an Heroe. After this he made great preparations for shipping, intending also to invade and conquer Arabia, which, hearing that it was no lesse than India, he sent some to discover.

38. While these preparations were making, and an Haven in digging at Babylon, he passed through Euphrates into Pallocopa, a River, which being supplied with water from the former, thereby hindreth it from overflowing the Country. Here he opened the passages, made a new one towards the Lakes, and coming into the borders of Arabia, built there a City. Then deriding the Chaldeans, for that he had both entred, and sailed in safety from Babylon, he thither returned, and liking the City exceedingly, intended to make it the seat of his Empire; though it was but for a short space, as it fell out. For, having fate up feasting and drinking very late one night, as he was departing to go to bed, he was again invited by Medius a Thessalian to another carowze, where challenging, and being challenged, he drank so much wine as put him into a Fever, whereof he died the eleventh day. Some have delivered that he was poysoned by the procurement of Antipater, who suspecting he was through the malice of Olympias called out of Macedonia for no good towards himself, sent his son Cassander with poyson to be delivered to Illas and his other sons, that then waited on the King. Indeed Cassander was not at all favourable, as he ought to have been, to the interest of Alexander's posterity, as neither to his reputation; and coming to him a little before his death, he did but little strive to suite his humour. For seeing the Barbarians adore him, and being unacquainted with such a sight, he burst forth into laughing, for which Alexander caught him by the hair, and knocked his head soundly against the wall, as Plutarch telleth us. But as for matter of poyson, the long lying of his body in so hot a Country, during the contentions of his Captains, betrayed no symptoms thereof, and therefore others give no credit to the report. Moreover, the course of his sickness presenteth us with no such symptoms, as it is described to us by Plutarch and Arrianus out of his Diaries.

39. On the 18th day of the (Macedonian) month Dæsius (May the 12) he slept in a Bath, because of his fever. The day following he returned to his Bed-Chamber, and spent it with Medius at Dice: then being washed at night, and having finished his devotions, he supped something liberally, and all the night was much distempered. On the 20th day he washed, and having finished a solemn sacrifice, in the Bath heard Nearchus relate the story of his Navigation, and of what he had seen in the Ocean. On the 21st, having done the same thing his Fever increased, and he had an ill night. The day after he was held with a sharp Fever, and was removed near the great place for swimming, where he discoursed with his Officers about supplying Vacant places in the Army with the fittest persons. On the 24th his disease increasing he sacrificed, being borne out to the place, and commanded the principal of his Officers to stay in the Court, and the rest to watch before the Gates. Being removed into the inner Palace on the 25th day he rested a little; but the Fever abated not, and when the Captains came to see him he spake not a word. So he passed over the 26th day, whereupon the Macedonians thinking him to be dead, came with great noise to the Door, and compelled his friends to let them in; so in their Coats every man of them passed by his bed's side. The same day Pirron and Seleucus were sent to the Temple of Serapis, to ask if he should be removed thither, and received answer, that he should continue where he was. On the 28th day towards the evening he expired. Though he (a) fainted by the violence of his disease; yet leaning on his Elbow, he reached out his hand to all Soldiers that would touch it in their passage, and (which seemeth incredible) (b) continued in the same posture he had set himself, till the whole Army had saluted him.

40. The Soldiers being all gone, he asked his friends about him whether they thought they should have such another King. When all kept silence he said, that as he was ignorant hereof, so he knew, could Prophecie, and almost see with his eyes how much blood Macedonia would shed in this controversy, with what slaughters and bloodshed it would make him a Parentation when he was dead. At length he commanded his body to be buried in the Temple of Hammon, and when his friends asked him to whom he would leave his Kingdom, he answered, to the most Valiant. Yet having taken his Ring from his finger he gave it to Perdiccas: whereby all conjectured that he commended his Kingdom to him till his Children should grow up. Again, Perdiccas demanding of him when he would have Divine honours given to him, he replied, then, when they (his followers) were happy: which were his last words, and a little after he departed. He * lived 32 years and eight months, reigned twelve, and also eight months. He died six years and ten months after the murder of Darius, in the first year of the 114 Olympiad, A. ## CHAP. II.

Alexanders Issue and Lineage.

1. Alexander, though he had taken several Wives, yet left but one Son already born of Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, and another in the belly of Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyaries. His Son called Hercule was despised upon his Mothers account by the Captains, who much scorned the Conquered Nations. He had a sister named Cleopatra, Widow to the King of Epirus and their Uncle, who was slain in Italy; and a base brother called Arideus (begotten on Philinna a woman of Larissa) who married Eurydice the daughter of Amyntas, whom being the right Heir, and his Nephew, Philip kept from the Kingdom of Macedonia, after he had exercised the Office of his Protector, and on him bestowed a daughter of his own in marriage. This Amyntas bore patiently the want of the Kingdom all Philip's time, but in the beginning of Alexander's reign, with the losse of his life, attempted something. His title through the prowess of the two late Kings was utterly forgotten; Cleopatra (as a woman perhaps) was not thought of. Arideus neither by birth, personage, or qualities was fitly endowed; yet upon him the election fell, for want of a better, because the Captains were at a losse what course to take.

Contention amongst his Captains about the succession.

2. For, Ptolomy the son of Lagus (as he was called; but reputed the son of Philip, who, as it's said, having used the company of Artsinoe his Mother, put her off in marriage to Lagus, when great with Child) rejecting the title of the half Persian brood, though as Alexander's Children they should have been considered, was for the Captains their taking the rule upon them, and deciding all things by Vote of the major part. But as he might think this course most likely to serve his own ambition, so Aristonius perhaps on the same grounds betook himself to the words of Alexander, which he interpreted as meant of Perdiccas, because, saying, that he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, at the point of death he delivered to him his Ring. He was seconded by many, who either bore good will to Perdiccas, or out of fear that he would carry it, would not venture to oppose him. But he would needs make a shew of modesty, thinking thereby the more to indear himself, whereat Meleager an envious man, and one who bore to him a particular grudge, took advantage to inveigh against him, and disturbed all Councils, by persuading the Soldiers that whosoever was the Empire, they had the best title to the Treasure. During the uproar Arideus was mentioned, and his name laid hold on by some peaceable spirits, who labouring betwixt the parties wrought a composure for the time, wherein yet Perdiccas had the better of his adversary. It was agreed, according to the desire of the Infantry, that Arideus the base son of Philip should be King, and for as much as he was stupid and dull (rather through the practising of Olympias upon him, as some thought, than any Original indisposition) Perdiccas was made his Protector, and Commander of his Forces, who hereby in effect was King for a time, though that title, with the name of Philip, for a greater grace was conferred upon the other.

Arideus declared King.

The Provinces distributed amongst the Captains.

3. Then did the Officers distribute the Provinces of the Empire amongst themselves. Macedonia and Greece were left to Antipater, Thrace with the neighbouring Countreys was assigned to Lysimachus; Egypt, with all that which of Cyrene, Africk, and Arabia had belonged to Alexander, was set over to Ptolomy the son of Lagus. Syria and Phœnicia were committed to Laomedon; Armenia to Neoptolemus; Mesopotamia to Arceflaus. In Asia the lesse, Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, with the Countreys thereto adjoyning, which which Alexander had passed by in his Conquests, were assigned to Eumenes; Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, and the greater Phrygia to Antigonus; the lesser Phrygia as far as the Hellepont to Leonatus; Cilicia to Philotas, together with Isauria; and Caria to Cassander. Menander was confirmed in the Government of Lydia given him by Alexander. The Isle of Cyprus remained in the power of certain Governours to which he had granted it; and all that part of his Empire from Babylon Eastward continued in the state wherein he left it. Thus was his Dominions disposed of otherwise than he intended, for one telleth us that he made a Will, which he delivered to the Rhodians, and another affirmeth, that thereby all was given to one onely Successor. After this his Funerals were thought of, his body having lye seven dayes neglected. Yet no corruption had seized on it, and it looked as fresh in the face as though it had been living, which as it's said made the Egyptians and Chaldeans afraid to touch it; but having prayed that mortals might lawfully do it, they embalmed, and after that adorned it with royal Ensigns. The care of the burial was committed to one Aridaus (not the King, though some have so mistaken) another of the Captains, who spent two years in making preparation for it, which made Olympias tax the late ambition of her son, and bewail his misfortune together in the same speech, as * Eliau observeth. For, the burial of Alexander was to be ushered in by the Funerals of many of his followers.

4. Ptolomy got possession of Egypt without any trouble, and settled himself therein, partly by his fair carriage towards the Inhabitants, and partly by the power of an Army, which he raised by the virtue of 8000 Talents. Hearing that Perdiccas had an intention to deprive him of his Government, he contracted affinity with Antipater, and making away Cleomenes his Lieutenant, because he was much addicted to the Prosector, fortified the Countrey. Antipater was now imployed in the Lamian War against the Athenians and Ætolians, who refused to receive their Exiles, as was hinted before, and so distressed him in battel, that he was forced to fly to Lamia, a Citie of Phthiotis. Here Leosthenes the Athenian General besieged him; but when he perceived him forsaken by the Ætolians he issued out, and slew him in the charge, being an excellent Soldier, and one who had deserved well of Greece. Leonatus Governour of the lesser Phrygia, allured by promise of his daughter, came over to help Antipater; but marching through Thessaly was driven into a Fen by the Gracians; and there slain. At his mishap Antipater (who coming thither the day after, united his Forces with his own) is said to have rejoiced, because he had determined to make himself Master of Macedonia. At this time Perdiccas taking the King along with him, went against Ariarathes of Cappadocia, whom getting into his hands he Crucified, and subduing those Countreys which Alexander had passed by, gave them to Eumenes, according to agreement. Craterus not long after passed over into Macedonia, to the assistance of Antipater, with 10000 Macedonians, and 150 Persians, which Force united to the Army of Antipater, overpowered the joyned strength of the Gracians.

5. After this begun the Civil Wars betwixt the Captains themselves. For, Perdiccas breathing after the Sovereignty, and knowing how able the other were to withstand him, grudged Ptolomy exceedingly the possession of Egypt, and through the perswasion of Eumenes procured much enmity, in that having married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, by his advice, he resolved to put her away, and take Cleopatra to wife, the daughter of Philip, and sister to Alexander. This being made known to Antigonus, he certified Antipater of it, and being calumniated by Perdiccas (who intended to make him away) he fled unto him, with Demetrius his son. Perdiccas consulting with his Officers what in this case was to be done, resolved first to set upon Egypt, lest Ptolomy during his absence in Greece, should seize upon Asia. And to keep Asia against Antipater and Craterus, he left Eumenes with large power over the Provinces, joyning with him Alceas his own brother, and Neoptolemus. Perdiccas taking along with him Aridaus the King, and young Alexander now born of Roxane (who was eight months gone with child of him when his Father died) for a more specious pretence, marched against Ptolomy. Antipater, and Craterus, hearing how things went, clapped up a Peace presently with the Aetolians, and leaving Polyperchon to govern Macedonia and Greece, passed over the Hellepont, and dispatched away messengers to Ptolomy to enter into a league and society with him.

6. Alceas, with those Macedonians he commanded, flatly refused to fight against them; and Neoptolemus envying Eumenes the chief command, plainly revolted. After this, some were sent to feel Eumenes, but he answered, that he would rather die than betray his trust, whereupon Antipater and Craterus divided their Forces. Antipater marched towards Egypt to joyn with Ptolomy, and Craterus staid to oppose Eumenes, with whom fighting in Cappadocia, his Horse stumbled, and he was run through with a Lance, and after the fight died of the wound: Neoptolemus also grappling with Eumenes was slain by him. By this time Perdiccas with the two Kings came to Pelusium in Egypt, where though Ptolomy purged himself of the crimes objected against him, yet he would pursue his enterprize, though contrary to the inclination of his Soldiers, his end being hereby to be brought about. Divers of his friends presently forsook him; yet he set upon a Castel near the Nile, and not being able to gain it, marched away and came over against Memphis, where the River parting into two streams, maketh an Island very convenient for the lodging of his Army. Endeavouring to bring his men into it, he lost 200 in the Ford, for that those who first waded over so removed the sand at the bottom, that the River was too deep for such as followed. Yet did he command those who had got safe over to return; of whom part were drowned, some caried down the stream to the Enemy, and others being tossed to and fro in the River were devoured by Crocodils. By this imprudent act the minds of his followers were so turned against him, that 100 of his chief Officers revolting, he was slain by certain Horse-men, after he had continued in his power almost three years. * One reporteth, that he was slain at the River Nile by Seleucus and Antigonus.

7. Ptolomy came over to the Kings, whom with the Officers he magnificently entertained, and then an election being to be made of a new Governor for them in the room of Perdiccas, though he could easily have procured himself to be chosen, yet he got two others elected, viz. Pithon one of Alexander's most intimate friends, and Arideus, who having the care of the funeral committed to him, had at the desire of Ptolomy buried the King's body at Memphis, against the will of Perdiccas. The Army now being displeased at the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes an Enemy, and chose Antigonus together with Antipater Generals for the subduing of him. But Pithon and Arideus held not their places long, for Eurydice the wife of Arideus the King, being a woman of a notable spirit, would have nothing done without her knowledge, and grew so intolerable, that Pithon therewith wearied, and seeing the Macedonians too much addicted to her, called the Soldiers together, and laid down his Protectorship. Into his room then Antipater was elected with full power.

8. Against him also Eurydice raised such a Sedition in the Army, taking occasion at the want of pay, that with much ado he escaped the danger of his life, by the means of Antigonus and Seleucus. After this, he anew divided such Provinces as he saw convenient, placing and displacing Governours. He created Antigonus General against Eumenes, sending his own son Cassander as Colonel with him, by whom he might be certified, in case he attempted any thing for his own establishment; and then with the two Kings he marched for Macedonia, Eumenes having intelligence concerning these Councils, made all preparations possible for resistance. In the Spring Antigonus came against him into Cappadocia, where he first attempted by Libels thrown into his Camp, to draw his Soldiers from their obedience, offering a great reward for his head. Eumenes gave his Soldiers thanks for their fidelity, but told them, that these Libels were feigned by himself to try them, which was a notable device (and of such he was full) to make them wary of giving credit to such for the time to come. Yet some proved false to him, as one Perdiccas, who drew away a considerable party, but was pursued and taken, and being put to death, the Soldiers returned to obedience. But Apollonides his General of the Horse did most mischief, for being corrupted by Antigonus, when they came to joyn battel he passed over with his Troops to him, whereby Eumenes had the worst of it, and lost about 8000 men, with his Carriages.

Besieged in Nora.

9. Apollonides the Traytor he caught and hanged: then, flying a private way, he returned to the Camp, and there buried his dead, to the wonder and amazement of the Enemy, after which he could have plundered the carriages of Antigonus but for burthening his Soldiers with the booty. Being driven to and fro in this flight, at length he betook himself to a Castel called Nora, situate in the Confines of Cappadocia and Lycania, and dismissed all his Army, except 500 Horse-men, and 200 Foot, as also such friends as were unwilling to undergo the hardship of a Siege. Antigonus before he would lay close siege to the place, called him forth to a Treaty, requiring him to come to him a Superiour, to which he answered, that he accounted no man his Superiour so long as he had a Sword by his side. This parley, though managed with much respect, came to nothing, and Antigonus leaving a party sufficient to carry on the Siege, marched against Alcetas and Attalus, two of Eumenes his confederates, whom he suppressed. About this time Antipater died in Macedonia, and at his death more swayed by the Publick good than any selfish respect, left Polysperchon (who after himself was the oldest of Alexander's friends now living) Protector of the Kings, and Captain, with full authority. Cassander his son stomached this very much, and consulting how to advance himself to be chief, secretly entered into confederacy with divers Captains. Amongst these was Ptolomy, whom he desired that he would send him some ships out of Phœnicia (for all that Country, together with Judea, hee had now got into his power) into the Hellepont. But the death of Antipater strangely also made way for the enlargement of Eumenes.

His death procureth the enlargement of Eumenes.

10. For, Antigonus now being left chief in Asia, thought of no lesse than getting it all into his power, and for that end strove to ingratiate himself with the several Captains. Judging that the conjunction of Eumenes might be of great advantage to him, he sent Hieronymus his Country-man (who being an * Historian, wrote of the acts of Alexander and his Successors) to desire him, that forgetting the fight in Cappadocia, he would enter into society with him, and receive a larger Province. He required that he should take an oath, which, slightly passing over the Kings, he had framed to his own advantage. Eumenes unwilling to swear fealty to him, with the assent of Hieronymus and the besiegers, changed the form of the oath, and swore to have the same friends and enemies, not onely with him, but with Olympias, and the Kings. Hereupon the Siege was raised after a years continuance, which he had born with admirable chearfulness and prudence, and now being let loose drew many followers after him, so that within a few dayes, besides the 500 which had continued with him in the Castel, he had 2000 at his devotion. Antigonus was very angry that he had changed the form of the oath, and by Letters checked the besiegers, for admitting of it, requiring them to believe him again; but it was too late. Thus, they were as far from closing as before; and still were further set at distance by the affaires which now were on foot in Macedonia.

11. Polysperchon having succeeded Antipater (as was before said) recalled Olympias out of Epirus, whither her enmity with Antipater had driven her, inviting her to take the care of her young grand-son upon her. But Cassander resolving to venture for Macedonia, entred into confederacy with Ptolomy and Antigonus, the later whereof gladly promised him assistance, out of love to the memory of his father, as he pretended, but indeed desirous that he should be diverted by so great a Warre, whilst he in the mean time might make sure of Asia. Polysperchon to secure Greece, in the name of the Kings published an Edict for the abolishment of all such Oligarchies, as since the passing of Alexander into Asia, had been erected in any of the Cities, which by virtue hereof he restored to their former liberty, hereby to oblige, and keep them from yielding to Cassander. In the same name he also wrote to Eumenes, upon whom he confirmed his former Government, and bestowed more, beseeching him, that together with himself, he would take upon him the protection of the King's house; if he pleased, in Macedonia, but rather in Asia against Antigonus, who now had visibly revolted from it: Moreover, he wrote to the Treasurers in Cilicia, to furnish Eumenes with money, and to the Argyraspida (or the old Soldiers with Silver Shields) to obey him in all things. Olympias also by letters desired his help, owning him as the most faithful of those remaining, who could assist against the ruine and desolation of her family.

12. Eumenes not able to stay any longer in Cappadocia, because Menander was sent from Antigonus against him, hasted into Cilicia, where the Argyraspida being 3000 in number joyned with him. Fearing the envy of the Macedonians, for that he was but a Stranger of the Cherronesus of Thrace, he carried it with great civility towards all, and made himself but equal to the other Captains. To contain them in order, he feigned that Alexander had appeared to him in a dream, sitting upon his Throne, and commanding as formerly, in compliance wherewith, he caused a Throne to be erected in a Tent as for the King, whereon was also laid a Diadem and Scepter; and here the Council of Officers were alwaies to assemble: Then sending his friends abroad he raised many men, the report of the largesse of his pay drawing Soldiers out of Greece it self. Ptolomy and Antigonus sent to take off the Argyraspida, and Teutamus one of their Captains was perswaded by them, but was reduced to his former resolution by Antigenes his Colleague, and the common Soldiers were quiered by Eumenes, who came upon them while yet they were in fear of Antigonus, who threatened, that except they would deliver him up, he would come and destroy them with his Army. After this, Eumenes marched into Phœnicia, intending there to provide shipping, that if need were, he might have intercourse with Polysperchon. He also intended to rescue Phœnicia out of Ptolomie's hands; but finding himself unable to accomplish this design, he began his march through Cœlesyria, and passed on till he came to Carra near Babylon, where he took up his Winter quarters.

13. Antigonus having overthrown at Sea Polysperchon's Navy, and attempted something against the Governours near the Hellepont, now hasted to make a full conquest of Asia. He chose out of all his Army 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, wherewith, for expedition, he marched with speed into Cilicia to suppress Eumenes his forces ere he could get them together, which caused the other sooner to depart into Phœnicia, whence he marched to Carra. Whilst he here remained he sent to Seleucus Governour of Babylon, and Pithon of Media, for aid against the enemies of the Kings; to which they answered, that they were ready to assist the Kings, but not him, who was condemned by a Council of the Macedonians, and they solicited the Captains of the Argyraspida to forsake him; but in vain. After this he resolved for Susa, thinking to get aide out of the upper Provinces, and money out of the Treasury, and thither he came with much difficulty, Seleucus having so drowned his Camp, that he was forced to get off his men with boats. It hapned that the Governours of the Provinces were at this time gathered together with many forces against Pithon, who having slain Philotas, had placed his own brother Eudramus in his stead. Fearing the like might be attempted against themselves, they armed, and having overthrown him in battel, drove out of Parthia to Babylon, where he fled to Seleucus for relief. Having formerly sent them Letters from the Kings, he now also solicited them for aid when thus met together, to which they agreed, and came down. These were Peucestes Governour of Persia, one of the Keepers of the late King's body, and now chosen by the rest for their Generalissimo; Polemon of Caramania,

Their united Force consisted of above 18700 foot, and 4600 horse, which being joyned to Eumenes his Army, made up a considerable body.

14. They had fallen out about chusing a new General, had not Eumenes his former device of setting up Alexander's Pavilion and Throne prevented it, whither he perswaded them to repair, and rule in common; after which he took as much money out of the Treasury at Susa as his wants required. In Spring Antigonus being come into Mesopotamia marched to Babylon, where joyning in Confederacy with Seleucus and Pitbon, he received some Forces from them, and passed the River Tigris. Eumenes hearing of his coming went down to Pasitioris, where he fell upon such of his Soldiers as were got over the River, which he filled also with Carkeises, and took 4000 prisoners. Antigonus therefore bent his course another way to the Citie Badaca situate upon the River Eulaus, whence he journeyed through the Countrey of the Cossaeans with great difficulty, & hardship, into the habitable parts of Media, where he refreshed, and quieted his men now ready to mutiny, by reason of their tedious journey. Eumenes marched into Persia, where the whole Army was Magnificently entertained by Pencestes the Sarrapa, who now thought to establish himself in the Chief power, but by the great cunning of Eumenes, together with the other Captains, was retained in his former condition, and brought to a greater observance of him. Antigonus, following him into Persia, he returned to meet him, but feasting his Army, he drunk so excessively, that a great distemper thereby contracted, stopped him for some dayes, and then was he carried in a Litter out of the noise, till such time as the Front would not march without him in the head of them. He was therefore constrained to lead them, and shortly after to frame the battel in his Litter, which Antigonus saw, and laughed at it.

They meet.

15. Four dayes were spent in light skirmishing, during which time Antigonus endeavoured to draw away Eumenes his men; but to no purpose; and afterwards resolved to go 3 dayes journey off into Gabiene, for that the Armies were both much straightened for necessaries. Eumenes hearing this, sent some, who as Fugitives should acquaint him how as that night he intended to fall in upon his Camp, which he believing, stayed, expecting him, and then did Eumenes make haste to get into Gabiene before him. Antigonus seeing himself deluded, marched after with great expedition, and leaving behind the rest of his Army, with a party got before him. He presented then himself to his view upon the Mountains, which Eumenes seeing, and thinking he had all his Forces with him, made an Alt, and so they mutually deceived each other. Here in the Countrey of the Paratraceni they joyned battel, wherein Eumenes had the better, though the other got the advantage of ground; but then his Soldiers beginning to be refractory would needs depart to their baggage, and not stay to bury their dead. Whereupon Antigonus doing this first, the victory came to be controverted.

The victory
controverted.

16. Antigonus finding himself to have had the worst of it, went his way to Gamarga in Media, where was plenty of Provisions, and then Eumenes finding his Army in no good case to pursue him, departed to Gabiene. Here he divided his Forces into their Winter quarters, not according to his own desire, but the pleasure of the Soldiers, for the old ones which had followed Alexander in his Conquests were grown so high, as they would rather give Laws to their Captains than receive them. Antigonus hearing this, thought to surprize them on a sudden, and for that they should know nothing of it, resolved to take a by-way, which yet was declared to Eumenes, who not being able to call his Soldiers together so soon as was requisite, betook himself to his seldom failing policy. He caused fires to be made on the Mountains where the Enemy was to passe, which they beholding, thought he had there there with him his whole Army, and so took the common way, after they were come into the midst of their journey. Antigonus stayed one day to recruit his Army, and Eumenes gathered in the mean time his Forces together, which admired his prudence so much, as they ordered him to be the Chief, which made him come into the danger of life, divers of the great ones conspiring against him, which made him say he was amongst a company of wild beasts, and caused him to make his Will, and tear his Letters, lest any of them that had wrote unto him should be troubled after his death. This as it was faithfully done to his friends, so was it also in good time, as it after fell out.

17. For, shortly after, Antigonus and he came to a Pitch-battel, which decided the controversie, though not for the Conquerour. Eumenes lead into the field 36700 foot, 6050 horse, and 114 Elephants, Antigonus brought 27000 foot, 9000 horse, and 65 Elephants. The Argyraspides (or silver shields) got the victory, for they put all Antigonus his foot to flight, and killed 5000 of them, so that though Peucestes withdrew himself out of the fight with his own horse, and 1500 more; yet Eumenes with the losse of 700 on his side got the day. But neither valour nor wisdom could befriend him, for the place where they fought being exceeding dusty, so as ones sight was taken away at a little distance, Antigonus sends a party of his horse to plunder his Enemies baggage, so that the Macedonians though Conquerors, after the battel fell into a deep melancholy for the losse of their Wives and Children taken away, and Teutamus first without the knowledge of any one sent to Antigonus, who Covenanted with him to restore him all, on condition Eumenes were delivered to him, and they would all passe into his Camp, whereupon the Macedonians, the 1000 which Peucestes commanded, and most of the other Captains revolted, and Eumenes having his hands tied behind him was delivered up; his Army shamefully following him to the Tents of Antigonus, leading it self in Triumph after him. Antigonus for shame would not see Eumenes his old fellow Soldier in that condition; but assigned him to Keepers, at first requiring he should be strictly looked to, but afterwards remitting that rigour till almost all perswaded him to make an end of him. This he was loath to do, and took 7 dayes to consult in; but then fearing some Sedition might arise in the Army, he commanded his dayly allowance of meate should be withdrawn, saying, he would never lay hands upon him. Two or three dayes he languished in this condition, and then the Army being to march, one was sent in, and killed him without the knowledge of Antigonus; so fell this brave man, excelled in Military glory but by few Captains, in the eighth year after the death of Alexander.

18. Cassander having obtained of Antigonus 35 ships, and 5000 men, sayled with them to Athens, which together with the Haven he had got into his power, by means of Nicanor, whom he had sent before-hand for that purpose. Against him came Polysperchon, intending to besiege him, but his Provisions failing, he left his son with a party in Attica, and with the greatest part of the Army marched into Peloponnesus against the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, who onely amongst the Cities had refused to take away their Oligarchy, and had joyned with Cassander. Here he had the worst of it, and that brought him so into contempt, as most of the Greek Cities revolted from him to Cassander, and the Athenians seeing they could not shake off his Garrison, agreed with him that he should retain the Fort Munychia, till the War was finished with the Kings, but that the Citie should be governed by one whom he appointed, which was Demetrius Phalerens the Philosopher, Theophrastus his Scholar, who Governed ten years with moderation, and was honored with 360 Statues. Then Cassander making an expedition into Macedonia, found there many friends. The year after, Polysperchon by the help of Æacida, King of the Molossians, reduced Olympias with Alexander the son of Rhoxane her Grand-Child into Macedonia, whereupon Eurydice the Wife of Arideus the King fortified herself, and sent to Cassander for aid, but the Macedonians fearing the Majesty of Olympias fell away from her, her, and she with her husband being both committed to prison, he was first made away, and then Olympias sent her a Sword, an Halter, and Poyson; to chuse which of them she pleased; so she praying the gods that she might have at length such gifts sent unto her, hanged her self with her Garter. This hapned after Arideus had enjoyed the title of King six years and four monerhs.

Killeth Nicanor and others.

19. Olympias killed Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and destroyed the Sepulchre of his other brother Iollas, and then chusing out 100 of his chiefeft friends put them to cruel deaths. But he hearing she was arrived in Macedonia, marched out of Peloponnesus against her, whereupon she made Aristonous her General, and commanded him to meet Cassander, she betaking herself, with Alexander her Grand-son, his Mother, and others, into Pydna, hoping she should have many assistants, but she was deceived. For, Cassander besieged her by Land and Sea. Æacida was coming to assist her, but by his means his men fell away from him, and banishing him his Countrey, joyned themselves and Kingdom to the other; others in Macedonia intended to aid her, but fearing Cassander, fell off also to him, and as for Polyperchon in whom rested now all her hope, Callas being sent against him corrupted also most of his Soldiers. The siege therefore lasted without any let, till famine so prevailed in the Citie, as many of the Defendants came out, and she was then driven by necessity to yield, very hardly obtaining promise of safety to her person. Afterwards he caused such as whose Kinsfolks she had put to death to accuse her to the Macedonians, who naturally hated, and now incensed by them, condemned her. Then did he send some of her friends to her, willing her to fly, but she denied it, and resolved to plead her cause before the people, so that he fearing their affections might be moved towards her, sent some Soldiers to kill her. They were so struck with her Majesty, as they returned without doing their errand, but then some the friends of whom she had made away came in, and slew her, not at all amared; or behaving herself otherwise than as the Mother of Alexander, whom she had outlived for eight years.

She is also murdered by Cassander.

Pithon put to death by Antigonus.

20. Pithon the Governour of Media, envying Antigonus his power, and greatnesse, laboured to draw most of the Soldiers now in their Winter quarters to his own party, intending to establish himself, which Antigonus being aware of, gave out that he would commit the East unto him, and by divers friendly Letters drew him to him, after which he got him condemned in a Council of his Associates, and put him to death. Then marched he into Persia, being received by the Inhabitants as King, for that now without controversie he was Lord of Asia. Here calling a Council, he confirmed divers in their Governments, and amongst the rest Sibyrtius of Arachosia, to whom he delivered 1000 of the most turbulent Arayraspides (who had delivered up Eumenes) under pretence to serve him in the Wars, but indeed to destroy them, giving him secret order to expose them to ruin, that so they might never see more Macedonia nor the Greek Sea. Perceiving Peucestes to be in great favour here, he removed him from the Government, to the great grief of the people, and then got the Treasure at Susa into his hands, out of which he made 25000 Talents. Thence he journeyed to Babylon, where Seleucus the Governour royally entertained him, but offering to punish a certain Officer of the Army without his knowledge, he called him to an account for the Revenues of the place. Seleucus denied to account, saying, that place was given him by the Macedonians for his faithfull service performed to Alexander; but the Contest grew sharper every day, so as he remembring, and fearing the case of Pithon, with fifty horse in his Company fled into Egypt. Antigonus was glad he had gotten Babylon, and that without any violence offered to his ancient friend; but being told by the Chaldeans, that if he let him go he should get all Asia into his power, and he himself should die in a battel against him, he sent some to pursue him, but in vain.

Who ordering matters as he pleased in the East,

21. Seleucus being courteously entertained by Ptolomy, sent his friends into Europe to stir up Cassander and Lysimachus against Antigonus, who suspected speaking some such matter, sent also to retain them in his friendship, but they entered into confederacy together with Ptolomy against him, and all three sent their Ambassadors to him, as he was now marching towards upper Syria, to demand that Cappadocia and Lycia might be restored to Cassander Governour of Caria; Phrygia upon the Hellepont to Lysimachus, all Syria to Ptolomy, and Babylon to Seleucus, and to divide all the treasure he had got into his hands since the death of Eumenes, with them and the other Macedonians who had lost their Governments. To this he answered sharply, and that he was already preparing for Ptolomy, so that the Ambassadors returning without any effect, they made great preparations both by Sea and Land. He understanding how full his hands would be, sent about to the chief States to retain them in friendship, and also to hire more Soldiers; he himself went into Phœnicia, where he besieged Tyre, used great endeavour for the making of ships, and took in Joppe and Gaza. Aristodemus also he sent into Laconia, who there by the permission of the Lacedæmonians raised 8000 Soldiers, and joyned Polysperchon and Alexander his son in confederacy with him, of whom the former was made General of Greece, and the later he desired to go over to Antigonus, who going accordingly, in an assembly of the Army accused Cassander, for that he had put Olympia to death, had committed Rhoxane and her son to custody, married by force Thessalonica the daughter of Philip and sister of Alexander, and so plainly affected the Kingdom of Macedonia: moreover, that he had re-edified Thèbes destroyed by Alexander, and restored the Olinthians; whereupon he was declared an Enemy, except he would amend what was amisse, and obey Antigonus, and set all the Græcians at liberty, and so Alexander rewarded with 500 Talents was sent back. Nor long after he revolted to Cassander, being for that declared General of Peloponnesus, and shortly after was traiterously slain by the Sicionians.

22. Seleucus in Cyprus prospered against the party of Antigonus, and Polycellus his Lieutenant overthrew Theodotus his Admiral both at Sea and Land, after which Ptolomy and Antigonus met and conferred together; but to no purpose. Cassander shortly after fearing Antigonus might passe over into Europe, to divert him, sent an Army over into Caria to help those Cities which were confederate with Seleucus and Ptolomy, Cassander the Governour there joyning with him, which Antigonus fearing, left Demetrius his son in Syria, with order to entrap Ptolomy's forces if they should march that way, and for that he was but then 22 years old, left 4 grave men his friends to counsel and direct him. Upon his coming to Caria, Cassander the Governour having too great a burthen upon him, made a Peace, on condition to keep his place, and gave his brother for an Hostage, whom yet he getting again out of his hands, he presently revolted, after which Antigonus got divers Cities into his hands, and restored the Milesians to their liberty. At this time the inhabitants of Cyrene revolting, Ptolomy reduced them again to obedience by the means of Agis his General, and in Cyprus suppressed some of the Kings which were of the contrary faction. Returning home he was solicited by Seleucus to undertake an Expedition against Demetrius then in Calesyria, so that with 18000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, he marched to Gaza, where Demetrius expected him. In the fight the forces of Demetrius seemed rather to prevail, till his Elephants being wounded and taken, his Horse out of fear ran away. He himself fled accompanied with many till he came to passe by Gaza, but then so many forsook him and went in thither to fetch out their goods, as multitudes flocking to the gates, and they therefore being hindred from being shut, the enemies entered with them and took the Town. Ptolomy took Sidon also, and besieged Tyre, whose Governour Andronicus upon summons refused to yield, and reviled him; yet he getting the place into his power through the sedition of the Soldiers, when he looked for present death, not onely forgave him, but entertained him courteously as his familiar friend.

23. Ptolomy getting the places about Syria into his power, returned into Egypte,

Aegypt, being followed thither by many which were drawn by his great courtesie and clemency. But Seleucus thinking this a good opportunity for him to return to his former Principality, obtained of him 800 Foot, and 200 Horse, and with them marched for Babylon. In his way in Mesopotamia he got, partly by fair means, partly by foul, those Macedonians which quartered at Carrae to joyn with him, but when he came to Babylon, the Inhabitants there willingly received him, and he shortly after stormed the Castel which was held by Antigonus his garrison. Nicanor the Governour of Media hearing this, came against him with above 10000 Foot, and 7000 Horse, whom he went out to meet with but few more than 3000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and knowing himself too weak to engage in a set battel with him, he hid his men in the Fens till he was past with his Army, and then came upon him lying carelessly in the night without any strict guards; so as the Persians coming to fight, Eugrus their Captain was slain, with other Officers, at which being struck, and also weary of Antigonus his government, they revolted, and Nicanor with a few at his heels escaped, being glad he was not delivered up. Seleucus by this means getting a strong Army, easily made himself Master of Susiana, Media, and the Countreyes thereto adjoining; so as getting hereby Royal Majesty, and Glory suitable to his dignity, some have from this year fetched the rise of that Ara, which afterwards was called that of the Seleucida, and of the Greeks; for that his Kingdom proved the most considerable; about the year of the World 3694, the first of the 117 Olympiad, 309 years before the Ara of Christ, and twelve years after the death of Alexander.

Eusebius in Chronico, alii.

24. When Antigonus heard of it, he sent his son Demetrius against him, who had now redeemed his credit by the overthrow of Cilles, sent to expel him out of Syria by Ptolomy, and upon it called thither his Father, so as they recovered all that Country, and Phoenicia out of his hands, he not daring to stay and try a battel with Antigonus. Demetrius led with him an Army of 15000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, with order to recover the Principality of Babylon, and then go down to the Sea. Parrocles, whom Seleucus had left Governour of Babylon, hearing of his coming, advised the inhabitants to leave the City, and flee some into the Desert, or over the River Tigris, he himself with a Band of men flew up and down, taking advantages at the Enemy, and sent to Seleucus into Media for aid, so that Demetrius coming and finding the City forsaken, stormed one of the Forts therein, and for that his time was out, beyond which he could not stay, he left Archelaus with a strong party to besiege the other. Then giving leave to his Soldiers to plunder all they could, he departed according to his Father's order to the Sea, where he besieged Halicarnassus, but was beaten off by Ptolomy, and so as it were took his leave of that Province for ever, taking what he could get along with him, and perhaps for this reason the Chaldeans with the Author of the second Book of the Machabees in this year (one after the other) fix the Ara of Seleucus. Not long after, Ptolomy, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, made a Peace with Antigonus on these terms: that Cassander should be Captain General of Europe; Lyfimachus should retain Thrace, and Ptolomy Aegypt, and the rest which he now enjoyed, until Alexander the son of Roxane should come to age, and that Antigonus should be over Asia, and the Greeks live after their own Laws. This agreement was not kept long, each one seeking under any pretence to enlarge his Dominions, and indeed they might better do it, seeing he for whom they pretended themselves Administrators, and was their Sovereign Lord, was taken away. For Cassander taking notice that young Alexander grew up, and that the People began to talk, that now he ought to be delivered out of custody, and to enjoy his Fathers Kingdom, he fearing his own interest, commanded secretly Glaucius his Keeper to kill him and his Mother, and concealing their bodies, to acquaint no person living with it. Thus he who was unborn when his Father died, died by the hands of violence and treason, thirteen years after him.

of Barfines (never married to Alexander) was held as illegitimate by the Captains, though born before his Father's death. His name was Hercules, being now kept at Pergamus, whence he was called shortly after the death of the other, by Polyperchon, who now being in Peloponnesus, and envying Cassander the Principality of Macedonia, sent about to his friends, inreating, that the youth being seventeen years old, might be brought, and established in his Fathers Throne. The Aetolians especially, with others, embraced the motion, so as he got together about 20000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, in no great space, and within a while after gathered up a numerous Army, with which he marched and came on his way to Stymphalia. Here Cassander opposed him, and seeing that his Macedonians took well enough this reduction of their Prince, and fearing they might revolt to him, sent to Polyperchon, and with vast promises secretly perswaded him to make away the young man, which accordingly was performed. About this time Demetrius overthrew Ptolomy his Lieutenants in Cilicia, and he to be revenged invaded Licia, where he took some Cities, after that sailed into Greece, where he endeavoured in emulation to Antigonius to set the Cities at liberty, but the Greeks not keeping their promise of sending money and corn, having received Sicyon and Corinth from the Widdow of Alexander the son of Ephestion (who had revenged stoutly her husbands death, and kept still these places) he agreed with Cassander that each should retain such places as he had in his power, and returned.

26. Alexander had yet a sister living called Cleopatra, formerly the Widdow of Alexander King of Epirus (who making an Expedition into Italy, perished, against the Lucanians, as Livie tells us) and after that married to Perdiccas, whom also now being at Sardis, Antigonius seems to have wooed. But she inclining rather to Ptolomy, stole out of Sardis to go to him, whereupon Antigonius took such order by the Governour of the Town, that she was not onely stopped in her journey, but by means also of some women secretly made away, after which to colour the matter he put some of them to death, and buried her body with royal magnificence. Shortly after this, Demetrius was sent into Greece to set the Cities at liberty, which he accomplished at this time for Athens; Demetrius Phalareus being driven out, and conducted to Thebes, where he lived till Cassander's death, and then fled to Ptolomy. After this, Demetrius being recalled to make War in Cyprus, thither he passed, where he overthrew Menelaus, Ptolomy his brother and Governour there, and pursuing him to the City Salamine, slew 3000 of his men, and took 1000, and then besieged him in that place. Ptolomy hearing of the defeat of his men, came both with Sea and Land forces, and ingaged the besiegers in battel, wherein though he overthrew that Wing against which he himself fought, yet the other prevailing, he was discomfited with the losse of 8000 men, and all his ships save eight, with which he fled away, and Demetrius became Master of the Town and Island. Antigonius being elevated with this succeſſe, received the title of King given him by his friends, and a Diadem set upon his head, which title and honour he also gave to his Son Demetrius. The Egyptians also hearing this, lest they should seem to be dejected for their losse, gave the name of King to Ptolomy, who thenceforth in all his Letters stiled himself so. Neither now would the other great ones come behind these; for Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, after their example, took upon themselves the same dignity and title, all the near relations of Alexander being quite extinct.

1. Antigonus animated by his late successe against Ptolomy in Cyprus, Diodorus ibid. now thought of no lesse than ouing him also of Egypt it self; wherefore recalling his son from the Island, he commanded all his Forces to meet at Antigonis (a Citie newly built by him upon the River Orontas in Syria, as convenient for the lying in wait against the upper Provinces & Egypt) which afterwards Seleucus destroyed, & translated the Inhabitants to his Seleucia. Antigonus leading the Land-forces himself, committed the Fleet to his son, which was to sayl along upon the Coasts with the Army as it marched. Having good Provision both for men and beasts, he marched through the desert; the Navy went through great hazard at Sea, but the Tempest ceasing in good time, they came all together unto Nile. Ptolomy by this time had so fortified the several mouths of the River, as the Sea-forces could do no good, though they removed from one to another, and the Land-Army could not find any food at that time of the year, the water being very high: Moreover, many fell away to the Enemy, being allured with his promise of 2. l. to every common Soldier, and a Talent to an Officer; so that Antigonus was fain to retreat into Syria. Ptolomy being exceeding glad hereof, sent to his Confederates to acquaint them with his good successe, and now having thus defended his Kingdom, accounted himself rightly to enjoy it, and hereupon some have accounted the beginning of his reign from this very time, fixing it at 19 years distance from the death of Alexander.

2. This want of successe allayed not the ambition of Antigonus. For, he sent his son Demetrius presently against the Rhodians, who had formerly displeased him by a denial to send him aid, and ships. For, they endeavouring as near as they could to keep in with all these great ones, yet were drawn by their private interest, especially to favour Ptolomy, from whose Kingdom they got the greatest part of their livelihood by way of Traffick. Demetrius according to his fathers command, went, and besieged their Citie, lying before it nigh a whole year, during which time he made all sorts of opposition he could, till ordered by his father to make peace with them, which they were prone to accept of, though Ptolomy with others sent them Provisions, and supplies of men. Departing from Rhodes, Demetrius passed into Greece to restore the Cities which Cassander and Polyperchon had lately mastered through the absence of Antigonus his Forces. Chalcis he freed from a Garrison of the Bactrians, whom he also withdrew from Cassander's friendship, joyned in society with the Aetolians, and afterwards restored Sicyon, Corinth, Athens, and other places to their freedom. Cassander seeing things by the help of Demetrius to go well with Greece, sent over to Antigonus to desire peace, but he refused it, except he would refer himself whole unto him. He being affrighted at this, sent to Lysimachus in Thrace, to come and Consult with him, and then they both dispatch away Messengers to Ptolomy and Seleucus, to let them see how they were concerned also to resist Antigonus. They hearkned willingly to the offers made unto them, and joyned in Confederacy against him as their common Enemy, promising great supplies for carrying on the War.

3. Cassander thinking it good policy not to stay for the Enemy to come upon him, but invade him first, gave part of his Army to Lysimachus to passe over with it into Asia, and with the rest marched for Thessaly, there to oppose Demetrius and the Greeks. There meeting, and incamping with vast Armies, neither of them would begin the battel, expecting how things went in Asia, till Demetrius was recalled thither by his father. Lysimachus being landed there, the Inhabitants of Lampsachus submitted to him, whom he restored to their liberty, stormed Sigeus, and placed a Garrison there; then he took in Phrygia upon the Hellepont, and divers other places, by the means of Docimus, an Officer of Antigonus, whom he had drawn over to him; Prepelans also, whom he sent with a party to subdue the Cities of Eolis and Ionis, took other Towns. Antigonus was at this time celebrating publick Games at Antigonia, when hearing this news, he presently broke them off, and with all speed marched against Lysimachus. Whom he reached, and besieged him in his Camp for some time, till he taking the opportunity of a dark and rainy night fled away: Then hearing that Seleucus was drawing down his Forces from the upper Provinces, he sent for Demetrius to come over with all expedition. Seleucus had lately made peace with Sandrocottus (or Androcoitus) who being a man of no quality, had solicited the Indians to revolt after the death of Alexander, and to kill his Officers, and thence took an occasion to subdue them under himself. Bactria being subdued, Seleucus had waged War with him, but now for a Composure gave to him some Countrey lying upon the River Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and received 500 Elephants again of him in exchange. Ptolomy with a compleat Army had come into Celestria, where he reduced divers Cities; but as he was besieging Sidon came a false report that Antigonus had overthrown Seleucus and Lysimachus, and now was coming thitherward, wherefore he made a Truce with the Sidonians for five moneths, and returned, but not long after came up again to that fatal engagement with Antigonus.

4. The Forces of these several Princes were drawn down to be in readiness against the Spring. Antigonus had an Army of 70000 foot, 10000 horse, and 75 Elephants, the contrary party had made up amongst them 64000 foot, 1500 horse, 400 Elephants, and 120 Chariots. Antigonus bragged that he would scatter the meeting of these Kings together, as one might do the flocking of birds gathering Corn, with the throwing of a stone; but when they approached, he was more melancholick than usual, and was seen to discourse with his son in private in his Tent, which he never used to do; commended him also to the Army as his Successor. This battel was fought at Ipsus, a Town in Phrygia, in which Demetrius leading the best party of horse, engaged with Antiochus the son (and afterwards Successor) of Seleucus, whom he routed, and put to flight; but being too hot in the pursuit undid all: for retiring back he could not again joyn himself with the foot, by reason that the Elephants were gotten between them. Seleucus seeing this, made as if he would have fallen upon the Infantry, thus destitute of the horse, wherein his expectation failed him not, for they fearing it, part revolted to him, and the rest were broken, and put to flight. Antigonus standing his ground, expected continually Demetrius to come to relieve him: but in that expectation ended his life by a multitude of Darts thrown against him, being now something above 80 years old. Demetrius his son with 5000 foot, and 4000 horse fled to Ephesus, but there fearing his Soldiers might be some way false to him, he sailed to Salamine in Cyprus, which he then held. This fell out in the 3704 year of the World, the fourth of the 119 Olympiad, 23 years after the death of Alexander, and six after their taking the Title of Kings upon them.

5. The Conquerours parted his Dominions amongst them, as we are told; but it seems to have been chiefly Seleucus and Ptolomy, who did not well agree about their prey, and upon this account left a contention to their Successors. Seleucus fell presently upon building Cities, the first of which he called after himself Seleucia; and the later, to which he transferred the Inhabitants of Antigonia (to the number of three thousand five hundred) as we said before, he called Antiochia, either after his father or son's name; for both are affirmed, and this afterwards proved the Metropolis of Syria. Ptolomy after the death of Antigonus got Syria again, with Cyprus, and afterwards Cyrene also into his power, and married his daughter Arfinoes unto Lysimachus, as few years after his other to Agathocles the son. Seleucus seeing that thus these two strengthened themselves in affinity, thought not amiss to joyn also with Demetrius, though gone down the wind; and accordingly sent to him for his daughter Stratonice. He receiving this unexpected Message, sayled with her into Syria. Passing by Cilicia, which then Cassander held, Plistarchus his brother cried out that he would invade his Territories, and went strait to Seleucus to expostulate with him his being reconciled to the common Enemy. But Demetrius landing went to Quinda, where finding yet 200 Talents left in the Treasury, he took them away, and so went and met with Seleucus at Orossus, who taking his wife away with him to Antioch, Demetrius seized upon Cilicia, and sent his wife Phla to Cassander her brother, to purge him of those things laid to his charge by Plistarchus.

Notwithstanding Cassander he held Cilicia; but Seleucus his son-in-law required, that for a sum of money he would give it up into his hands, which he refused, and then he with some anger demanded Tyre and Sidon of him, not being content, though he held all from the Syrian Sea, as far as India, that his father-in-law should rest quiet with it, being sufficiently tossed with adverse fortune, but he as stoutly denied this also, saying, that though he were a thousand times more overcome, yet would he never purchase the affinity of Seleucus, and fortified the Cities with Garrisons. The next year Cassander King of Macedonia died of a Dropsie (which was so loathsome, as Lice withall broke out of him) after he had ruled that Countrey 19 years; 26 after the death of Alexander, A.M. 3707.

his sons about the Kingdom.

6. He left three sons by Theffalonice the daughter of Philip, and sister to Alexander; Philip, Antipater, and Alexander. The first succeeded his father, but died presently of a Consumption, Antipater coming after him killed his mother, for that after her husbands death she seemed to favour his younger brother Alexander more than him in the division of the Kingdom; though she besought him by her breasts that gave him suck to spare her life. After her death he endeavoured to expel his brother out of Macedonia, who therefore craved aid of Demetrius, and Pyrrhus King of Epirus, who being expelled out of his Kingdom, had married Ptolomy's Wives Daughter, and by him was restored. Demetrius being now employed otherwayes, the other came, and received some Countreys in way of encouragement and reward for his service, which he fortified with his own Garrisons. Antipater now had his recourse to Lysimachus his father-in-law, who being also hindred with other affairs, and fearing Demetrius his coming, advised him to make an agreement with his brother; and for that he knew Pyrrhus would in any thing seek to gratifie Ptolomy, that he might take him off, he feigned a Letter to him from him, wherein he adviseth him for 300 Talents received from Antipater to forsake his Enterprize. Pyrrhus as soon as he opened the Letter, easily discerned it to be counterfeit, for that it was not directed after the usual manner, as from the father to the son, but as from the one King to the other.

7. Lysimachus his perswasion seems to have wrought so with the Elder, together with the presence of Pyrrhus, as they came near to an agreement; but the coming of Demetrius spoiled all. For, he having lost Cyprus lately to Ptolomy (which forced him to quit Lacedemon, after he had taken Athens, and now had almost taken it also) came into Macedonia to amend his fortunes. Alexander being troubled at his coming, seeing he knew the peace was partly made, went out to meet, and received him with great honour, but told him he now had no need of his help; but he either having, or pretending to have a suspicion of him, procured him to be slain, telling the Macedonians a fair tale afterwards, who seeing the one of Cassander's sons thus dead, and hating the other for his impiety towards his mother, received him as King. Some have delivered that Alexander used Demetrius his help, first in killing his brother Antipater, and so revenged the death of his Mother upon him. Others say that Lysimachus after Alexander's death, for that he was employed in a War with Dromicheus King of the Getae, delivered also up to Demetrius, that part which belonged to Antipater his son-in-law, and afterwards wards slew him also, when he complained to him that by his means he had lost his Kingdom, and imprisoned Eurydice his wife, his own daughter, for partaking with him in the complaint. But thus (one way or other) Antipater was revarded for his mother's death; and so in a short time fell the posterity of Cassander, by the just Judgment of God, as Heathen Writers observe.

Demetrius getting Macedonia still after his former height.

8. For some time Demetrius enjoyed Macedonia, during which he still aspired after his former height and power: for now having this Kingdom and Thessalie in his hands, as also Athens and Megara, and the greater part of Peloponnesus, he subdued the Boeotians. Then hearing Lyfimachus to be taken prisoner by the King of the Grecs (who shortly after yet set him at liberty) he resolved to return for Thrace; but the Boeotians revolting caused him to retreat, though on his march thither; coming back he found that his son Antigonus had overthrown the revolvers in fight, but Thebes still remained untaken, and whilst he was going about that, Pyrhus of Epirus (being now alienated from him since the death of Deidamia his sister which Demetrius had married) invaded Thessaly from his own Frontiers, and pierced as far as the Straights of Thermopyla. Demetrius hearing this, left his son in the Siege, and hasted against him; but he staid not his coming but retired, and then Demetrius fortifying Thessalie returned to Thebes, where the Inhabitants so stoutly defended themselves, that he lost many men, and himself was wounded in the neck; yet according to his skil and fortune in taking of Cities (whence he had the Sirname of Poliorcetes) he stormed the place, and though he pretended at first severely to punish the Inhabitants, yet he satisfied himself with the death of ten or thirteen, and banishing a few, pardoned the rest.

Plutarch ibid.

9. Finding that his Macedonians were quiet when abroad, but seditious at home, he fell upon the Aetolians, to divert them. Wasting their borders there he left Pantauchus with some Forces, and with the rest marched against Pyrhus, who hearing it, came out to meet him, but they missed of each other, and went several wayes; Demetrius into Epirus which he harraased; Pyrhus light upon Pantauchus, who challenging him to fight gave him a wound, but he received two for it himself, and thereupon falling he had been slain, but that his friends presently rescued him, after which his Army was put to flight, and 5000 of them taken. After this, Demetrius fell sick at Pella, and then Pyrhus again invaded his Territories a great way, no body resisting him; nay, he had such an opportunity, as scarce could he have desired a better, for seizing upon the whole Kingdom, many revolting to him, and Demetrius his Captains making but slow endeavours to hinder his progresse. But he having his mind set more upon booty than any thing else, staid not their coming, but fled away, losing many of his men in the retreat. For all this Demetrius seeing him have a restless spirit, thought it not amisse to reconcile him unto him; but especially at this time, for now he resolved to make for his Father's Kingdom with all the might he possibly could, and therefore lest he should leave an Enemy at his back, concluded a Peace, and entred into a league with him.

10. Greater preparations he made than ever had been since Alexander his time. For he got together little lesse than 10000 Foot, and 12000 Horse, a Navie also of 500 sail; some ships whereof were of extraordinary bignesse; Selsucus, Ptolomy, and Lyfimachus, being startled hereat, combined together for resistance, and joyntly sent to Pyrhus to move him to break the league which Demetrius had made with him, as they alleged, not to rest in peace, but to make War upon whom he pleased. He believing as much, agreed with them, for that he hoped Demetrius might as easily lose Macedonia as he had got it, and then Ptolomy sailing into Greece, solicited there the Cities from their obedience. Lyfimachus from Thrace, and Pyrhus from his borders made inroads into Macedonia. Demetrius first began to march against Lyfimachus, but afterwards hearing that Pyrhus had gotten Berthea into his hands, returned and went against him thither, where when he was come, divers from the Town came into his Camp, and so extolled toll'd the valour and kindnesse of Pyrrhus, as the Macedonians, first in little Companies, and after all the Army revolted to him; so as Demetrius was much deceived, who fearing they might do so to Lyfimachus, little suspected this towards the other being a stranger. Pyrrhus thus obtaining all the Army without a stroke, was saluted King of Macedonia by the Soldiers; but Lyfimachus coming shortly after, alleged the endeavour of suppressing the Enemy to have been common to them both, and demanded the putting of the Kingdom; to whom he assented, for that he did not trust the Macedonians, and so the Countries and Cities were divided amongst them.

And flying up and down

11. Demetrius thus oured of his Kingdom fled to Cassandria, and thence into Greece, where after a little time he got some Forces together, and being angry with Athens, for that revolting from him, the Inhabitants had sent for Pyrrhus, he besieged it; but upon the entreaty of Crates the Philosopher (whom being a man of great authority they had sent to him) he gathered together his ships and sailed away into Asia with 11000 men. His design was to take, if he could, Caria and Lydia from Lyfimachus, and he took divers Towns, and seized upon Sardis, but Agathocles, Lyfimachus his son, coming down with an Army against him, he marched for Phrygia, with intention to passe into Armenia and Media; and so attempt to make himself Master of some of the upper Provinces of Asia, which at the worst would afford retreating places enough, and other helps to a beaten party. In his way hee was superiour to Agathocles who pursued him, but being brought into great distresse for want of provisions, there fell withall such a Plague upon his Army, that he lost 8000 men, and so was forced to retreat, and came to Tarsus. This place being under Seleucus, he was very loath to hurt, for fear of giving him offence, but being forced by want, he wrote to him, whereby he excused himself, and sadly lamented his condition. Seleucus, pitying him at first, commanded his Governours to use him and his Army with great respect; but Procles one of his most familiar friends, filled his head with such suspicions, that he led down an Army towards Cilicia against him, whereat hee wondering retired to the most convenient place of the mountain Taurus, where he sent to him to give him leave to seize upon some Country of the Barbarians, where he might put an end to his flight and wandrings, and spend the residue of his dayes.

At length is forced to yield himself to Seleucus.

12. Seleucus making a bad interpretation of the message, onely would give way, that giving up for Hostages the chiefest of his friends, he might quarter for two months in Catoania (a Country bordering upon Cappadocia) and secured the passage out into Syria. Here he was kept up as a wild beast, what by Seleucus on one side, and Agathocles on the other; so that he was constrained to betake himself to force, and waisting the Territories alwaies had the better of Seleucus in their encounters, and got possession of the Straights which led into Syria. This so encouraged him, that he thought now of giving battel to Seleucus, but falling into a sicknesse thereby his affaires were ruined, his Soldiers falling away from him to the Enemy, or running away, yet he recovered after forty dayes, and away he marched, and getting over the hill Amanns wasted the bordering Territories. Then Seleucus coming near him, he joyned and fought him, and overthrew one of his wings, but then all his Army revolted, and he with a very few fled into the Woods, whence endeavouring to passe to the Sea through the mountains, his discovering there the Enemies fiers prevented that attempt, and then one saying he must even yield himself, he drew his Sword and would therewith have ended his life, but being hindred by his friends, he sent to Seleucus by their advice and yielded. Seleucus caused him to be royally received at first; but the great confluence thereupon to him lessened that respect he else would have allowed him; so as sending Pausanias with 1000 men, he caused him to be caried straight (without as much as seeing him) into a Peninsula of Syria. Here he wanted nothing desirable, nor onely for necessity but pleasure; onely his liberty, which yet to comfort him there was hope given of, after that Antiochus should come with his wife Syracene, whom his Father Seleucus upon upon his passionately falling in love with her, had yielded to him. Antigonus his son much interceded for him; so did divers Princes and States; onely Lyfimachus offered 2000 Talents to have him killed, which Seleucus abhorred. At first he exercised himself much with hunting and such toiles; but by little and little grew sluggish, and, as if he had never been Demetrius Poliorceses, gave up himself to drinking and dice, whereby he grew fat, and contracted a disease of which he died 54 years old, after he had continued three of them in restraint.

Lyfimachus having expelled Demetrius, which the other being aware of, thought it best first to begin with him, and so passed over the Hellepont. These two being now only alive of the 36 Captains and fellow-soldiers of Alexander, joyned in a great and bloody battel in Phrygia, where Lyfimachus, though fighting most valiantly, was overthrown and slain, having formerly lost fifteen children divers wayes, and now compleating the ruine of his Family, after he had lived 80 years, and held Macedonia four, A. M. 3722, the second of the 124 Olympiad, and 40 after the death of Alexander the Great.

Who being the survivor of Alexander's Captains is slain by Ptolomy Ceraunus the same year.

13. Lyfimachus and Pyrrhus after his expulsion out of Macedonia presently fell out, for the former seeing Demetrius thus made sure and captivated by Seleucus, grew secure of his condition, despised Pyrrhus, and upbraiding the Macedonians for suffering him (being an alien, whose Ancestors alwaies had served them) now to reign over them, drew many from him, and afterwards overthrew him and Antigonus son of Demetrius in a great battel, and so quite dispossessed him of Macedonia. After this he killed his eldest son Agathocles at the instigation of his wife Arfinoe, who was solicitous for her own children, if they should fall into their brother's hands after their Father's death. Lyfandra the widdow of Agathocles, and sister to Arfinoe, accompanied with Alexander another son of Lyfimachus fled to Seleucus, whom they desired to make War against him; and after this he putting divers of his chief Subjects to death for bewailing the young man, many of his Captains and Governours followed, all earnestly desiring that Prince to make War upon him. Seleucus was easily perswaded to it now, having the whole strength of Asia and Syria united into one Kingdom after the fall of Demetrius, which the other being aware of, thought it best first to begin with him, and so passed over the Hellepont. These two being now only alive of the 36 Captains and fellow-soldiers of Alexander, joyned in a great and bloody battel in Phrygia, where Lyfimachus, though fighting most valiantly, was overthrown and slain, having formerly lost fifteen children divers wayes, and now compleating the ruine of his Family, after he had lived 80 years, and held Macedonia four, A. 14. Seleucus being exceedingly elevated with the thoughts of his Victory, and more with consideration that he onely survived of Alexander's followers, resolved to passe into Macedonia and there to end his dayes, giving up Asia to his son Antiochus. Hee passed the Hellepont, and journeying towards Lyfimachia came to a place called Argos, where his time being but to live seven moneths after Lyfimachus, he was slain by Ptolomy surnamed Ceraunus the son of Ptolomy the first by Euridice daughter to Antipater, who having fled out of Egypt, for that his Father preferred his younger brother before him, joyned himself first to Lyfimachus, who had married his sister, and afterwards to Seleucus, by whom he was lovingly entertained, though he thus requited him. Ptolomy, as soon as he had done his feat, posted away to Lyfimachia, when putting on a Diadem, and taking a Company of Gallants along with him, he went to the Army, which received him as King, having all Seleucus his money given unto them. Antigonus Genetas (so called it's probable, from a place in Perrhabia, where he was born) son of Demetrius Poliorceses presently after undertook an Expedition for the recovery of Macedonia, hoping to juttle out Ptolomy ere he could be well settled; but he having notice of his coming, and enjoying Lyfimachus his Fleet, went and met him at Sea, where he overthrew him, and forcing him to retire into Boetia, then confirmed himself in his Kingdom.

The Macedonian Kingdom.

Ptolomy Ceranus King of Macedonia maketh Alliances.

1. PTolomy, that he might provide for the time to come, made Alliances with other Princes, as Antiochus of Aſia, and Pyrrhus of Epirus, who now being about to paſſe into Italy, made him Overſeer of his ſon, and Kingdom: he alſo wrote to his brother Ptolomy Philadelphus, pretending to acquieſce in the miſſing of that his fathers Kingdom, being ſufficiently ſatiſfied with this taken from his fathers Enemy. Moreover, he counterfeited himſelf to be in Love with his ſiſter Arſinoe, and married her, for that it was according to the cuſtom of Egypt, promiſing to adopt her Children, which he badly performed, for being received by her into Caffandria, he cauſed them to be firſt killed in the boſom of their mother; and then thruſt her out of the Citie, from whence ſhe went to Samoſthracia. At this time the Galls being too many for their own Countrey, under three Captains went to ſeek their fortunes ſo many ſeveral wayes; ſome towards Thrace, under the Conduct of Cereſtrius; others unto Pannonia under Brennus and Acichorinus, and the reſt to Macedonia, being headed by Belgius or Bolgius. Theſe Ptolomy met with a ſtragling company, being more heady than wiſe, reſuſing 20000 men offered him by the King of the Dardanians, and peace by the Galls, if he would but buy it, which he ſcornfully reſected, and answered, he would not yield them it, except they would give up the Chiefeſt amongst them as Hoſtages, and deliver up their Arms. Joyning batrel, his Army was overthrown, and he being ſore wounded was caſt by an Elephant on which he rode, and ſo taken alive by the Enemy. They tore him in pieces, and cutting off his head, put it upon a Lance, and carried it about to the terror of his followers, of which a few eſcaping, all the reſt were either taken or ſlain. This end came Ptolomy to, after he had held Macedonia ſcarce a year and a half.

2. Meleager his brother ſucceeded, but onely for two months; for then the Macedonians caſt him out as unworthy of the Dignitie, and in his room placed Antipater ſon to Philip, the brother of Caffander, whom they firnamed afterwards Eteſia, becauſe he continued but 45 dayes, during which term the Eteſian winds blew. After this ſucceeded an Interregnum (if we look at the title of King) for Soſibenes, who gathering together a company of young men, and thereby reſtraining the pride and coverouſneſſe of the Gauls, though he might have been preferred before divers of Royal Races; yet reſuſed the name, and made the Soldiers ſwear to him onely as General. But Brennus hearing of the good ſucceſſe of Belgius, and what plunder he had got in the Eaſt, with 150000 foot, and 15000 horſe marched thitherwards; but 20000 falling off from him by the way, and turning up for Thrace (where they brought under the Cities of the Propontis) he came into Macedonia, where he made havock of all things. Belgius, as it ſeems, before his coming being repelled or gone, Soſibenes went, and met him with an Army; but carrying too few againſt ſo great a number, was eaſily overthrown; after which the Macedonians ſecuring themſelves in the Cities, Brennus wrought his pleaſure in the Countrey and Villages throughout the Land. When he had ſatiſfied himſelf here, with an Army of 152000 foot, and 20400 horſe, of Celts (or Cimbres) and Illyrians together, he invaded Greece. Each horſeman had two ſervants followed him on horſe-back, who were to ſucceed their dead Maſters; which cuſtom they called Trimarkafia, or Trimaſia rather; for, Mare in the Tenſonick ſignified the whole ſpecies, as alſo in our own

Who with his whole Army is destroyed, Saxon tongue) and so furnished, they entred Theffaly, and came to the Straights of Thermopyla. Here they were opposed by the Greeks, so as they lost many men, till being lead over the Mountains (the same way that in the expedition of Xerxes, Hydarnes passed, and getting over, came upon the backs of the Spartans) the Greeks then fled away, and they went to Delphos then to spoyl the Temple, where with Thunder and Lightning, Cold, falling of Rocks, and the opposition of the Enemy, most of them came to their ends. Brennus himself being wounded, and not willing (or not daring) to outlive this shamefull expedition of which he had been the Author at home, first drinking much Wine killed himself, the rest flying were taken with a Pannick fear, and killed one another for Enemies, and what by this means, the rage of the Countreys through which they passed, with hunger, and cold, scarce any of them ever returned to their homes.

3. During their stay in Greece, Sosthenes died after he had ruled 2 years, Euseb. and then Antigonus Gonatus having made peace with Amicchus Soter, returned, and obtained his fathers Kingdom. Brennus departing into Greece, Justin lib. 25. had left some Gauls to defend the borders, and they lest they should be idle, with 15000 foot and 3000 horse, first fell upon the Geta and Triballi, whom overcoming, they then sent to Antigonus, offering him peace if he would purchase it with money; but especially to spy his Camp. He entertained nobly the Ambassadors, and to deter them from any warlike attempts shewed them his strength at Land and Sea; but they were so far from being afraid, as having an itching desire after prey, they stirred up their Companions to endeavour the attaining of that which they saw, no wayes in words diminishing the goodlinesse of any thing. By night therefore they set upon his Camp, but he being aware of some such thing, had withdrawn his Army and all things into the Wood; therefore they go and endeavour to plunder the Navy, but are so repelled thence with such slaughter, as the credit of the victory over them procured Antigonus his quier, not onely from them, but his Neighbours round about him. About this time these Gauls, which parting at Dadania from Brennus, and going into Thrace, had at several places passed the Sea into Asia, where uniting again under 17 Captains (of which Lautarius and Leoporius were Chief) they helped Nicomedes against Zypaas, who held part of Bithynia, and after he was overcome, waisting the Countrey far and near, divided the Kingdom with him, and fixed themselves about the River Halys, in that place which since has been known by the name of Galligracia or Gallatia, A.M. 3727. the third year of the 125 Olympiad, the Romans being now engaged in the War with Pyrrhus. Idem ibid. & Livius lib. 38.

4. But Pyrrhus having finished his fruitlesse expedition into Italy and Sicily after six years, and being returned home, now wanting money sought an occasion to divert and maintain his Army. He made therefore an excursion into Macedonia (having strengthened himself with a supply of some Gauls) where he took divers Towns, & 2000 Soldiers revolted to him; then marching against Antigonus himself, joyned battel with him. The Gauls on Antigonus his part fought very valiantly; but those which governed his Elephants being compassed in yielded themselves, and the beasts, after which the foot being affrighted, Pyrrhus making sign to them, and calling by name the Officers, drew them all over to his own party. Antigonus fled, but kept some of the Maritime Towns still in his possession, and Pyrrhus became Master of the upper part of Macedonia, and of Theffaly. For all this, Antigonus gave not out, but retiring to Theffalonica, there recruited himself with Mercenary Gauls, and then endeavouring to re-establish himself, was again defeated by Ptolomy, the son of Pyrrhus; so that again retiring to hide himself, Pyrrhus jeered him, and called him impudent, because for all this he put not on a Coat but wore the purple still. He in way of return compared Pyrrhus to a Gamester, which could throw the Dice well, but knew not how to improve his chance; for he knew how to Conquer Kingdoms, and get Victories, but could not improve his Victory, nor retain what he had Conquered, as it had hapned as to this Kingdom before, and now also shortly followed. *Plutarch. in Pyrrho. 5. Scarce two years did Pyrrhus hold Macedonia; for, Cleonymus the Spartan being rejected by his Citizens from being King in the room of his father, procured him to march down against his Enemies. He went down thither with an Army of 25000 foot, and 2000 horse, and wasting their Territories deferred the entering of the Citie till the next day, out of contempt of the small number of the Defendants; who taking that occasion, and making what means they could for resistance, especially the Women, hindered him a little from entering, and when entered, his horse being killed under him, forced him notwithstanding to retreat. During his absence, Antigonus Cienatas recovered again the Cities of Macedonia, and taking it for granted, that after he had done his work in Laconia he would return again thither, thought it best to hasten into Peloponnesus, and prevent him. Being come to Argos, Pyrrhus provoked him to fight for the Kingdom; but Embassadors came to them both from the Town, desiring they would depart from their Citie, and not suffer it (which was observant of both) to come into the power of either. Antigonus obeyed, and sent his son to them for an Hostage, Pyrrhus pretending he would, entered the Citie in the night, being let in by Aristeus; whereupon Antigonus was sent for. He sent in a strong party, & Areus King of Sparta was at hand with 1000 Cretians and other Lacedamonians; Pyrrhus marched up into the Market-place, and there saw a brazen Bull and a Wolf standing in a fighting posture, set there in memorial of Danans his election, and ejection of Gatenor, 1200 years before, which startled him sore, for that it had been told him by an Oracle, that he should die when he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting together. Hereupon he would have retreated, but fearing the straightnesse of the Gates, sent to his son Helenus to break down part of the Wall, and come in; but he mistaking, brought his men and Elephants through the Gate which stopped so up the way, that Pyrrhus in his coming back could not passe, and that occasioned his death.

6. He being sore crouded, what by them, those at his heels, and the Enemy, and sensible of his danger, endeavoured by force to remove the later. Then receiving a wound through his Brigandine with a Lance, turned himself against him that ran at him. This was the son of a poor Woman, who beholding the fight from the house, and seeing him engaged thus with Pyrrhus, took up a stone with both her hands, and cast it down upon the Kings head, which bruising the Vertebrae of his Neck, he fell down from his horse, after which his head was cut off by one Zopyrus. It being brought to Antigonus by Alcyoneus his son, who rejoiced at the sight of it, he checked him, and wept over it, and after caused it and the body to be magnificently burned: his bones being put in a Golden Urn, he delivered to his son Helenus to carry them to his brother Alexander into Epirus, and then receiving his Army, dealt very well with all his friends. After this the Cities of Peloponnesus were betrayed to Antigonus, which caused great stir in that part of Greece; the Galls revolting from him, he cut off at Megara, besieged Athens, and notwithstanding that Patroclus from Egypt, and Areus the King of Lacedamon came to relieve them, yet he kept all Provisions from them, and after they had long stood out came to composition, whereby he placed a Garrison in their Fort Museus, which yet not long after he drew forth again. Areus for want of necessaries was forc'd to return home; but they met again afterwards at Corinth, where Antigonus slew him, and not long after was forc'd to return home; for Alexander King of Epirus, to revenge his fathers death, had invaded Macedonia. Coming thither, his Army revolted from him, so that once more he lost his Kingdom, and was compelled again to shift for himself: But his son Demetrius in his absence gathering some forces together, so ordered the matter against Alexander, that he not onely recovered his fathers Kingdom, but spoiled him also for a time of his own. After this, nothing of great concernment occurs of Antigonus, who died after his first possession of Macedonia 26 years, (having ruled in some Greek Cities ten years before) when he had lived above 80. 7. Demetrius his son succeeded him. He hired Agron King of the Illyrians to relieve the Mydionians whom the Ætolians had besieged, which he performed, though the besiegers were before ready to fall out about their prisoners, whether the old or new Prætor should have the honour to dispose of them and their goods. When it was agreed that both in common should do it, the Illyrians falling upon them, and killing many, forced them to break up their Siege, after which Agron possessed with incredible joy, gave himself up to surfeiting and drunkenness, and thereby falling into a Pleuresie ended his dayes, and was succeeded by his wife Tenza. She being elevated also with the former Victory, and not thinking of any thing from without, gave leave to her Subjects to invade all persons in what place soever by Sea, whereupon they took Phænice the wealthy City of Epirus, and injuring those of Italy, drew upon themselves the displeasure of the People of Rome, which the rashness of their Queen heightened to a War, as will be seen hereafter. But by this act, Demetrius so set the hearts of the Ætolians against him, that whereas before they took part with his Kingdom against the Achaans, now they joyned in league with them against him.

8. He holding yet the Piræus or Haven of Athens, Aratus the Prætor of the Achaans pretending a desire to set the Athenians at liberty from that bondage which thence lay upon them, endeavoured to take it out of his hands, but was overthrown by Bithyes his General, whereupon a rumour arose that he was slain or taken. Diogenes the Governour of the Piræus hearing this, sent word to Corinth to command all the Achaans there to depart the Town; and the Athenians to please him and his party very solemnly rejoiced, wearing Garlands. But Aratus himself then was at Corinth, and hindring Diogenes his design there, marched down to be revenged on the Athenians, and he came as far as the Academy, but then being overcome by entreaty, did them no harm. Some years after this the Ætolians endeavoured to take away part of Acarnania from Epirus, which then Olympias sister and wife of Alexander now dead, governing in right of her sons Pyrrhus and Ptolomy, betook her self to Demetrius, and gave him her daughter Othia in marriage. He had before this the sister of Antiochus King of Syria to wife (Antiochus Hierax as it seemeth, who endeavouring to dispossesse his brother Seleucus of his Kingdom, is called King by Justine) who thereupon fled to her brother, and stirred him up to make War upon her husband. The Acarnanians fled to the Romans for help against the Ætolians, who were then commanded to abstain from their incursions, but despising the Ambassage, harraased the borders both of Acarnania and Epirus; and Olympias having delivered up the Kingdom to her son, they all shortly after died. Demetrius also (whom we read to have also enjoyed Cyrene and all Lybia, but know not how he got it) survived not long after, dying when he had reigned ten years, and so after the death of Alexander the great.

At first he held the Office by the title of Captain General, but afterwards being found moderate and civil, he was saluted King, being surnamed Doson, for that he promised more than he did perform. After the death of Demetrius, the Greek Cities begun to lift up their heads, and the several Tyrants, which, through the encouragement of him and his Predecessors, had got many places, for fear renounced their power, and joyned themselves with the Achaans, who being much revered of a long time by all their neighbour Cities of Peloponnesus for their Justice and Prudence, had united themselves together, in the 124 Olympiad, and drawn some others into a body against the Macedonians. Their affaires were mightily strengthened by Aratus the Sicyonian, who drayning his own City, though but young, joyned it unto them, and afterward by his great wisdom and industrie secured and bettered their condition. The Athenians being encouraged at Demetrius his death, now thought again of recovering their liberty, and he having done what he might before to help them, though in vain, and they again imploring his assistance, though sick, he made himself be caried thither; and whereas Diogenes held for the Macedonians, Piræus, Sunium, Munychia, and the Island Salamis, he perswaded him for a reward of 150 Talents to deliver them all up, twenty of which Talents he presented of his own money. Whilst he thus laboured for the Publick good, especially of the community of the Achaans, the Aetolians envying their condition raised a dangerous War against them, in which Antigonus Doson came to be engaged.

Wherein Cleomenes King of Sparta cometh to be engaged and how.

10. The Aetolians though they had been helped by the Achaans against the house of Macedonia of late, being vexed about the businesse of Mydonia; yet now seeing their union, and the flourishing condition of their body, envying and also fearing it, resolved to disunite if possible, and withdraw the Cities one from another. At this time Cleomenes reigned at Lacedæmon, who resolving to better the constitution of his Country by reducing it to it's ancient form, and taking away the Ephori those impudent and rascally Tyrants, sought for an opportunity of War as most fit to bring about his purpose. Ever since the Victories of Lyfander, luxury and other vices had crept into Sparta, together with the use of riches. And the equality of possessions in Land was taken away by one Epirades an Ephorus, who having a son that displeased him, that he might disinheric him, procured a Law to be passed, that any one might dispose of his Lands, either in his life time or at his death, to whom he pleased. Hereby it was come to that passe, that there being 700 Citizens of Sparta and more, of those not above 100 possessed all the Lands and Estate, and the rest being void both of wealth and honour lay idle at home, unwillingly engaging in War, and expecting an occasion of change. The Ephori tyrannized with unparalleld impudence, domineering over the Kings, and ordering those at their pleasure, the servants of whom they had formerly been. Agis one of the Spartan Kings, of the family of Enryion, the son of Eudamidas, and the sixth from Agessilaus, burned with a desire of bettering the state of affaires, and as a means unto it, endeavoured the reduction of Lycurgus his model for the equal division of Lands; but Leonidas his Colleague being of a luxurious temper opposed him, and he was wickedly murdered by the hands of the Popular Villains the Ephori.

Leges Plutar-
chum in Agide

11. This noble spirited man being taken away, and his brother Archidamus destroyed, Cleomenes the son of Leonidas was King alone, and being of a far different temper from his Father, upon hearing what Agis had gallantly endeavoured, resolved to pursue and accomplish what he had attempted, and to take away utterly the power of those Popular Tyrants, who usurped the whole authority. Neither did these two Kings desire to become assertors of Popular power by the restitution of the Loss of Lycurgus, but rather of Monarchy; for the restitution of those Lots would not promote the power of the Commons who were still to be kept under, as they were by the Laws of Lycurgus; but onely reduced them to that equality of wealth which might secure them from being insulted over by their fellow Commoners, as they had been of late, by such as had ingrossed the riches of the State. As this might be intended by the two Kings, so it appeareth from Plutarch, that Agis attempted to get himself reputation, and Cleomenes for his preservation, by gaining the good-will of the People, and making them sure on their side when soever they should be ready for the great design of destroying the Ephori. Now though Agis miscaried in his attempt, yet Cleomenes perfected what he had intended. For he surprized the Ephori by his Mercenaries, killed four of the five, overthrew all their chairs except one, which he intended as a Chair of State for himself. Then restored he the Laws of Lycurgus, as to equal possessions and discipline, and for that there was none left of the family of Enryion, made his own brother Leonidas King with him. But as was said, perceiving this change would be better made in War than Peace, he caused the War betwixt the State, and the Achaans, and bribed the Ephori to send him forth in the Expedition.

12. To him therefore the Aetolians sent, and stirred him up against the Achaans;

Achaens; and that they might strengthen themselves, and more easily suppress them, they made peace again with Macedonia, and without doubt had brought about their purpose, had they not had to do with Aratus, who undermined their Councils. They suffered Cleomenes to take in divers Towns which belonged unto themselves, not onely not opposing but confirming him in the possession of them, which Aratus knowing well enough to be intended onely to strengthen him against his party, yet thought none were to be first opposed with War; but after that Cleomenes with great boldnesse had begun to build a Fort in the Territories of Megalopolis, then were the Lacedemonians declared Enemies. At first the Achaens undertook the Warre against them by themselves; partly for that they thought it more honourable and safe to defend their own Estate, and partly for that they were loth to displease Ptolomy (who had been formerly a good friend to them) by seeking for the patronage of any other; but the War going on (Cleomenes now having overthrown the Achaens in divers battels) Aratus thinking it a disgrace for him to be worsted by the young Lacedemonian, and being jealous still of the knavery of the Aetolians, concluded it was high time to look about him; at least for a supply.

13. Considering with himself the power of Antigonus King of Macedonia, and withall his faithfulness; and that he was prone to enter into Leagues and alliances, he resolved to make a Confederacy with him; but that secretly, as well because he knew the Aetolians would seek to prevent him, as for that his people would be discouraged at the thought of expecting help from an Enemy. Knowing therefore the Megalopolitans to be sore pressed with the War (having little help from the Achaens) and how good affection they bore to the Macedonian Court ever since Philip the son of Amyntas, who deserved very well of them, he sent for two of his friends thence (Nicophanes and Cercidas) and dealt privately with them to perswade their Citizens to crave aid of Antigonus. These two were therefore sent to the Achaens, and to Macedonia if they should think fit, who giving way to it, they coming to the King, according to the instructions from Aratus, proposed to him to consider, whither this conjunction of Cleomenes and the Aetolians would tend; and whether when the Achaens were eaten up, he himself would not be in danger, seeing the covetousnesse of the Aetolians, and Cleomenes his ambition could not be contained in lesser limits than those of Greece it self. He answering, that if it should seem good to the Achaens, he would send aid to those of Megalopolis: these being at this much encouraged, laboured to perswade them to give way to it, but Aratus then fearing that if the coming down of Antigonus should breed any inconvenience, the blame would fall all upon him, dissuaded his People from receiving as yet any aid, and made them try first what they could do of themselves, exhorting each particular City to fight stoutly for their liberty: but Ptolomy finding the Lacedemonians now to be more for his purpose to withstand the Macedonian, stirred up Cleomenes against him, and furnishing him with money, he also had brought the Achaens by divers engagements to such a low ebb, as they were now in great danger to lose all, and therefore they implored aid of Antigonus, and Aratus sent his son to confirm whatsoever had been offered on his part.

eth down.
And also Antigonus,

14. He then marched down, though a great difficulty there was at first for this to be hoped for by the Achaens, by reason that the Castel of Corinib Town, and which would be now mighty convenient for the carrying on of the War, they knew not how to restore unto him. But Cleomenes now prospering exceedingly, and having reduced nine Cities into his power, the Corinthians sent to him, offering him their City, and commanded all the Achaens to be gone; so that at this Aratus taking occasion (who before durst not give them up into the hands of the Macedonians without their consent) restored the Castel into the power of Antigonus. Cleomenes (vvhoe after his taking the nine Cities, went and sat down before Sicyon) hearing the intention of the Achaens

Atreus and the King, marched with great speed to the Isthmus, and then fortified the place betwixen the Castle of Corinth and the Mountains Oni with a ditch and bulwark; Antigonus with 20000 Foot, and 1400 Horse, coming through Atubæa (for that the Atolians had forbidden him at his peril to passe through the Straights of Ihermopyla) found no little opposition from Cleomenes, till Argos revolting to Aratus (by the means of Aristoile his friend, who with help from Sicyon set upon the Castel, Meqistomus who was sent to relieve it being slain) so that he feared if this Fort should be taken the Enemy might thereby stop up the passage, and at his ease invade Laconia, he drew down his forces from Corinth; then Antigonus entering Peloponnesus took Corinth in his way, where placing a Garrison he followed Cleomenes to Argos, who having by a wile entred the Town, laboured again to reduce it, and took some parts thereof, but seeing him come down from the Mountains against him, withdrew himself out, and so by Mantineæ returned to Lacedæmon. Antigonus coming to Argos commended and encouraged the Citizens, and thence marching presently for Arcadia, reduced divers Forts, which he delivered into the hands of the Megalopolitans: after which coming to Ægium to the general meeting of the Achaens (where he held consultations with them) he was declared General of all the Associates, and there took up Winter-quarters for his Army, viz. at Sicyon and Corinth.

Is victorious.

15. At the beginning of Spring he gathered up his forces, and besieged Tegea, where the Achaens met him. Having this Town yielded to him, he thence marched speedily into Laconia, where Cleomenes meeting him upon the borders there passed some light skirmishes betwixt them, and then he hearing that the Garrison Soldiers at Orchomenus were coming to help the Enemy, departed so mainly thither, and presently stormed the place at the first onset. Thence moving to Mantineæ, that Town presently was taken, the chief of the inhabitants whereof (because though when Atalus took the City, hee restored them to their former privileges, yet they again revolted, and put all his Garrison to the sword) for their ingratitude were put to death; of the rest part were sold, and part sent into Macedonia, their wives and children made slaves; and their Town was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who thither resolved to send out a Colony, and Aratus being made Prætor, made a Decree for changing the name of it into Antigonía. After this, Antigonus took Herea and Telphussa, and Winter then drawing on he went again to the general Assembly of the Achaens, sending out his Soldiers to their quarters, which Cleomenes taking notice of, and that Megalopolis was three dayes march from Ægium, and wanted a sufficient Garrison, brake in thither secretly in the night, where though he found such opposition as both he and his were brought into great danger, yet became he Master of the place, and so cruelly raged against it (as Polybius a Citizen thereof telleth us) that no hope then seemed to be left of Peopling it again. This City being taken, he marched away to Argos (where Antigonus wintered) to harass the Territories; a rash enterprise as the Vulgar judged, but prudent enough of it self, considering that the King's Army being at a great distance, and he thereby unable to resist, the Argives would then murmur against him, and he thereby be brought into contempt. This hapned just as he imagined, but Antigonus though very much spent of the Prick, lived to the next Summer to regain his credit.

Polybius ibid.
Plutarch, in
Mantineæ.

16. In the beginning of Summer he led towards Laconia in Army of 26800 men (his own and of the associates) which Cleomenes expecting fortified the passage betwixt the two mountains Eva and Olympus, placing his brother at the former, and securing the latter himself, having in all about 20000 in his Army. Antigonus wondering at his skill and industry in this fortification, pitcht his Tents upon the River Gorgyas, bethinking himself what he should do; at last finding all passages made up, they both agreed to try the matter in battle. At the beginning of the fight those on Cleomenes his party with the light Armour placed amongst his Horse, seeing the Illyrian cohorts not to be backed by the Acheans, fell upon their Reer, and had done great mischief, but that Philopomenes a Megalopolitan (then but young) giving notice of it to the Officers, and they not regarding him, stirred up his fellow Citizens, and fell upon the Enemies horse, which made the other return to their former place to help their Companions. After this the fortune of the day inclined to Antigonus his side, for Euclidas undid himself by the bad choice of his ground, receiving the Illyrians not on the side of the Hill, (whereby though he might have been repulsed, yet still he might have had the advantage of being higher than the Enemy) but just on the top, so that being thence removed, and forced downwards on the other side, the Illyrians had the advantage of him. Cleomenes perceiving his brother overthrown, and the horse on the plain to have the worst, for fear the Enemy should compass him in, was forced to remove the carriages from behind his Army, and draw it out as well as he could to prevent that. Then the Files coming to be engaged, Antigonus pressing upon the Macedonians in great violence with his doubled Files, put them to flight, and many being slain, Cleomenes escaped with a few in his Company, and got to Sparta.

Defeateth
Cleomenes.

27. Cleomenes coming to Sparta, advised the people which flocked about him to receive the Conquerour, and then by night getting to Gythium, thence went to Alexandria in Egypt, whereas if had either deferred the battel a little longer, or stayed at home, he might easily have recovered his former condition. For, Antigonus suddenly following him got Sparta, and very nobly, and with great humanity used the Citizens, restoring to them their ancient liberties, but shortly after was constrained to leave that place, and Peloponnesus also, being called home by an invasion of the Illyrians into Macedonia, where they made havock of all things. From Sparta he came to Tegea, which he again restored into the form of a Commonwealth, and thence to Argos, at the time of the Celebration of the Nemean Games, where by the Decree of the General Assembly of the Acheans in common, and each of the Cities in particular, he had all possible honour given him. After this he marched with great speed into Macedonia, where he overthrew the Illyrians in battel, but got his own death; for with exhorting his Soldiers, and shouting in the fight, he so strained his Lungs that he spat blood, and thereby his Consumption was heightened, which in a short time made an end of him, after he had discharged the Office of a faithfull Guardian, a good King, and of an expert and valiant Captain ten years, A. M. 3782. and the 2<sup>d</sup> of the 139th Olympiad, 100 years after the death of Alexander.

Consumption.

18. Philip then succeeded this his Uncle, and once his Guardian, being sixteen years old, in whom the Prediction of Sibylla was verified, that the Macedonian glory, as it began in a Philip, so it should end in one of that name. Some three years after his coming to the Government he was also engaged in the Social War of Greece, of which the Ætolians and Acheans were the chief parties. For now the Ætolians (who used to live by Piracy and Robbing) being weary of peace, though awed by Antigonus as long as he lived, and having in contempt the youth of Philip, and judging themselves stronger than the Acheans, they desired occasion to begin a War. The first occasion was given by Dorimachus one of their body, who being sent to Phigalea, a Citie of Peloponnesus in the Confines of Messena (under pretence of securing it, and its Territories) to spy what was done in those parts, and seeing the Messenians to live in security, and neglect of any martial Discipline, ever since the peace was made by Antigonus, being covetous gave leave to certain Pyrats to prey upon their grounds and drive their Cattel thence, though they were friends to the Ætolians. They complaining of this to him, he went to Messena, but instead of giving them any relief, he derided, and threatened the Owners of the Cattel, and by the perswasion of Sciron, then Prætor of that Citie, he was secured. It so hapned, that at this time there was one Babrytes a filthy fellow, so like to this Dorimachus, that one could scarce know them asunder had they been clothed alike, as therefore on a time Dorimachus was malapertly inveighing against the Messenians, Sciron answered him, him, Dost thou think, O Babyrra, that we either care for thee, or thy threats? This Jeer so affected him, as to be gone he restored them their goods; but getting him home, it sat so deeply upon his heart, as by pretence of this injury alone did he stir up War against the Messenians.

19. He durst not in publick Conventions perswade the Ætolians to the War, for that his private grudge was sufficiently known, but one Scopas being then Prætor, him he perswaded to joyn with him in the invasion of the Messenians. They two therefore, without any publick Decree, took the advantage of that time, wherein a few dayes onely were remaining to Timoxenus, the Prætor of the Achaans, to continue in his Office (during which time yet Aratus, who was to succeed him, could not execute it) & calling together the Ætolians to the Promontory of Ægium, sayled over into Peloponnesus, and invading the Messenians (who being unable to resist, had secured themselves within their Citie Walls) wasted all with fire and sword. Not onely the Messenians, but the Epirotes, Achaans, Acarnanians, and Alacedæonians also being declared Enemies by Scopas, they gave out Commissions to Pyrats to infest them by Sea. A ship of the King of Macedonia was taken, and being brought into the Haven was sold, with all the men, and things belonging to it; the Sea-Coasts of Epirus were invaded, Thyreas a Town of Acarnania was set upon, and a band of men being sent privately through Peloponnesus, a Castle there was seized on in the Territories of the Megalopolitans, which yet Timoxenus reduced by the help of Taurion, whom Antigonus had left to oversee his affairs in those parts.

20. The Achaans meeting at Ægium, Decreed that aid should be sent to the Messenians; but Timoxenus whose time was not yet out, being slow in his preparations, Aratus who was to succeed him got the publick signet five dayes before the time, made Levies, and sent to the Ætolians to draw away their Forces out of the Messenian Territories; and not to trouble Achaia upon pain of being prosecuted as Enemies. Scopas and Dorimachus hearing the Achaans were gathered together, marched towards the Eleans their Allies (with whom the Ætolians alwayes maintained friendship, that they might the better Prey upon Peloponnesus) so that Aratus hearing this, very indiscreetly, and not like himself (as Polybius sheweth) for that he thought they would retreat, dismissed all his Soldiers except 3000 foot, and 300 horse, with which, and Taurion his party, he marched against them. He constrained them to fight in a disadvantageous place for himself, so that his forces were overthrown by them, and many being slain, the rest secured themselves in the Towns thereabouts, and the Ætolians passing without let or hinderance through Peloponnesus, attempted to take Pellene, and waisting the Territories of the Sicyonians, passed through the Isthmus, and so returned home. After this the Achaans assembling together, Aratus was grievously accused for taking up the Office before his time, disbanding the Army when he knew Scopas and Dorimachus were in Peloponnesus, fighting the Enemy with so few, when he might have easily had aid from the Towns thereabout, and, which was worst of all, for ingaging not his best Soldiers in the plain, but onely skirmishing at the Roots of the Mountains, where the Enemy had the advantage of the ground, besides their being the greater number. But as soon as Aratus appearing put them in mind of his former services, answered to the things objected against him, and craved pardon in case he had failed of his duty in the fight, and desired they would examine the case not maliciously, but with humanity, the people changed so in their affections, as they were angry a long time with his accusers, and rested upon his Counsels alone for the future.

21. These things having given the occasion to the Social war, it presently was decreed against the Ætolians. For, the Achaans meeting together, ordered that some should be sent to the Epirotes, Boeotians, Phocians, Acarnanians, and unto Philip, to acquaint them that they had broken the League now twice by the invasion of Achaia, to desire help against them, and to receive the Messenians into the alliance; moreover it was resolved, that the Prætor should agree with the Lacedæmonians and Messenians, what Forces should be raised by their States. The Ætolians also assembling, that they might make a breach betwixt the Achaans and their associates, resolved to make Peace with the Lacedæmonians and Messenians, but as for the Achaans themselves, they absurdly decreed, that on no other condition would they have Peace with them, except they forsook the society of the Messenians. The Epirotes, and Philip, after audience given to the Ambassadors, willingly received the Messenians into the alliance; but as for the Ætolians, not at all wondering at their carriage (for that it being but agreeable to their custome of piracy and robbing, their custome something excused the badnesse of the action) they resolved still to keep Peace with them. But Scerdilaidas the General of the Illyrians making an agreement with the Ætolians about his part in the booty, with them invaded Achaia, and took the City of the Cynathenses, being betrayed by some Exiles, which their Citizens had lovingly received again; but to pay for their ingratitude, these Exiles were put to the sword as well as the rest, and their City was burnt down to the ground upon the report of the Macedonians coming into Peloponnesus. For, Aratus had sent to Philip again for aid, who came presently with an Army down to Corinth, where the Commissioners from the several associated Cities met him, and unanimously decreed a War against the Ætolians, in the first year of the 140 Olympiad (as Polybius telleth us) and about that time that Hannibal took Saguntum.

Philip marching down the Social War is decreed against the Ætolians.

22. Whilst Philip was about Corinth, great stirs hapned at Lacedæmon by reason of him. For such as were his Enemies there, caused some of his party, lest they should tell how they stood affected, to be slain, and afterwards the Ephors (who had brought the People to decree a continuance in the league with him) to be murdered as they were sacrificing, and then joyned their State to the Ætolians, and after they had heard of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, made a new election of Kings (whereof one was Lycurgus, an obscure man, and not of the race of Hercules) having lived in way of a Free State about three years, ever since they were set free by Antigonus, till this time, when their liberty so called, had bred great strife and emulation. Philip coming to Ægium to the general meeting, the Achaans renewed the leagues and confederacies formerly made with his Ancestors, and then with a great deal of credit he returned into Macedonia, there to make provisions for the War, where spending the Winter in levying Forces, and fortifying that Country against forein attempts, he also so dealt with Scerdilaidas, as hee drew him over from the Ætolians to his own party, by reason they had not made him partaker of the booty, as they had covenanted with him. During this time several associates were sent to for assistance in the War, and amongst the rest the Messenians, who though they gave the occasion of it, yet answered, being overpowered by the Prætors of the Ætolians, that seeing Phygalea was situate in their borders and belonged unto them, they would not assist in the War, except it was first taken out of the hands of the Ætolians. Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian King getting some Forces together, invaded the borders of the Argives, and took several Towns, they not standing at all upon their guard, expecting no acts of Hostility from their friends as they counted them, and then was War proclaimed by the Ætolians against the Achaans. They were much elevated being now in a flourishing condition, the other on the contrary were put to it, for that Philip in whom was their chiefest hope, was onely yet providing for the War: the Epirotes would do nothing till they saw him begin, and the Messenians remained neutrers; but shortly after, the marching of Philip from Macedonia revived their drooping spirits.

Changes at Lacedæmon.

23. For having got together an Army of 15000 Foot, and 500 Horse, he departed from Macedonia, for Thessalie and Epirus, intending through them to invade Ætolia. Coming into Epirus, he was perswaded there by the Inhabitants to set upon the City Ambracus and recover it, (which the Ætolians had gotten out of the hands of the Epirotes) to which he was so unwise unwise as to agree, and thereby lost the opportunity of finishing the War presently, by neglecting to invade the inland Countries of Ætolia, and by harkening to the Epirotes, who more regarded their private profit than the publick good. In the mean time, in Peloponnesus things went on in favour of the Ætolians: for though they had been repulsed with some losse from Ægira, a City of the Achaans, yet Euripidas the General of the Eleans made inroads upon divers of the associates, got much booty, and took divers Towns, with the Castle of the Dimeans; Lycourus the Lacedæmonian took Athenens a Town belonging to the Megalopolitans, and Aratus son to the other the Captain of the Achaans could hire no Soldiers (because behind already with much pay) and with fear and indiscretion managed the businesse. Scopas the Prætor of the Ætolians through Thessalie invaded Macedonia, where wasting all with fire and sword about Pieria, he thence went to Dium, which the Inhabitants thereof not staying his coming, he burnt, and overthrew the images of the Kings. Philip by this time had taken Ambracius in the space of forty dayes, and thereby satisfied the greedy desires of the Epirotes; then hearing what Scopas had done in Macedonia, he passed speedily over the Bay of Ambracia, and through Acarnania invaded the Ætolians.

24. Pitching his tents before Pharæas, after many sharp skirmishes he received that Town upon composition, and overthrew a party of 500 Ætolians, who were coming to relieve it; after which, as he was wasting the Country, the Ambassadors of the Achaans came to him desiring help. He promised to take their businesse into consideration, and marched for Metropolis, the Inhabitants of which flying into the Castle, he burnt the Town, and thence moving towards Compe, some Horse endeavoured to hinder him from passing the River, but finding it to be in vain, retired into the Town, and after this, none daring any more to shew themselves, he passed unmolested through the Country, taking many Towns and Castles, the walls of which he demolished, onely Oeniade he resolved to fortifie. Whilst he thus employed himself, news came from Macedonia, that the Dardaniens had resolved to make an invasion: whereupon judging it requisite to look home, he dismissed the Achaan Ambassadors with this answer, that as soon as he had provided for the security of his own Kingdom, he would use his best endeavour to relieve them. Returning that way he came, with great journeys he passed through Epirus, and when he had arrived at Pella, the Dardaniens hearing of his return disbanded their Army, and then he presently marched back into Thessalie, intending to passe away the remaining of the Summer at Larissa. Dorimachus now being created Prætor of the Ætolians invaded Epirus, and harrying the Country, robbed, and then destroys the Dodonaan Temple; but Philip now in Winter, when it was little expected by any, leaveth Larissa, and passing over his Army from Thessalie into Eubœa, passed through Boeotia, and the confines of Megaris, and about the Winter solstice, cometh to Corinth, whither calling Aratus the elder to him to consult of affaires, he writes to the Prætor, and several Cities of the Achaans, assigning them when and where to meet him.

25. Having taken this order he departed from Corinth to Dioscurium, a City of the Phliasians, and thence to Caphya, where he had appointed the Achaans to meet him, lighting in his way upon a party which Euripidas was leading towards the Territories of the Sicyonians to waste them, whereof 2200 he took; the other being slain by his men, and perishing amongst the high Rocks, 100 onely escaped with their Leader. This victory got him abundance of honour (it being heard he was come, and had overcome also at the same time) which to maintain and increase, after he was come to Caphya, he joyned Aratus the younger to him with about 10000 men, and marched to Psophis an ancient Town of Arcadia, situate in the middle of Peloponnesus, and upon the confines of the Eleans, who then had it in their hands, and whither Euripidas their Captain had now withdrawn himself after his defeat. This place Philip had a great mind unto, as very convenient for the carrying on the War. He got the Town presently, and after that

After this he came into the Country of the Eleans, which giving his Soldiers liberty to sack and plunder, he passed the River Alpheus, and came into Tryphalia including nine Towns situate betwixt Flea and Messena, which also the Inhabitants of the former had got into their possession a few years before, with Aliphira that belonged to Arcadia. Passing his men over by a bridge he caused to be made, he presently took Aliphira, and within six dayes all Tryphalia, though Phylidas was sent from the Aetolians to aid the Eleans with 600 men, to which were joyned 500 Mercenaries, and 1000 of the Inhabitants of Elea. Placing a Garrison in the Castle of Lepreatans, he came to Heræa, where he divided all the booty amongst his Soldiers, and thence marching to Megalopolis, in the midst of Winter, he afterward came to Argos, where he spent the remainder of that Season. During these motions Chilon the Lacedemonian killed the Ephors who had made Lycurgus King, but the fact being not approved, he was glad to betake himself to his heels.

26. Philip invaded again the Territories of the Aetolians, and thence took very much booty, and returning to Argos to winter, sent his Army into Macedonia. At this time Apelles (who was one of them whom Antigonus had left his Guardians) much maligned Aratus, and joyning with Leontius Captain of the Ceratis (called so from the wearing of a short buckler) and Megaleas the King's chief Secretary, resolved to remove Taurion from the Government of Peloponnesus, and Alexander from his command of the Life-Guard, and had he not been hindered by Aratus, he had accomplished his purpose. He had procured also one Eparatus to be chosen Praetor in the room of Aratus the younger, and he managing his affairs very indiscreetly, the King could get neither money nor provisions, but was fain to flee to Aratus for relief; and now it being resolved to carry on the War by Sea, he consulting with his two creatures, determined to stop up provisions from coming to the Army, and went to Chalcis for that purpose. He so managed his business, as he forced the King to pawn his plate, who now sailed against the Cephalemans, whose ships the Aetolians constantly used in their invasions of Peloponnesus, and coming to Paara, there drew up his ships on shore. He laid siege to the City of the Paraenians, and having undermined a piece of the wall, sent Leontius to take the place, but he remembering the conspiracie of Apelles, Megaleas, and himself, to hinder the affaires of his Master, had corrupted the chiefeft of the Officers, and suffered himself to be repelled, so that Philip raised his Siege, and consulted what was to be done. By this time Lycurgus the Lacedemonian King had invaded the Messenians, Dorimachus also the Aetolian had made an inroad into Thessalie, so that from both parts came Ambassadors to crave aid. Leontius counselled Philip to go to Messenia; but Aratus to invade Aetolia again, to whom he agreed, having had experience of his wisdom, and beginning now a little to trust the other.

27. Writing to the Praetor of the Achaens to relieve the Messenians, he invaded their Country, and taking Thermus, gave his Soldiers leave to plunder the Villages, in revenge for what the Aetolians had done at Dius in Macedonia, rifled and burnt the Temple, for which he is grievously reprehended by Polybius. After this returning on shipboard, Leontius and Megaleas in their cups so abused Aratus, as to throw stones at him, for which the former escaping, the latter was imprisoned and fined twenty Talents at a Council of War. Philip then sailed to Corinth, whence sending messengers to the associated Cities to meet him at Tegæa, he marched thither in two dayes, and getting some Forces together he invaded the Lacedemonians, and wasted their territories far and wide, put to flight Lycurgus who came out of the City against him, and then returned again unto Corinth. Whilst he prepared to attempt some notable thing upon Phocis; Leontius, Megaleas, and Protony, moved the Soldiers to sedition, which though he knew very well, yet dissembled he it at present, but Leontius sent for Apelles from Chalcis, who there there had very naughtily behaved himself, and now returning was not entertained by the King after the usual manner, nor admitted to the Council. Megaleas hereat being affrighted fled, leaving Leontius behind him ingaged for the twenty Talents, whose Soldiers Philip sent with Taurion into Triphylia as upon service, and then threw him in prison for the payment of the money, and not long after (the Soldiers malapertly interceding for him, that he should not be tried till their return, otherwise they should take it as a great affront) he put him to death. Then came he to Patra, where he had appointed the Deputies of the Cities to meet him about a Peace with the *Ætoli*ans, which the Rhodians and Chians had by Ambassadors moved both parties to. Here letters of Megaleas were brought to him, wherein he stirred up the *Ætoli*ans to proceed in the War, for that he would be in great straights for provisions, whereupon he judging Apelles to have been the chief cause of those evils, sent him in custody to Corinth, and ordered Alexander to go to Thebes and pursue Megaleas. He hearing this killed himself, and Apelles died soon after.

Ptolomy put to death for treason.

28. The *Ætoli*ans hearing of these stirs in Philip's Court, and thinking thereby some great sedition would be raised, put off their meeting at Rhium about the peace, which he was not at all sorry for, but exhorted the associates rather to bend their minds towards thoughts of War. Then, coming to Demetrias, there was condemned Ptolomy, Apelles his Companion, by the Macedonians, and put to death; then, for that Winter was now begun, having sent his Army before, he himself followed into Macedonia. The next year he got Bylazora the chiefest Town of Paonia into his hands, and Thebes Pibiotick also, which the *Ætoli*ans holding, much molested Theffaly: but receiving news that Scerdilaida being revolted, made great waste of all things about Malea, he returned into Peloponnesus at the time of the celebration of the Nemean Games. Here he received letters that Hannibal had overthrown the Romans at the Lake of Trasymene, and Demetrius Pharius, who had waged War with the People of Rome, for the Illyrians, advised him to make Peace with the *Ætoli*ans, and undertaking the affairs of Illyricum passe thence into Italy, and think of no less than arriving at the Monarchy of the World. Being elevated with this fancy, he perswaded the Acheans to agreement, and then sending Taurion and Aratus to the *Ætoli*ans, who desired a Treaty, at their request he went also himself down to them, and made Peace on this condition, that all parties should enjoy what now they held. Agelaus of Naupactus perswaded the Greeks to imbrace amity, lest cutting one anothers throats thus, they might be devoured by the Carthaginians or Romans. So all the Cities returned to their ancient wayes and customs, and this Social War ended after it had continued four years, in the sixth of the reign of Philip, the first of the 141 Olympiad. A. 29. Philip applied himself to the recovery of the Cities which had revolted from him, and then thought of nothing more than settling the affairs of Illyricum, necessary for the promoting of his designs, especially the invasion of Italy, upon which his mind was so settled, as sleeping and waking his fancy ran wholly upon it, being spurred on by Demetrius Pharius, not so much for any great affection born to him, as for the others private interest, who thought hereby to recover the Island Pharus, which once he enjoyed; and out of hatred to the Romans, who having overthrown him in War, about this time sent to demand him of Philip, to whom he had fled. After he had recovered the Cities, and sent his Army to the Winter quarters, he bethought him that there would be need of ships for the carrying on of his project; not for fighting with the Romans, but conveying of his men, so that he caused 100 swift Barkes to be built, and in the Spring exercising his Soldiers a little in rowing, away he goes through Euripus near to Cephalenia, hearkening continually after the Roman Fleet. But the report of it's coming, after a short time put his men into such a pannick fear, that though he was now going towards Apollonia, he racked about, and in great disorder after a day and a nights sail came back again to Cephalenia. For all this he was not discouraged from his enterprize, but understanding how Hannibal prospered in Italy, thought good to make him his friend, and thereby get an entrance in thither. So this year being the 4th of the 2d Punick War, he sent Ambassadors to him.

The Terms of their Alliance.

30. The Ambassadors landing near to the Temple of Juno Lacinia, went Idem lib. 23. through Apulia towards Capua where Hannibal then lay; but in their way fell into the Roman Guards, by which they were brought to M. Valerius Levinus the Prator, then lying about Numeria. Being thus entangled, Xenophanes, one bolder and wiser than the rest, told the Prator they were come from Philip to make a League and Alliance with the People of Rome; at which he rejoycing, that after the revolting of their Associates in Italy so great a Prince should desire their friendship, entertained him and his fellows very lovingly, and sent them away with some to conduct them, so that coming into Campania they presently got to Hannibal. The Alliance was made on these terms, that Philip with as great a Fleet as possible (200 ships he thought he could procure) should passe into Italy, waste the Maritime parts thereof, and help to carry on the War both by Sea and Land: that Italy being Conquered should all fall to Hannibal, and the Carthaginians, with all the spoil; and then they should passe into Greece, and there make War upon what Princes or States Philip pleased, who should enjoy whatever places could be got, either in the Continent or Islands; he being willing to content himself with these conditions for a beginning. Things being thus concluded, the Ambassadors were dispatched away, and with them some sent from Hannibal, who shipping themselves again where they landed before, were discovered by the Romans, who lay upon the Coasts of Calabria, and taken. Xenophanes, having had such good fortune before, with his skill attempted the same thing again, but the habit and language of the Carthaginians discovered them, and the League being found about them, all was brought to light, and confessed; and then they were sent to Gracchus the Consul to Cuma, and by him to the Senate.

31. The Fathers entred into serious debate about it, being much troubled to find, that though they were scarce able to undergo the Carthaginian War, they should be engaged in another with the Macedonian; yet notwithstanding they were not dismayed, but considered how they might make work for Philip at home, thereby to divert him from Italy. Having therefore imprisoned the Ambassadors, and sold their followers, they gave order for fifty ships fitly furnished to hover about Italy, and if the Kings attempts should appear answerable to the Ambassage, Marcus Valerius the Prator was then to invade Macedonia. Whilst these things were in hand, one of the ships which being taken accompanied the Ambassadors to Rome, escaped, and acquainted Philip how things had passed, who then not knowing what was done or concluded betwixt Hannibal and himself, sent Messengers, who dispatched the business with better successe, but the Summer was too far spent for him to do any thing this year. These high thoughts and designs he now had in his head did so puff him up, that from an excellent Prince as he was at the first, he turned tyrannical as men judged, so that he began to wax harsh against the Cities of Greece, being set on by Demetrius Pharius, who advised him to get Peloponnesus into his own power, and for that purpose to seize on the two horns of that beast, (as he accounted them) the Castle of Corinth, and also that of the Messenians, who being now at odds amongst themselves, he laboured to increase their differences; and for that Aratus was displeased at it, and laboured to diswade him, he cast him out of favour. The year after he had entred into League with Hannibal, finding it yet not convenient to make for Italy, he took Oricus a Town of Illyricum, in order to the besieging of Apollonia, both which had joyned themselves in society with the Romans fifteen years before. But when Levinus the Prator heard of it, leaving the Coast of Brundisium to the care of P. Valerius, he hasted to Oricus, and presently recovered it, and afterwards sent a party under the Conduct of Navius Crispus, which getting into Apollonia, afterwards fell upon the Macedonians cedonians lying so securely in their Camp, that about 1000 men entred the Trenches before it was perceived. Hereupon followed such a Pannick fear, as no body endeavoured to repulse the Enemy, and 3000 were slain and taken here, the King getting out of his bed, fled half naked to the ships, which Lavinus being aware of, secured the mouth of the River, so that he was forced to fly with a poor and unarmed Army by Land into Macedonia.

32. About this time, being angry with Aratus, for being agrieved at his ill usage of the Messenians, he now procured him to be poisoned by the help of Laurion his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus. At the first the thing was not known, it being a slow working poyson, but Aratus himself was not ignorant of it, yet shewed such calmnesse of mind as he acquainted none with it, but Cephalo his neirest attendant, who observing him to spit blood upon the Wall, he onely said, This reward O Cephalo have we for our friendship to Philip; but after his death he was honoured by all the Achaens as an Hero. Philip about this time casting his thoughts upon Illyricum, got Lysus a strong Town thereof, and Acrolyssus its Castle into his power, having divided his Army into two parts, one whereof he hid on the Land-side, and drew the Defendants towards the sea with the other, so as they in ambush entred the Castle without opposition (otherwise impregnable) after which he got the Town, though with much trouble, and then most of the Cities out of fear submitted unto him. But the same year M. Valerius Lavinus withdrew the Ætolians from their society and alliance with him, by shewing them the civility of the Romans towards their friends, and especially by putting them in hopes to recover Acarmania again into their power, having Scopus the Praetor and Dorimachus to back him in this perswasion. In the League also were to be included the Eleans and Lacedemonians, Attalus King of Asia the lesse, Pleuratus of Thrace, and Scerdilaidas of Illyricum, if they pleased. Lavinus took presently Zacynthus an Island near to Æolia, having a Citie in it of the same name, Oeniada also and Nassus, Towns of Acarmania, all which he gave to the Ætolians, and then judging he had made work enough for Philip to keep him at home, that he should not think of the invasion of Italy, or of Hannibal, or the Carthaginians, he departed to Corcyra.

33. He was Winttring at Pella, when the news first came to him, therefore as he had determined to passe into Greece in the Spring, and first to invade, and awe the Illyrians, he now made incursions thither, after that into Pelagonia, and then took a Citie of the Daydanians in the Borders of Macedonia, being as it were the Key into their Countrey. After this he hitted into Thessalie, where leaving Persens with a party to restrain the Ætolians, he thence marched towards Thrace against the Mædi, which were wont to make inroads into Macedonia when the King was absent in the Wars; from them he took Jampharnia, and attempted other places. But the Ætolians now aiming at, and expecting great things, because of their conjunction with their Romans, struck terror into almost all the other Greeks; wherefore the Achaens, Boeotians, Eubœans, Epirotes, and Acarnians implored his help, for all which he provided as well as he might, and sent a party to defend Preparethus the Island, at which he heard that Attalus coming into Europe, arrived, being chosen by the Ætolians their Commander in Chief. Scopus the Ætolian hearing he was gone into Thrace, invaded Acarmania, the Inhabitants whereof sending away their Wives, Children, and Aged into Epirus, vowed never to return except as Conquerors, rather than to be again enslaved under the Ætolians. This the Enemy hearing, was something amuted at their resolution, and then knowing of Philip his coming, returned home, and he when he heard they had so done, returned also unto Pella. The year after he succoured the Achaens sore molested by Machanidas Tyrant of Sparta, and the Ætolians, &c. went against Lamia, a Citie of the Ætolians, who coming out to meet him, he overthrew them in two several ingagements, after which they shutting up themselves in the Town, he drew down his Army to Phalara a Maritime Citie of Thessaly, whither Ambassadors came from Psolomy, the Rhodians, Cbians, and Athenians, to compose the difference betwixt him, him, and the *Ætoli*ans, though not so much out of love to these, as for fear that Philip and his Kingdom should grow too great, and become burdensome to the liberty of Greece. The Treaty was put off to the meeting of the States general of the *Acha*eans, and a Truce made in the mean time for thirty dayes.

34. It was also began with this design, to keep Attalus, or the Romans, from coming into Greece; but the *Ætoli*ans observing the Term of the Truce almost to be expired, and hearing that Attalus was come to Ægina, and the Roman Navy to Naupactus, hindred the conclusion; first complaining of some things done during the Truce, and then plainly refusing to agree, except the *Acha*eans would restore Pylus to the Messenians, and except the Romans, Athamanians, Scerdilaidas, and Peuratus were included in the peace. Philip holding it an unworthy thing that those who had the worst of it in the War should give Laws to the other, broke up the meeting, and leavying 4000 men for a defence to the *Acha*eans, went to Arges. In the mean while P. Sulpicius coming with the Roman Fleet from Naupactus, landed betwixt Corinth and Sicyon, and wasted the Countrey; but Philip lighting upon his men drove them to their ships, and then going to Dyma, cast out thence the Garrison of the *Ætoli*ans, called thither by the Eleans. Their Territories he also wasted (Cycliadas the General of the *Acha*eans having united his Forces with his) and then went against the Citie it self. It hapned that Sulpicius was secretly got in thither with 4000 men, which struck a terror into the besiegers as soon as they espied the Roman colours, and Philip would fain have drawn off his men; but a skirmish being begun he was forced to charge the Roman Cohort with his horse. His own horse being shot under him, a sharp conflict followed about his person now on foot, but being overpowered, he was rescued by his followers, and mounting another fled away. Then pitched he his Tents five miles from Elis, and the next day marching to Pyrgus a Castle not far off, there took a multitude of Countrey people, which with their Cartel had fled thither for protection; but as he was dividing the plunder, a Messenger came out of Macedonia, and informed him, that a certain man of the *Æro*pians had taken Lychnidus, and was raising the *Dardani*ans; wherefore leaving 2500 men under the Government of Menippus and Polypbas, for a Guard to the *Acha*eans, away he marched into Thessaly, where he heard the *Dardani*ans had invaded his Kingdom, and that he was reported to be slain. After his departure Sulpicius went and wintred at Ægina with Attalus, and the *Acha*eans fought prosperously against their Enemies.

35. The year after, P. Sulpicius Galba the Proconsul and Attalus departing from Ægina with their Navies joyned together (which made up fifty sayl) came into Eubœa, and there took Oreus through the treachery of Plator the Governour. Philip now being at Demetrias, great complaints came to him of the *Ætoli*ans, who being very high, troubled grievously the Associates; the *Acha*eans moreover being molested again by Machanidas Tyrant of Lacedamon, and desiring aid, he dismissed the Messengers with promise to provide for the safety of all as near as he could, and appointed fires to be made on the tops of the Mountains, with a Watch-Tower, to give him warning if the Enemy invaded the Sea-Coasts. The fires upon the coming of the Navy to Oreus were by the cunning of Plator made too late; but upon the sign given he hastened with his Army (having bearen off the *Ætoli*ans who opposed him at the Straights of Thermopyla) and came to Elatea a Town in Phocis. Attalus at this time, & the Proconsul having attempted Chalcis to no purpose, came to Opus, which being taken, the King's Soldiers were to have the plunder of it, as the Romans had before of Oreus. Here he staying too long to gather money, was almost surprised by Philip, and hastening to his ships, had not got all his men aboard before he fell upon him; then departing to Oreus, he there received news that Prusias King of Bithinia had invaded his Kingdom, so that he presently returned home, and Sulpicius to Ægina. Philip chiding the Opuntians for yielding so soon, went, and took Thronium inhabited by them of Thebes Pibiotick, who being outed thence by by him 8 years before, as we said, the Ætoliens had given them this Town to dwell in. After this returning to Elatia (where the Ambassadors of Ptolomy and the Rhodiens stayed his coming to move him again about the peace) and hearing that Machanidas had determined to set upon the Eleans, he resolved to prevent him. Machanidas hearing of his coming, retreated presently to Sparta, and then went he to Ægium to the general Council of the Achaens, to whom he restored Heræa and Triphylia; and Aliphera to the Megalopolitans. He made some depredations upon the Ætolians, then returned to Oreus, and so to Demetrias, where he gave order for making of ships; (things being quiet there after the departure of Attalus) and so into his own Kingdom against the Dardanians.

36. The two years following, little or nothing was done by the Romans in Greece, so that the Ætoliens being destitute of their aid (in which they most confided) were forc'd to make a Peace with him on his own terms.

The Ætoliens forced to make a peace with him.

Scarce was it concluded, when Publius Sempronius the Proconsul was sent to succeed Sulpicius (who carelessly managed his affaires) with 10000 Foot, 1000 Horse, and 35 Gallies, who coming to Dyrrhachium raised the Parthini, and set upon Damallum. Coming a little after to Apollonia, Philip having received the news of his arrival, marched down thither, and would have given him battel, but the Proconsul refusing it, and he not daring to attempt the Town, as also because he was now inclinable also to Peace, he returned again into his own Kingdom. Not long after the Epirotes bearing also the same mind, sent to him, desiring he would think of Peace, which they despaired not of, so he and Sempronius would but meet together. He condescended to go down into Epirus, and then came to an interview with the Proconsul at Phœnice, together with Aminander King of the Athamanians, and the Deputies of the Epirotes and Acarnanians, where it was agreed that the Parthini, the Cities Dimalum, Bergulum, and Eugenium, should fall to the share of the Romans, and the Atintana (because they had desired it from the Senate at Rome) to Philip: in the confederacy were included on the Kings part, Prusias King of Bithinia, the Achaens, Bœotians, Thessalonians, Acarnanians, and Epirotes, and on the Roman, the Inhabitants of Ilium, King Attalus, Pleauratus, the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians, with Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, and successor of Machanidas, slain in battel by Philopomenes, who now had begun to defend his Country from the Lacedæmonians and others. A Truce was made for two months, to have the consent of the People of Rome, who now having turned the War into Africk upon the Carthaginians, were glad to free themselves from all other troubles, and therefore the Peace was confirmed by the suffrages of all the Tribes.

A general peace made betwixt him, the Romans, and others.

37. But Philip's mind was so incited to action, that he could not but make himself work; for perceiving Philopomenes (now Prætor the second time of the Achaens) to be in great respect for his military skil and valour, he sent to murder him at Megalopolis, which being discovered, he deservedly incurred the displeasure of all Greece. He kept some correspondence (together with Antiochus the Great) with Ptolomy Philopator, when living; but after his death, they two consulted together to deprive his young son of his Kingdom, and might well have done it (especially seeing the Egyptian Court was much vexed by the discord of the great ones) had they not both been diverted by the Romans, and punished justly, as Polybius observeth. And though he had been reconciled to the Ætoliens, and used them as his friends and allies, yet now without any pretence did he withdraw Lysimachia from their society, and joyned it to himself, after that Chalcedon; and to gratifie his Son in Law Prusias of Bithinia, enslaved the City of the Ciani, though the Ætoliens had sent them a Captain who commanded in chief, which cruelty so incensed the Rhodiens, as ever after they became his Enemies, and joyned with Attalus King of Asia against him. Very stoutly did he deal with these his adversaries, never being discouraged by any bad successe. He had the worst of it in a battel at Sea near Chius, but driving Attalus on Land, and taking his ship (though he had never lost so many men in any battel whatever before) he ascribed the Victory to himself. For all this War in which he was imployed by two powerful adversaries, yet feared he not to undertake another with the People of Rome, which now a few months after the end of the second Punick War was decreed against him, about fourteen years after his entering into confederacy with Hannibal, of his own reign the 23, and the first of the 145 Olympiad. 38. For though there had been a peace made, yet it was conceived he had broken it by his molesting the Ætolians, and other associates, and of late by sending aid to Anniba in Africk, and the Carthaginians: The Athenians by their Ambassadors also called upon the Senate for help, whose Territories he had wasted, and forced them up into the City. The occasion of the War betwixt him and them was from the Acarmanians; for two young men of that Nation coming to Athens, chanced to go into the Temple of Ceres with the other company at the Feast, being not initiated, and for that reason were put to death, as having committed an unpardonable offence, though ignorantly they did it; now this the Athamanians took so to heart, as they procured Philip to make War upon them. At the same time were come to Rome Ambassadors also from Attalus, and the Rhodians, complaining that the Cities of Asia were also molested by him; so that now having little to do after the ending of the second Punick War, the Senate unanimously made a Decree, by virtue whereof Marcus Levinus the Viceprator was sent into Macedonia with 38 ships brought out of Sicilie by Cn. Octavius: Afterwards came news further that he was about to take Athens, and then it being proposed to the People, the War (through the perswasion of Publius Sulpicius * the Consul, to whom it fell by lot) was decreed against him. He had not besieged that City himself, but, sending down Philocles one of his Caprains thither, went and subdued the Chersonesus of Thrace. Onely the Inhabitants of Abydus stood out against him, and that with such resolution, as following the example of the Saguntines in Spain, they fought it out to the last, and made an end of themselves, after he had denied to receive them upon any other terms than yielding to mercy. Yet Attalus and the Rhodians might have relieved them had they not loitered.

39. Sulpicius the Consul coming to Apollonia, upon the desire of the Athenians, sent C. Claudius Cento with twenty ships out of the Fleet which lay at Corcyra, furnished with Soldiers, to relieve their City. He hearing that Chalcis was badly looked to, though fortified with a Garrison of the Macedonians, went thither, took it with ease, then plundering it set on fire, and returned to the Piræus, or Haven of Athens. Philip was now come down to Demetrias, where hearing this news he passed over Euripus on a bridge, and through Boeotia hasted to Athens, thinking to surprise the Town; but the Inhabitants having got notice of his coming, stood upon their guard, and then he perceiving his craft failed him, betook himself to force; but this being to no purpose (the Romans coming in, and the Soldiers of Attalus from Ægina) wasting all about the Town, and not sparing so much as the Sepulchers, he went to Eleusine thinking there to get the Temple and Castle into his power; but the guards being strong, and the Navy coming to help from the Piræus, he marched thence to Megara, and so to Corinth. Hearing now that the Acheans were met at Argos, to consult how to resist Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, he went down thither, and came upon them unawares, and promised he would make War upon him, on condition they would but find him Soldiers to keep Oreus, Chalcis, and Corinth. His design was to engage them in the War against the Romans, which they very well understood, and therefore Cycliades the Prator answered, that it was not lawful to propose any other matter than that for which they were assembled, and so a Decree being made for raising an Army against Nabis, hee broke up the meeting.

who performed what he went about, taking divers Towns of Macedonia, and then returned with much booty. Philip being come home, made all provision possible for the War, and knowing the restlesnesse of the Aetolians, for fear they might side with the Romans, (which yet they had not done) sent his Ambassadors to the general meeting of them called the Panaetolium, whither came also L. Furius Purpureo, sent from the Consul, and others from the Athenians. The Macedonian being first heard, advised them to remain in their society with him; the Athenians inveighed bitterly against Philip, as having broken the Laws of humanity and religion, in violating their Sepulchers, and Temple; then Purpureo sheweth how the Romans had undertaken the War for them, though they formerly made Peace without them, and now how good an occasion was offered them of being restored into their friendship and society, except they would rather perish with Philip. This inclined all their minds towards the Romans; but Democritus the Praetor thought the business was to be put off to the next Council. But not long after Philip fought twice with the Consul, and that so unprosperously, as he had like to have been taken himself, and then they embraced the society of the Romans, and invading Macedonia, took and burnt Cercinium, after which going into Perrhabia, Philip set upon them at unawares, and killing many, forced the rest to flee for their safety under the conduct of Aminander into their own Country. This year the Roman Navy joyning to that of Attalus and the Rhodians, took the Island Andrus, and Oreus, the City we have often spoken of, in Eubœa.

41. Philip taking all care possible for the managing of his affaires, the next Spring sent down his Auxiliaries and others through Epirus into Chaonia, to seize upon the Straights near Antigonis, and he himself following after with the strength of his Army, fortified the Vallie betwixt the Mountains, through which the River Aous runneth; Athenagoras his Lieutenant he commanded to look to the Mountain Asnaus, and he himself pitched his Tents upon the hill Æropus. To Sulpicius the Consul succeeded P. Villius Tappulus, who coming late did nothing at all, for leading towards the Enemy, he with a few went to view the Moors, through which his nearest way lay to him, and consulting many dayes whether he should passe that way, or take the same Sulpicius went into Macedonia, before he could determine, news came to him, that his Successor was already come to Concya. This was T. Quintius Flamininus, created Consul ere he was thirty years old, who falling this Province came sooner than usual, bringing over with him 8000 Foot, and 800 Horse. Being arrived at the Camp, after some consultation, he determined to set upon Philip's Army in the place where it yet lay; but how to do it was hard to be resolved, and forty dayes were spent in this deliberation, which time Philip was content to make an opportunity to look after Peace, and attempt the procurement of it through the Epirotes. They met at the River Aous (or Apfus) but the Consul demanded things seeming so hard to the other, that he asked him if he would impose more hard conditions upon one conquered? and so withdrew himself from the conference.

42. The next day followed some light Skirmishes, neither part receiving either much good or damage, but as they continued in this condition, came a certain Shepherd, sent by Charops Prince of the Epirotes, undertaking to lead the Romans through the Mountains an easie way, and bring them upon the Enemies back. The Consul glad of this opportunity, sent a party with him, and then gave an Alarm with the whole Army to the Camp, which the Macedonians received willingly enough, and both Armies being greedy of fighting, they marched out of their Trenches to receive the battel; but then those on their backs setting up a shout, struck them with such terror, that some of them ran away, others by reason of the difficulty of the place for fight were compassed in, and 2000 slain. The King fled again till he came five miles off, and then rallying his men upon an hill, with a great Company went into Thessaly. Where wasting divers Towns to deprive the Enemy of Provisions, he thence passed into Macedonia. The Consul following him into Thessaly, laboured to get the good will of the Epirætes, and called to him Aminander King of the Arbamanians to conduct him on his way; then took he Phaleria (where were in Garrison 2000 Macedonians) which he plundered and burnt, at which also others being affrighted yielded themselves, and Philip not daring to oppose, but keeping within Tempe, sent relief upon occasion to such places as wanted. At Rhaga the Consul found such opposition as he raised his siege, but thence departing took in divers Cities of Phocis, and besieged Elatea, during which things the Navy under the conduct of L. Quintus, his brother, in Conjunction with Attalus and the Rhodians, took two of the most considerable Towns of Eubœa, and then prepared to venture for Corinth; but by the Consul's advice, they first sent to the Acheans to see if they might draw them from Philip to their own party.

The Acheans

43. Aristæus or Aristinæus (as he is called by Polybius) their Prætor, laboured to perswade them by all means to imbrace the society of the Romans, at which the Dymeans and Megalopolitans out of distaste went out of the Council, as unwilling thus to betray Philip, and the rest unanimously entered into Alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians, and for that they could not do as much with the Romans without consent of the People at Rome, put it off onely till they might send their Ambassadors thither, and Decreed at the present to dispatch away three to Lucius Quintus, and their Army also to Corinth before which he now lay. The Town was stoutly defended by the Inhabitants, and Androsthenes the Governour for the King, till such time as Philocles came with 1500 fresh men to their relief, after which it seemed best both to Attalus and Quintus to raise their siege, and then Philocles had Argos betrayed to him. The Consul in this mean time got Elatea, and then taking up his Winter quarters, news came that the Opuntians were at odds amongst themselves, some calling the Ætolians, and some the Romans, desirous to give up their Citie to them. The stronger and richer part called the Consul, but the Castle was still held by the Macedonians, who could not be got out by any fair words or foul, and when it should have been stormed came an Herald from Philip, desiring a time and place might be set for a meeting to treat again of peace, which being granted, they met in the Bay near Nice at the day appointed, where Philip would not come ashore for fear as he pretended of the Ætolians. Much talk there was on both sides, the treaty being put off from one day to another; but it being required of the King to quit all Greece, he refused to do it, having a great desire to keep Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrius; and then at his request he had leave given him to send Ambassadors to the Senate, and a Truce was made for two months.

44. The Greeks sent their Ambassadors also, and all came to Rome, when the debate was about the Provinces of the new Consuls, whether one of them should have Macedonia, according to the custom, or both stay, and carry on the War against the Gauls then depending; for the Tribunes of the people opposed the custom, alleging that the reason was why Wars were so lengthned, because there was every year a new General according to the succession of the Consuls. This being referred to the Senate, it was thought fit to continue the Command to Quintus, and then had all the Ambassadors audience. The Greeks inveighed sore against Philip, and earnestly laboured that he should not be allowed to hold Chalcis, Corinth, and Demetrius, for otherwise Greece could have no thoughts of liberty. They alleged it to his own saying, that these three were the Peeters of Greece, and that not without reason; for if he held Corinth, Peloponnesus could have no breathing time; if Chalcis, the Locrians, Boeotians, and Phocians durst not murmur; and if Demetrius, the Thessalians, and Magnetes should not be able as much as to taste of liberty: seeing therefore he pretended to be willing to quit all other places, this was but a shift for the present, seeing if he was Master of these places he might recover what he had before; therefore they desired he might either relinquish them, or that the War might be carried on, seeing the greatest part of it was finished already. The Kings Ambassadors beginning a long Oration, were interrupted at the first, and asked whether their Master would be willing to leave the three Cities; they answered they had no Commission to answer any thing to that point: and so being chidden by the Fathers they made an end, and the affairs of Greece were again left to the management of Quintius.

45. Philip seeing how things went, wrote to Philocles to deliver up Argos Livius us supra. to Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, on condition that if he prospered he should again restore it to him; but he presently after his getting into the Town, sent word to Quintius, who giving him a meeting, desired he would make peace with the Achaens, and send aid against the King; the later of which he promised to perform, and as for the peace granted a Truce for four moneths. Philip shortly after came down again into Thessaly (it being no policy at all to expect the Enemy in his own Kingdom) which Quintius understanding marched thither, where wandering after each other, they both at length in a thick mist came near to some Hills, from the likeness of the heads of Dogs, called Cynoscephale. Here both their foreguards fixing came to the discovery of each other, and from the skirmishing, and ingagement of them, to a set battel, though the King at first did not intend it. The victory seemed at the beginning to incline towards the Macedonians in one Wing; but the other being overpowered, they both at length were overthrown by the skill and valour of the Romans, 8000 perishing, and 5000 being taken prisoners: Of the Romans 700 were slain. Philip, when he saw how things went, fled towards Tempe; at the entry of which he stayed for such as had escaped, and then passed through that Countrey into Macedonia. The Romans coming to plunder the Enemy's Camp, found the Aetolians got thither before them, at which they sore repined, and grumbled at their General, as if he exposed them to danger, and granted the Prey to others. Flaminius was sore displeased to see the greediness of the Aetolians after Prey; and as this gave occasion to that hatred, which afterwards manifested it self, so it made him the more willing to agree with the Enemy, that he might not leave them Masters of Greece.

46. Philip sent presently to the Roman General to desire another Treaty about a peace, who receiving them in a Council of Officers, without calling the Aetolians, used them very respectfully, and presently granted a Truce for fifteen dayes. This seeming strange to the Aetolians, they presently concluded he was bribed to it by Philip, not accounting better of others than according to their own covetous humour; but he being displeased with them, not onely for the matter of the plunder, but also for that they gave out sleighting words of the Roman valour (attributing the good success to themselves) hearing also that Antiochus King of Asia was coming towards Europe, and so fearing Philip might joyn with him, and then a new Consul coming might take the glory of concluding the War away from himself, he resolved to make an end of the difference, and appointed a day and place to meet at, to which he summoned the Allies. Being met together he willed them to declare their minds concerning the peace, on what terms they would have it made. Aminander very modestly desired Provision might be made for him, else he was like to undergo the malice of Philip, who would be able presently to crush him. The Aetolians were point blank against the peace, saying, all would prove fruitlesse, except the Macedonian were oured his Kingdom, and that Quintius, except he did it, would neither answer the expectations of Greece, nor of those that sent him; to which he replied, that it was not the custom of the people at Rome utterly to undo at once those with whom they warred, and that the liberty of Greece would better be provided for by the standing of the Macedonian Kingdom, so weakened as it was like to be, than by the destruction of it; seeing then it would be obnoxious to the invasion of the Thracians and Gauls. The day after arrived Philip himself, and the next, coming into a full Council there, very wisely allayed the heats of all parties against him, offering to ratifie the former demands

Therefore four moneths Truce was granted to him, according to his desire, and paying to Quintius 400 Talents in ready money, and giving up Demetrius his Son, and others for Hostages, he had leave to send to Rome about the conclusion; but with this caution, that if the business should not succeed, he was to have the Hostages and Money returned back unto him.

47. Both Senate and People admitted of peace, though Marcellus the new Consul laboured against it, out of desire to be sent into Macedonia. Philip was enjoined, besides the setting of all Greece at liberty, before the celebration of the Isthmian Games; to restore all Captives and Renegadoes, to give up all his covered Gallies except 5. and one with 16 Oares on a side, to pay 1000 Talents, half at present, and the other half in the space of 10 years, at so many payments. Into Greece were sent 10 men of the Chief, with whom Flamininus was joyned in Commission, to compose affairs, and restore liberty to the several States thereof, which exceedingly affected all with joy, except the Ætoliens, who carped at the Decree, and affirmed that Greece had onely changed it Lords; seeing the Romans had Corinth, Demetrius, and Chalcis. When the Commissioners came to sit, some controversie indeed arose about these Towns; for they having it in expresse charge to set all others at liberty, these were left to their discretion because of Antiochus, who, as all men thought, had intentions to attempt something upon Europe: therefore Flamininus perswaded them to give up Corinth into the hands of the Achaens, and keep that Castle, Demetrius and Chalcis in their own power. Then going to the solemnity of the Isthmian Games he there pronounced liberty, in that great audience, unto all Greece, which so affected the hearers, as with admiration of the thing they were scarce themselves.

War.

48. During the War between the Romans and Antiochus, which shortly after followed, Philip behaved himself suitably enough to the expectation of the Conquerours: afterwards considering, and comparing his present condition with his former, he grew something impatient, and especially amongst other things, this vexed him, that power of animadverting upon those Macedonians who had revolted in the War, was taken from him; for after that Antiochus was overcome, and the War with the Ætoliens was now in hand, Acilius the Consul taking Heraclea, and Philip besieging Lamia, when he was in a fair way of taking of it, he was commanded to depart from it, that so it might be surrendered to the other. Acilius to pacifie him, gave him leave to make War upon Athamania, and to recover the Cities which the Ætoliens had taken from the Thessalians; so that he presently drove out Aminander from Athamania, recovered divers Cities, amongst which was Demetrius, and possessed himself of the Countrey of the Magneies, and some Cities in Thrace also. This pacified him for the present, yet did he not let fall his indignation, but in time of peace made all provision possible for another War, increasing his Revenues not onely by Customs, but by renewing the works of the Mines, and digging others, as also taking care for increasing the number of his people now exhausted. Whilest he thus employed himself, there wanted not an occasion to inflame his mind anew; for the Thessalians and Athamaniens sent to Rome to complain of him; Eumenes also about the Cities of Thrace. The Senate not being willing to judge the matter in his absence, sent three Commissioners into Greece, to hear and determine it, who sitting, and hearing all parties as Arbitrators, were something provoked by some words he uttered, affirming, that as yet the Sun of all the dayes he had to live was not set; and all being heard, they Decreed he should withdraw his Guards from all the Greek Cities, and that the Kingdom of Macedonia should be terminated by its ancient limits. As for the Cities of Thrace, much being alleged pro and con, betwixt him and Eumenes; they kept the middle way, reserving the decision of that to the Senate, and ordered in the mean time that his Garison Soldiers should be drawn out of them. The Senate resolved he should quit them, and all the Maritime Coasts of Thrace;

so that now being sufficiently incensed, he wanted but convenient Forces to make him revolt.

49. Being commanded to quit Enus and Maronea, with all the Sea Coasts of Thrace, he procured the principal of the Maronites who were strongly bent against him, to be murdered in the night, and then the Romans complaining of it as an unworthy deed, he denied it, and when Onomastus and Cassander the instruments of the fact were required to be sent to Rome, the later he gave way for to go, but then (it's thought) procured him to be poysoned in the way, lest he should tell tales; and as yet his affairs not being ripe for a revolt, he sent Demetrius his younger son to Rome, to purge himself, and deprecate the displeasure of the Senate. Underhand he solicited the inhabitants upon the River Ister to break into Italy. Demetrius had got heretofore so much good-will at Rome, as coming to have audience in the Senate, though he was abashed at that presence, and the heavy loads of imputations laid upon his Father by the Ambassadors of his Enemies, Yet were his Father's faults passed over at this time for his sake, and so much signified to Philip by Q. Marcius, sent into Macedonia to see whether he had done all that was enjoined him. Then did he quit all the Cities of Thrace inhabited by the Greeks, and performed all other things which the Romans required, that he might not give any suspicion, but get leisure to provide for the intended War. With Demetrius his son he was not well pleased, for that the Senate making no account of himself, had given him the credit of deserving onely favour; but especially Perseus his elder son conceived great indignation and malice against him, not onely for the credit he had at Rome, but being jealous he might deprive him thereby of his Father's Kingdom. Indeed the Macedonians looking upon Demetrius as one to whom they were obliged for saving them harmless from the Romans, designed the succession to him, whom also they held legitimate, but not Perseus, whose mother was no better than his Father's Concubine.

50. Perseus growing more and more sensible of the favour his brother was in both with the Romans and Macedonians, bent his mind to bring him into the jealousy and hatred of his Father, and thereby to work his destruction. His visit in way of merriment and jollity to him he represents as an opportunity taken to make him away, whereby the young man is called for by his angry Father, and is forced with tears to make an apology, to which credit is hardly enough given, suspicions and jealousies getting ground. At length Perseus accuseth him of having dealt with them at Rome underhand about the Kingdom and place of his Father, who sends two thither to enquire of it, but such as were Perseus his creatures and partners in the plot. Philip having a mind to go up to the top of the Mountain Hemus, for to have a view and prospect of the Country round about, took with him his eldest, and sendeth his youngest into Macedonia to look unto it, with whom he sent one Didas Governour of Peonia with a small guard. He being also one of Perseus his Complices, he gave him in charge to insinuate into him, and thereby get out his most inward intentions, which he easily did, the poor young man being resolved to flie to the Romans for shelter, and desirous to use his help therein. This is presently made known to Perseus, and by him with improvement to Philip, who having wearied himself and Soldiers to little purpose, and being troubled with this report, returneth home, cast Herodorus, Demetrius his chiefeft friend, into prison, and causeth him also to be narrowly looked to. Some moneths remained the King thus exceedingly troubled and anxious in himself, till the Ambassadors returning from Rome, put an end within a short time to his resolutions.

51. These men being returned, feigned grievous accusations against Demetrius, and amongst the rest brought counterfeited letters as from Quintus, wherein he begs pardon of the King, if the young man had dealt with him in any kind out of his desire to the Kingdom, but promiseth he will do nothing against any one that belongs to him, for that he would not be accounted for the time to come the author of any evil purpose. Credit being given hereunto, Herodorus is is racked to death, confessing nothing, and Demetrius being again accused by his brother of intended flight, is destined to die, though for fear of giving any offence to the Romans, and discovering his intentions against them, it's resolved to be done cunningly. Being sent to Astraum a Town of Paonia, and thence called to Heraclea, he is there first poysoned by Diaas, crying out against the cruelty of his Father, the parricide of his brother, and wickedness of Didas. Being tormented with the working of the Poyson, two lusty Ruffians were let into the room, who stifled him with the tapestry, and so the innocent young man was murdered. His Father within a year or two fell into a sad melancholy for the losse of him, which being perceived by one Antigonus the son of Echeocrates, and Nephew also to Antigonus who was Philip's Father, he having been alwaies a faithful friend to the King, labored to discover to him the whole device, and brought to him one Xyeus, who was privy to the whole design. He laid open the series of all things to him. Hereupon Philocles one of the Ambassadors that were sent to Rome being present, was put to death; Apelles the other, hearing the businesse was come out, fled into Italy, Perseus onely kept him out of sight, but his Father intending to frustrate his expectations of the Kingdom, which he so wickedly sought after, declared Antigonus his heir and successor, saying, he had rather his Kingdom should be destroyed, than ever come into the hands of Perseus. Not long after being spent with extreame grief and melancholy, and having commended Antigonus to the States of Macedonia, and uttered many a bitter curse against Perseus, he died at Amphipolis, after he had reigned 44 years. A. M. 3826, the second of the 150 Olympiad, 146 years after the death of Alexander the Great.

The device is discovered,

Whereat Philip laboureth to disinherite Perseus and dieth of Melancholy.

Yet Perseus getteth the Kingdom, and resolveth to renew the War with the Romans.

52. Had Philip lived a little longer, Antigonus had got possession of the Kingdom by his means; but things being not now ripe, he lost it by the procurement of the Kings Physician, who when he saw there was no hopes of life, sent and acquainted Perseus with it, and kept close his death till his arrival, so that then having opportunity to oppress his Enemies not once thinking of it, he obtained the Kingdom. Being a little settled therein, he caused Antiochus to be slain, and then sent to Rome to renew the League made with his Father, and to desire that he might be owned as King, doing this onely to secure himself for the present, and intending as soon as his affairs would permit, to make use of the preparation his Father had made for another War; as it afterwards proved. His Father a little before his death had prevailed with the Bastarnæ, who lived near the River Ister, to leave their ancient seat, and come and live in the Country of the Dardanians, which he intended to give unto them, that there leaving there wives and children, they might together with the Scordisci (who being some of those Galls that invaded Thrace, had seated themselves at the meering of Danubius and Sabus, and so called themselves) invade Italy. They re-entred Thrace again with quietnesse, but after Philip's death falling out with the Inhabitants, and pursuing them to the Mountains, they were set upon with such a tempest as seized on the Galls at Delphi, and being pressed also by the Thracians, onely 20000 got into Dardania, the rest of the multitude returning back beyond Danubius. Those that arrived in Dardania now did Perseus stir up against the Inhabitants as much as possible, which being distasteful to the Romans, their Ambassadors also returning from Carthage, reported to the Senate that he held intelligence with them there; for his Ambassadors had private audience of them by night, and others were sent by them into Macedonia.

53. About this time some of the Dolopians refusing to obey him, and willing to submit their cause to the Roman Senate, he went down, and by force brought all their Country into his power; he laboured then to curry favour with several Cities of Achaia and Thessaly in his passage, and either sent or wrote to several others in Greece, desiring them that an end might be put to the ancient grudges betwixt his Father and them; the Achaens especially. The Roman Senate upon the report of the stirs in Dardania, sent three to see how matters went, but he refused to see them; it being alleged sometimes that he was absent, and otherwhiles that he was sick; but it clearly appeared to them that he was providing for the War, and so much the more, for that the Æolians were now so seditious, as though their commissions gave them power to take up the differences amongst them, yet could they not prevail by their authority. Indeed now he was better provided to make War than the Romans to resist, having 30000 Foot, with 5000 Horse, in a readinesse, and provisions too for ten years. Thrace was at Peace with him, and though he was so infamous for his cruelty, not onely in respect of his brother's death, but also the killing of Apelles, whom he used as an instrument in that businesse, and also for making away his wife, and upon other accounts, yet either out of reverence to the Court of Macedonia, or by reason of their emulation against the Romans, were both the Greeks and Asiatics generally more favourable to him than to Eumenes the King of Pergamus, though of a clean contrary disposition. Eumenes himself came to Rome to complain against him; to answer to whose accusations he sent Ambassadors, and with them the Rhodiens, who inclined to his side, and as Eumenes returned home, he most basely sent some to murder him, whom though that King escaped as to his life, yet was he sore wounded in the straight passage to the Temple at Delphi: This as it lost Perseus much with his friends, so it made him be the sooner declared an Enemy by the Romans.

54. It was thought good that some forces should be raised to be in a readinesse, and that certain Commissioners should be sent into Greece to retain the States in their fidelity, with Soldiers also to put into such places as wanted. He perceiving their resolutions, began to repent himself, and procured a truce, that he might send Ambassadors to Rome, the Commissioners giving way to it, for that they knew him in a good posture for War, and themselves unprovided as yet; but the Senate for all this would not grant him Peace, his faults being so aggravated against him, that the War was denounced. P. Licinius Crassus the Consul being sent against him, he had the better of it in an engagement; but yet his heart failed him, so contrary to his former humour, as that then he sent and desired Peace, offering to perform all his Father was tied to; but had answer by the stout Romans, that on no other terms could it be granted, except he absolutely referre himself and Kingdom to the courtesy of the Senate, and cast all into their hands. After this he sent to Genthius King of the Illyrians, to draw him to his party, having taken divers Towns from him, and might have done himself good thereby, had he not been besotted; for that Prince was inclinable enough to him, onely he said, he wanted money, which though he had enough by him, yet neglected he to send. He laboured also to draw into his aid Coys King of Thrace, and subdued again the Dardanians, but Quem vult Jupiter perdere, demorat prius. Q. Marcius Philippus coming against him, by reason of the difficulty of the wayes, and want of provisions, might easily have been utterly defeated; but he cried out he was conquered, without fighting ran away, left the Straights open for his Enemy, sent to Thessalonica to burn his ships, to Pella to cast his treasures into the Sea, and then being angry with the messengers, the one for that he had not obeyed him, the other for that he had, he put them both to death, and recovering most of his treasure, by those that dived, out of the water, onely satisfied himself for this madness, by recovering Dius, which had been taken by the Enemy.

The Consul was warie of engaging with him (who now had an Army of 39000 Foot, and 4000 Horse) his own men being tired, but the night before the fight the Moon being eclipsed, so terrified the Macedonians, that they accounted it to preface the ruine of their Kingdom, which made the Romans (to whom it was foretold on purpose) more eagerly to begin the fight. Cato sen to *M. this encouraged the rest, and thereby he was the means to gain the victory. Of the Macedonians were slain 20000, and 6000 taken; of the Conquerours but 100 lost their lives. Perseus fled to Amphipolis, and finding there no relief, sayled to Samothrace, where hoping to be secure in that sanctuary, Cn. Octavius the Admiral being sent after him, promised by the voice of a Crier safety and freedom to all that would come in, whereby he was forsaken of almost all his followers, & Ion of Thessalonica gave up his young children into the hands of the Romans. He thought now of escaping to Crete; but, being left thus, gave up himself, and eldest son to Octavius, when he had reigned 11 years; and after being lead in Triumph by the Consul was cast into prison at Alba, where for seven dayes he lay in a most sad condition, till through the importunity of Emilius it was changed into a better. Two years he thus continued, and then through desire of life and liberty, encouraging himself in new and vain hopes, ended his dayes, some say through the barbarousnesse of his Keepers, who would not suffer him to take any rest, but others, by course of nature in free custody, having his funeral discharged at the publick cost. ### The Asian and Syrian Kingdom.

1. Four or five years after the death of Cassander, it hapned that Antiochus the eldest son of Seleucus fell in love with Serapionice, daughter to Demetrius (which woman we said before that Seleucus married, after her father was overthrown, and beaten out of Asia) and for that he was ashamed to reveal his affection, pined away, and resolved to starve himself, had not his disease been discovered by Erasistratus the Physician, by the changing of his countenance when she came in or out, and by other tokens. Seleucus, who was ready to redeem his sons life with his own blood, presently gave him her to wife, though he had a Child by her; and that the businesse might seem to proceed of himself, calling his Army together, he declared it to be his pleasure to make them two King and Queen of all the upper Countreys, having married them together; and that he thought his son, who had hitherto been obedient to him in all other things, would also herein be ruled by him; but if his wife should distaste so unusual a thing, he desired his friends to shew and perswade her, that whatsoever the King should think fit, and the affairs of State required, that she ought to account of as just, and fitting. After this he took Demetrius her father, and imprisoned him in the Chersonesus of Syria, where he died, after three years as was before said, and within a year after his death fought his last (and the last of Alexander's Companions) battel with Lysimachus, in which he being Conquerour, and his Enemy slain, left Asia wholly to his son, having a desire to go into Macedonia (where he had never been since he came over with Alexander) and end his dayes in his Native Countrey. But as he was journeying towards Lysimachia, he was traiterously slain by Ptolomy Cerannus whom he had lovingly entertained. A. 2. Antiochus succeeded his father, and was surnamed Soter from repelling the Gauls, which in his time at the invitation of Mithridates King of Bithynia had seized on part of Asia. Having with many battels recovered (though not all) his fathers Kingdom from divers, which now begun severally to pluck the parts of so great a body, he sent over a strong party under the Command of Patrocles beyond Taurus, who took to himself Hermogenes for his Lieutenant. He intended amongst other places to fall upon Heraclea a Citie of Pontus; but the Inhabitants coming out, and pacifying him, he made a League with them, and thence through Phrygia invaded Bithynia, where in an ambush laid for him he was cut off, though he fought stoutly with his whole Army, after which Zipares the King built a Citie upon the Hill Lyperus, which being called after his own name became famous, and not long after he dying, left his Kingdom to Nicomedes his eldest son. Against him Antiochus being about to undertake an Expedition, he craved help of those of Heraclea, promising them to requite them with the like favour in their necessity, which they took as an occasion to fall off again, and break the League made with Hermogenes; and partly by force, and partly by purchase recovered divers places taken from them, and attempting to do so by Amestris, which one Eumenes held, he chose rather, out of anger, to deliver up the Town to Ariobarzanes the son of Mithridates, than to sell it to them. Not long after Antiochus and Antigonus Gonatas being at difference, and preparing for the War on both sides, Nicomedes joyned himself with Antigonus, against whom therefore the other thought first to try his strength. Mithridates strengthening himself, procured 13 Gallies from Heraclea, which adding to his own Fleet, he went against that of Antiochus, but facing one another for some time, they departed at length without a fight.

3. Antigonus Gonatas being resolved to venture for Macedonia (where his father Demetrius Poliorcetes once reigned) though he had once already been overthrown by Ptolomy Ceraunus, who now held that Kingdom, made a League with Antiochus. This Prince might be the more willing to imbrace it, by reason that the Gauls were now come into Asia, brought by Nicomedes of Bithynia to help him against Zybaas (or Ziparus) the younger, who held from him (whether his brother or no is uncertain) the Maritime part of that Countrey. After they had helped him to recover Bithynia, they harraased all the Countreys far and wide, and though they were but 20000. and of them but half fighting men, yet struck they such a Terrour into all Nations on this side Taurus, as most, though they had never seen them, submitted unto them. But Antiochus, as we have it from Appian, repelled them from his Territories, and thence, for saving the Countrey harmlesse, had the name of Soter or Saviour, having before sent as aid into Greece 500 men against their Countrey-men, under the conduct of Telesarchus the Syrian. After this having married his daughter Apame to Magas King of Cyrene, and brother to Ptolomy Philadelphus, he was perswaded by his son-in-law to break the League which his father Seleucus had made with Ptolomy, and invade Egypt; but as he was about to do this, and was gathering forces for it, Ptolomy sent several parties of Soldiers into all the Countreys over which he reigned, whereof some acting the parts of Robbers, and others of Enemies, diverted him from his purpose. The last ingagement he was in that we read of, was with Eumenes, the first King of Pergamus, near Sardis, from whom he received an overthrow.

For there was one Philearnus an Eunuch born at Tios in Paphlagonia, and belonging to Lyfimachus who made him Keeper of his Treasure placed at Pergamus, which he built very strong upon the Hill. He continued very faithfull to him, till such time as Arsinoe caused him to murder Agathocles his eldest son, at which he being troubled, and thereupon she accusing him to her husband, he revolted from him, and sending to Seleucus offered himself, and the money to him: then in the troubles betwixt them two so cunningly behaved himself, as he kept possession, and alwayes fawning upon, and obliging the next, and most potent Prince, remained Master of the place and Treasure for twenty years; For Seleucus being murdered by Ptolemy Ceranus, he redeemed the body with a great sum of Gold, and sent the ashes thereof to this Antiochus Soter his son. This Philoterus had two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, the former of which had a son of his own name, who succeeded his deceased Uncle, and having in his possession the places lying about Pergamus, overthrew Antiochus (who now it seemeth counted him an incroaching neighbour) as we said before. Antiochus also built a Citie in Syria, which he called by his wives name Apamea, and after that another of the same name called after his mother, who was the daughter of Artabazus; herein imitating his father. At length having killed one son, and nominated another his Successor, he died, after he had reigned 19 years, A. M. 3742. the second of the 129 Olympiad.

5. Antiochus his son succeeded him, surnamed Theos most prophanely by the Milesians, because he rid them of Timarchus their Tyrant. From him the Parthians first revolted, who being (as * Justin out of Trogus tells us) Exiles out of Scythia (in the language of which Countrey Parthus signifieth such an one) were very obscure under the Government of the Medes and Persians, and being Conquered by Alexander, when none of his Captains after his death would accept of the Sovereignty over them, fell to the lot of Satagenor a stranger, but a friend to the Macedonians. They followed first Eumenes in the Civil Wars; after his death Antigonus, and then submitted themselves to Seleucus and his Successors, till now they took occasion to revolt at the instigation of Arfaces. His brother Tiridates, Argathocles the Governour of these parts endeavouring filthily to abuse was slain, and then the Macedonians were thence expelled. At the same time Theodorus the Governour of the 1000 Bactrian Cities revolted also, which the people of the East using for a pattern, in like manner fell off from Antiochus. He waged many Wars with Ptolemy Philadelphus, till such time as both being weary they contracted an Alliance, Ptolemy giving his daughter Berenice to the other, who had two sons already, Seleucus and Antiochus, by Laodice his former wife. Herein that Prophecie of Daniel is taken to be fulfilled, which saith, that in the end of years they shall joyn themselves together; for the Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement. But, as it followeth, she shall not retain the power of the Arm, neither shall he stand nor his Arm, &c. For, Philadelphus dying shortly after, Antiochus took again his former wife Laodice, who being sensible of the injury, and fearing her husbands inconstancy, poisoned him, after he had reigned 15 years.

Seleucus surnamed Callinicus and Pogon.

6. Laodice his wife kept his death close, till such time as she had secured the Kingdom to Seleucus her eldest son, surnamed for his victories (though of none but one we read) Callinicus, and from his beard Pogon. The next thing she went about was to make away Berenice, who understanding that some were sent to kill her, shut up her self in Daphne, a Town near Antioch, and when she was besieged, news flying about the Cities of Asia, they commiserated her condition, and out of respect of her Fathers and Grandfathers Dignity, sent men to her relief. But above all, her brother Ptolemy Euergetes being affrighted at her danger, hastened out of his Kingdom with his whole power. Yet ere any relief could come she was taken by treachery (promise of safety being made to her) and quickly slain; at which base and unworthy act the Cities conceiving great indignation, provided a great Fleet, and to revenge her death, gave up themselves to Ptolemy, who invading Syria slew Laodice, seized upon Calesyria, with Seleucia, got into his hands Syria, Cilicia, and the upper Provinces beyond Euphrates, and almost all Asia, even as far as Bactria. Without doubt he had Conquered all Seleucus his Kingdom, had he not been forced by a Domestick Sedition to return, after whose departure Seleucus having prepared a great Fleet for the reducing of those Cities which revolted from him, lost it in a great Tempest, at the which they were so far from rejoycing, that pitying him for this shipwrack, they voluntarily returned to obedience.

7. Rejoycing that he fared so well by his shipwrack, he now made War upon Ptolomy, but being overthrown fled to Antioch in great fear, being as destitute as before, though he found not such relief. For, writing to his younger brother Antiochus, he craved his help, offering him all Asia within the Mountain Taurus for a reward, who (though he was but yet fourteen years old) being greedy of reigning imbraced this occasion, and then behaved not himself as an helper or brother, but like a robber, intending to get the whole Kingdom. He shewed incredible boldnesse in invading and snatching, whence he had the Sirname of Hierax or Goshauck. Ptolomy hearing of his aiding his brother, lest he should have two to deal with at once, made Peace with Seleucus for ten years; and then Antiochus hiring the Gauls, with them made War upon his brother in the other's stead, in which he had the better of it, and they supposing Seleucus to be slain in the battel (that cutting off all the Royal race they might be Lords of Asia) turned their force against him that hired them; so that Antiochus was glad to purchase his freedom with Gold, and enter into society with his Mercenaries. The two brothers being thus at odds, and every one gaping after Asia, Eumenes of Bithinia puts in amongst the rest, and overthrowing the Gauls, and after them Antiochus, got a great part of it into his possession. Now also Arfaces hearing of the distresse of Seleucus, perfected the revolt of the Parthians; for, invading that Country with a band of robbers, he slew the Governour Andragorus, and invaded the Principality, and not long after seizing on the Kingdom of the Hyrcanians, so strengthened himself thereby, that after some years he overthrew Seleucus, and established his Kingdom. Hence the Parthians accounting ever after the day of this Victory as the day of their liberty, constantly observed it, and Arfaces being no lesse memorable to them than Cyrus to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedonians, or Romulus to the Romans; out of honour to him they called all their Kings by his name. This beginning of Arfaces fell out in the first of the 135 Olympiad, of the City 510, the second of Seleucus, and the third of Ptolomy Euergetes. A. M. 3761.

8. Now understanding that Eumenes had got the greatest part of Asia into his power, and both the brothers had even lost their Principalities, yet could they not agree, but instead of opposing the forein and common Enemies, fought the destruction of each other, by renewing the War. In the next battel Antiochus was overthrown, and flying many dayes, and not knowing how to bestow himself, at length being wearied, he went to Artamenes King of Cappadocia his Father in Law, by whom at first being received very civilly, he afterwards understood there was a plot laid against him, and fled thence. Whereupon not knowing where to be secure, he betook himself to Ptolomy, judging he might rather trust to him than his brother, being (as well he might be) mindful of what he would have done to him, or had deserved of him. Ptolomy commanded him to be narrowly looked to, but by the help of a certain whore with whom he had been too familiar, he deceived his Keepers and got away. Yet as he was flying he was slain by thieves. Seleucus also almost at the same time, being outed of his Kingdom, and thrown by an horse, ended his life, after he had reigned about twenty years. A. 9. He left two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, of which the former succeeded according to his birthright, in the seventh year of Antigonus Doson King of Macedonia, and was Sirnamed Ceraunus. Eumenes King of Pergamus, who had got so much of Asia into his power now being dead of Drunkenesse, Antaius his younger brother's son succeeded him, and had got all on this side Taurus into his power, which being understood by Seleucus Ceraunus, he thought it concerned him to look about him, and with Achans (whose Father Andromachus was brother to Laodice his wife) passed over Taurus with an Army against him: but then was poisoned in Phrygia by the treachery of Apaturius a Galatian, and Nicanor, after he had reigned scarce three years. Achans to revenge his death presently slew the conspirators, rators, and then ordering the Army with great wisdom and courage, recovered all on this side the Mountain Taurus, which had been lost; insomuch that the People admiring him would have accepted of him as King, if he would have taken this opportunity; but he refused it, and kept the Sovereignty for Antiochus brother to Seleucus, who afterwards was called the Great. He in his brothers time lived a private life in the upper Provinces, and now was called from Babylon by the Army in Syria, to take upon him the Government, being about fifteen years old; after which he entrusted Achans with all that Region he had lately recovered, made Molon Governour of Media, and his brother Alexander of the Country of Persis.

10. He fell into great troubles immediately upon his first entrance upon the Kingdom; for Molon and his brother considering his youth, and hoping that Achans would joyn with them in their enterprize, especially out of fear and hatred of one Hermias, who now ruled all at Court, conspired together to withdraw all the upper Provinces from their allegiance. This Hermias a Carian by birth, had been left by Seleucus to look to his Kingdom when he took his Expedition over Taurus, and then being set in so high a place, began to envy the power of all others, grew proud and cruel, his malice above all others being against Epigenes, who had been Seleucus his General; for that he saw him to be a wise and prudent man, and the Army much at his devotion. A Council being called to consult about the rebellion, Epigenes advised that the King should go in person to suppress it; for thereby the rebels would either be terrified and desist, or the Country at his presence would be moved to crosse their designs, and deliver them up; but Hermias interrupting him, imputed this to a desire that the King should miscarry, that thereby he might seize upon his estate, and prevailed that two others should be sent against Molo, and the King go against Ptolomy Philopator (who now thinking himself secure in the youth of Antiochus, and Philip of Macedonia, had given himself up to all luxurie) hoping thereby to have an easie War of it, for that he was of a cowardly disposition, and hoped by exposing the young King to dangers and hazards, to escape the punishment due to him, and maintain that power he already enjoyed. Antiochus being very young, was very earnest to get Calesyria, and Hermias to prick him still forward, framed a letter from Achans, wherein he tells he is desired by Ptolomy to take the Diadem and assume the title of King to himself, promising to send him ships, money, and all things necessary for that enterprize.

Who procur-eth him to march against Ptolomy, though Molon rebelled

11. Having married first Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Capadocia, he prepared for his Expedition, when news came that Molon went on with his design, and how the Captains sent against him, out of fear had secured themselves in Garrisons. Hereupon he bent his mind to go himself, but Hermias being tenacious of his purpose, again diverted him, telling him, it was fitter for Subjects to fight against such, and Kings against their equals, and so sending one Xinatas an Achean against Molon, again turned his mind now obnoxious to him for want of years. Then marched they to Laodicea, and thence through the Desert to the Valley called Marsya, lying between the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, where about the Straights he took in divers Towns; but the principal Fort held out and put him to a stand, which made him the more desirous to go now against Molon; For Xinatas, who was sent against him with full power, growing arrogant and careless, had rashly ventured over the River Tigris, and then Molon making as if he fled, came upon him in the night, and cut him off with most of his men, and those that escaped the Sword taking the River, scarce any got to the other side. After this, Molon pursuing his Victory took Seleucia, all the upper Provinces, the Principality of Babylon, those parts lying upon the red Sea, all about Tigris as far as Europus, and Mesopotamia as far as Dura; onely the Castle at Susa stood out, the Town being taken; Antiochus at this report called a Council to consult what was to be done, where Epigenes expostulating that his former advise was not followed, moved the same again; but was taken up as before by Hermias, with foul language, who desired the

12. The Army before it stirred mutinied for pay, and then Hermias taking advantage at the Kings necessity, offered to lay down money, on condition Epigenes might be removed from his presence, which having obtained, he procured the man to be murdered. The Army marched and came to Antioch in Mygdonia at the Winter solstice, where staying 40 days till the extremity of the cold was over, after 40 days it came to Liba, Molon then lying at hand about Babylon. Here a Council of War being called to consult which way was to be taken, that they might not fail of provisions; Hermias was for going along by Tigris, that it, and two other Rivers, Lycus and Kapros, they might have for a defence; but Zeuxis, though fearful to speak because of him, shewed the danger of that advice, because it would be a great compasse, and after six dayes travel through a Desert, they should come to place called The Kings Ditch, which if the Enemy got before them, they should in no wise be able to passe, and be reduced into great straights for want of Victuals; but on the contrary, if they passed over Tigris, there was no doubt but the Inhabitants of the Country called Apolloniatis would return to obedience, obeying Molon at present onely out of necessity; further, in that plentiful Country they should have plenty of victuals, and (what was most considerable) Molon would be hindred from retreating into Media, and thereby being straightned, after that the place where he yet remained was emptied of provisions, would be forced to fight, or if he durst not do that, then his Soldiers would revolt to the King. This counsel being taken, all things fell out accordingly; for Molon fearing his passage into Media might be stopped, little trusting those parts in which he then was, determined to get if he could, to the hilly Country of Apolloniatis, but it hapned that the Scouts of both parties met there, and skirmishing for some time, afterwards retreated to their severall Bodies, and so gave occasion to a total ingagement the day following.

13. Molon considering how dangerous it was to bring his Soldiers out in open face against their King, thought it the best way to chuse out the most strong and valiant, and set upon his Camp in the night. Going about to do this, ten young men went over to the King and told him the design of the rebels, so that Molon was glad to return, and put his other Army left behind him into such an Alarm, for that they were ignorant of the enterprize, that much ado he had to quiet them. The King being provided to fight, drew out his men by break of day, and placed them in a batalia; Molon could but do it in great disorder and confusion, by reason of that consternation which fell upon his men in the night. In the fight which presently followed, the right wing of his Army stood fast to him, and fought very earnestly, but the left as soon as it came in fight all revolted, which he understanding, now compassed in with Enemies and considering the torments he was likely to undergo if taken alive, killed himself, and so did all his companions in the conspiracy; but his body being found was nailed, for an example, to a crosse in the highest parts of Media. After this Victory Antiochus settled the affaires of these Countries, dealing more mercifully with his Subjects than was desired by Hermias, and then resolved to invade the Territories of the Barbarians lying upon his borders, to terrifie them from assisting his rebels for the time to come; which Hermias disliked for the danger of the War, his mind still running upon Calefryia, but news being brought that a young son was born to the King, he was content he should expose himself to this danger, hoping that in case he should miscary he must be made Guardian and Protector of the infant, but he was ignorant that his just reward hung over his head. For one Artabuzanes, his Country being invaded, being unfit for resistance because of old age, made Peace with Antiochus, submitting to what soever he demanded, and at the same time Apollophanes the Physician to the King, and his great favourite, perceiving Hermias not able to bear that high condition to which which he was advanced, any longer, being solicitous for his Masters safety, and much more for his own, so wrought the King (inclinable enough to it before) as being called to walk abroad one morning more early than usual, before his return he was made away.

Diadem, and

14. Antiochus his mind was now turned towards Achaus, who, though at the first he had born himself very modestly, being elevated with successe, and thinking that the King in his expedition against Artabazanes might possibly miscarry, or if he did not, yet hoping that he being at so great a distance, he might have opportunity enough to break into Syria, and have help to seize upon the Kingdom, marched with his whole Army from Lydia, and coming to Laodicea in Phrygia, then set the Diadem upon his head, and first took the Title of King upon him. He continued his march till he drew near to Lycaonia; but there the Soldiers mutined, refusing to fight against their natural King, so that seeing this, he strove to perswade them that he had no intention to invade Syria, and diverted his course to Pisidia, which harasing, and enriching the Army with booty thereby, he returned home again. The King not being ignorant of any of this, first expostulated it with him, and sending him threatening messages, put off the rest for this time, and set himself with all his might to prepare for the War against Ptolomy. Consulting then what way to invade Syria, he was perswaded first of all to attempt Seleucia (held by the Ptolomies ever since the invasion of Euergetes, to revenge the death of his sister Berenice) being the Chief Seat almost of the whole Empire, from whence would arise much trouble being thus in the Enemies hands, and very commodious by its situation for carrying on the War both by Land and Sea. He first then corrupted some of the Officers of the Garrison within, who promised, that if he could but take part of the Suburbs, they would procure the whole Town to be yielded. This being done, the Conspirators came to the Governour, and moved him to yield, as from the necessity of the thing, who being struck at this consternation, as it appeared, of the Soldiers, surrendered presently the Town upon Composition.

Yet Antiochus maketh War upon Ptolomy for Celestria,

And getteth
into Seleucia,

15. Whilst he was employed about this Town, Letters came to him from one Theodorus, desiring him with all speed to come into Syria, signifying that he would betray it all into his power; for he being an Aetolian born, had done the Kings of Egypt special service, but was so well requited for it as he was brought into danger of life, and therefore at what time Antiochus went against Molon, looking upon Ptolomy as a despicable Creature, and distrusting his Courtiers, he had seized upon Ptolemais and Tyre, and solicited him to come down. Now therefore Antiochus putting off the businesse of Achaus till another time, marched down to Marfya, the same Valley and Straights as before, where hearing Theodorus was besieged in Ptolemais, he went, and relieved him, and then having that and Tyre delivered up unto him, and bearing the Enemy out of the Straights, he had then determined to march towards Pelusium, but understanding that Ptolomy's Army was come thither, and all opposition possible making for hindering his passage, he went on in taking in the Towns thereabouts, divers whereof presently submitted, and others stood it out. Ptolomy himself being given wholly up to sluggishness, though thus betrayed, took no order about his affairs; All the burthen of them lay upon Agathocles and Sosibius, then the greatest Officers of State, who being able men, sent up and down to raise Forces, and make all speedy preparations for the War, though to divert Antiochus they sent Ambassadors to him to treat of peace (as desiring onely to go that way to work) and procured Embassies from the Rhodians, Byzantians, Aetolians, and them of Cyzicus, to mediate betwixt them, during which they gained time, and deceived the Enemy, carrying all things so close as his Ambassadors could understand nothing of their Provisions. A Truce was granted by Antiochus for four moneths, during which time he willed them to send to him to Seleucia, giving hopes to make up the difference, but contrary to his intentions: though now he was in a manner constrained to return into his own Kingdom, for that Achaus plotted against him, and held intelligence with Ptolomy.

15. The Commiſſioners coming to debate the particulars according to their inſtructions, Antiochus laboured to overcome them with his Arguments for the juſtneſſe of his cauſe, as well as with his Weapons, pleading he had done Ptolomy no injury in making that invaſion, for that he had but recovered his right, alleging much the Conqueſts of thoſe parts by Antigonus Cocles, and the poſſeſſion of them by Seleucus, and that Ptolomy the firſt waged not War with Antigonus for his own particular, but to help Seleucus to the Sovereignty of that Province, but above all he preſſed the common agreement of all the Kings, made at that time when Antigonus was overthrown, wherein by Lyſimachus and Caffander, all Syria was decreed to Seleucus. On the contrary, Ptolomy's Commiſſioners aggravated the height of the injury offered to him, by the unworthineſſe of cloſing with the treaſonable practices of Theodotus, and affirmed, that Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus intended the Dominion of Syria to himſelf, and joyned with Seleucus on no other terms, than that indeed all Aſia ſhould be his, but Syria fall to his own ſhare. Such like objections and replies as theſe were made often to no purpoſe, but that which put the greateſt ſtop to the Treaty, was the comprehending of Achaus in the League, which Ptolomy ſtickled hard for, and the other as impatiently heard, crying out of the unworthineſſe of the thing, that he ſhould protect, or make any mention of Rebels. Winter being thus ſpun out with theſe diſcourſes, and Spring drawing on, Antiochus intending to ſet upon the Enemy both by Land Sea, drew together his Forces, to the taking in of what remained unconquered of Syria; and Nicolaus on the other part, as the Egyptian General, with Perigenes the Admiral, made all poſſible proviſion for reſiſtance.

17. Antiochus going to Marathus, there entered into Confederacy with the Aradians; then entring Syria through Then-proſopos came to Berytus, in his paſſage taking in Botrus, and burning Trieres and Calamus. The Mountain Libanus ſtraightning much the paſſage betwixt it and the Sea, and almoſt making it impaſſible, Nicolaus with a party alſo placed himſelf in the ſtraights, not doubting but to ſtop Antiochus there; but he dividing his Forces, and having his Fleet conſtantly near him, cauſed it firſt to ingage with the Egyptian, in which fight both ſides came off on equal terms, but Theodotus beating back the Enemy upon the Mountain, got over, and then cleared the paſſage below for the King. He after this came near Sidon with his Army, but judging it to no purpoſe to ſet upon the Town very ſtrong with men, and full of Proviſions, he gave order to Diognetus his Admiral to go with the Fleet to Tyre, and marched to Philoteria ſituate upon the Sea of Tiberias, which he took, together with * Scythopolis. Now he conceived great hopes of the perfecting his work, being come into a Countrey plentiful of Proviſions, ſo that placing Garrisons in theſe two Cities he took in Atabyrium by a Stratagem, making as if he fled before the Inhabitants, but having men lying in wait who aroſe againſt them, and then the whole Army with ſuch violence, as put them into a great fear, and they yielded up the place. After this, Karus, one of Ptolomy's Chiefeſt of Officers revolted to him. Hippolochus the Theſſalian brought over with him 400 horſe, and the Arabians moved by his ſucceſſe joyned themſelves to him. Shortly after he took in Galatis and Gadara beyond expectation, becauſe of the ſtrength thereof; but the Inhabitants terrified at his preparations yielded themſelves: then hearing that a great number of Enemies had met at Rabaib-ben Amon, or Rabatana, a Citie in Arabia, and thence made incuſions into the Territories of his friends, he marched thither, and ſtriving by force in vain to be Maſter of the place, at length he effected it by ſtopping the courſe of water, for want of which it was then ſurrendered. Then leaving a ſtrong Garrison here, and ſending Hippolochus and Karus to Govern the Coaſts of Samsaria, he went to Ptolemais, and there took up his Winter quarters.

18. Ptolomy to give him a ſtop, prepared againſt the Spring a great Army, and then marched from Alexandria with 70000 foot, 5000 horſe, and 73 Elephants, and came to Peluſium. Antiochus hearing this, gathered his Forces together, amounting to 72000 foot, 6000 horse, and 102 Elephants. Ptolomy proceeding on his journey came to Gaza, and thence near to Raphia (the first City of Syria, except Rhinocerus, as one cometh from Egypt) and Antiochus passing by that place shortly after pitched his Tents at first within ten furlongs of the Enemy, and the next day, partly for the commodiousness of the ground, and partly to embolden his soldiers, approached within five furlongs of them. Being so near, several skirmishes fell out amongst those which on both sides issued forth for provisions, and Theodorus the Ætolian, after a most bold adventure taking but two in his Company, for that he had been in Ptolomy's Court, and knew his manner of life, went out in the dusk of the evening, and not being known got into the Kings Tent where he used to give audience, and though he missed of him being in a more obscure place, yet wounded he two which waited there, and killing outright Andreas his principal Physician, escaped back in safety to his own Camp; having onely failed of his purpose for want of informing himself when the King was wont to take his rest. For five dayes continued these two Princes in this posture, and then both resolved to try the matter in a set battle.

The manner of the fighting of Elephants.

19. Ptolomy first drew out his men, and then presently Antiochus ranged his in battle array against him. Each of the Armies had two wings, wherein the two Kings met each other, guarded with Elephants, betwixt which the fight was begun, after Antiochus had caused the charge to be sounded; their manner being first with their Trunks to thrust each other, and strive for the ground, and then after that for the one by force to remove the other's Trunk, and to fall upon him like a Bull, and gore his sides. Few of Ptolomies beasts would fight at all, for that being Africans, they could neither endure the smell nor noise of those of India, so that the ranks being disordered by this, his left Wing was quite broken by the charge of the Enemy, and put to flight. Echecrates, who commanded in the right, stayed first for the engagement of the former, then seeing that his Elephants would not fight, gave order to Phinidas Commander of the Mercenary Greeks to invade his opposites, and he himself also wheeling about to be out of the danger of the beasts, fell upon the Flanks and Rear of the Enemy's horse; so that both together they made them all being Arabians and Medes to give ground, and put all the Wing to flight, thus being even with Antiochus. Then came the bodies themselves to engage: Antiochus was busie in the pursuit of that Wing wherein he fought; but Ptolomy coming to his Army much encouraged the Soldiers, and disheartned his adversaries, who being charged by Andromachus and Sosibius, the Syrians for some time maintained their ground, but the rest scarce fighting one stroke shifted for themselves. Antiochus being yet unskillfull and young, was still following the chace, (thinking because he had the better of it in his Wing, that therefore his whole Army overcame) till admonished by some one about him, he returned, and seeing things so contrary to his expectation, endeavoured to break in with his Guard, to the place where his Army stood, but finding all his men fled, retired also unto Raphia, being perswaded that he had done as became him, however, by reason of the Cowardliness of others the work had miscarried. On his part were slain little lesse than 10000 Foot, about 300 Horse, and 4000 taken prisoners; three of his Elephants were slain outright, and two afterwards died of their wounds. Ptolomy lost 1500 foot, and 700 horse, 16 Elephants were killed, and the rest taken for the most part.

20. Antiochus had intended after the rallying of his men to have fortified himself without Raphia; but most of them being got into the Town, he desired leave to bury his dead, and then returned into his own Kingdom. Ptolomy presently received all Cœlesyria again into his power, the Inhabitants accommodating themselves to his present condition (as indeed bearing alwaies great reverence to his family) and striving who should first yield themselves. Antiochus coming to Antioch, presently dispatched Antipater his brother's son, son, and Theodotus Herviolus in an Ambassage to him, fearing exceedingly he should be prosecuted with War, distrusting his Subjects because of his adverse fortune, and suspecting Achaus might make use of this opportunity against him. But Ptolemy thought of nothing lesse than molesting him, being overjoyed that he had above all expectation recovered Celestria, and desiring exceedingly to be quiet, out of his sluggish disposition, and other vices familiar to him; wherefore at first receiving the Ambassadors with threatening language, and complaints of the injuries received from their Master, he presently granted a Truce for a year, and then sent Sosibius to confirm the League, wanting onely courage and resolution to spoil Antiochus of his Kingdom.

Is besieged Achaus in Sardis,

21. Antiochus spent all the Winter in preparations, and in Spring marched over the Mountain Taurus against Achaus, whom he besieged in the City Sardis. Above a year he lay before it, having onely some times light skirmishes with the defendants, till Lagoras a Cretian, a man of great experience, observing that the strongest Cities are many times taken at such places as are by reason of their strength least looked to, and perceiving a piece of the wall, beyond which they used to throw carion and filth into a pit, to be destitute of any watch, by the sitting of fowls upon it, which came to feed on the carkeises, he took unto him Theodotus the Aetolian, and Dionysius, with some Soldiers, and they made a shift to get over and open the gates; the King to divert the Enemy making as if he would give the onset at another place, and so the Town was taken. Achaus and Aribazus the Governour got into the Castle, and then were straightly besieged again, till such time as Sosibius the chief Minister of State in Egypt, pitying the condition of the former, made means for his deliverance, which by the treachery of the instrument wrought his destruction. There was at that time in the Egyptian Court one Bolis a Cretian, second to no one Captain, as he was reputed, for prudence, extraordinary boldnesse, and Military skill; with him Sosibius dealt, having obliged him by his favours, and assured him that nothing could he perform more acceptable to the King his Master, than some way or other to work the deliverance of Achaus. He asking some time to consider of it, within two or three dayes took the businesse upon him, which to effect he had as he said a good opportunity, for that Cambylus the Commander of the Cretians serving under Antiochus was not onely known to him, but his kinsman, and had the charge of a Fort behind the Castle, which, because it could not be fortified with works, was kept by a continual Guard of Soldiers.

For whose
plotteth,

22. Being supplied with money largely by Sosibius, and loaded with promises, away he sailed for Rhodes to Nicomachus, and thence for Ephesus to Melancoma, his acquaintance, and friends of Achaus, with whom dealing about his businesse, he sent one Arianus to Cambylus to let him know that he was sent from Alexandria to raise Forces, and that he must needs speak with him, desiring he would appoint time and place for their meeting, without the privy of any. Having obtained this, and bethinking with himself what to do, he gave him a letter concerning which like Cretians they had a Cretian conference, as Polybius termeth it. For not respecting the safety of the besieged, or their faith given to those that employed them, but agreeing to divide the ten Talents already given in advance by Sosibius, they resolved to acquaint Antiochus with the matter, and undertak upon promise of money in hand, and a good reward afterwards, to deliver Achaus into his power. This being with great earnestnesse promised, Bolis prevails with Nicomachus and Melancoma, wholly ignorant of his treacherous intent, to write letters in cipher to Achaus, which he sent by Arianus, for whom passage was procured into the Castle by means of Cambylus. Achaus being earnestly advised by his two friends Bolis and Cambylus, and withal considering the difficulty for him to escape; hoping if he got out to passe presently into Syria whilst Antiochus was yet at Sardis, and then to get all the parts about Antioch into his power, yielded to put himself into the hands of Bolis, who was sent presently by Melancomas with great entreaties and promises if he could accomplish the business. Bolis went to Cambylus at night, and staying with him the next day to consult of the business how it should be managed, after he had been with Antiochus, and was much encouraged by him, he went up for Acheus into the Castle.

But he is betrayed by the instrument into the hands of justice.

23. Receiving Bolis with great respect, and after all his sitting of him perceiving nothing disagreeable to seriousness, he much rejoiced; but bethinking himself how weighty a thing it was, and what a hazard he was like to run, he trembled again at the thought of it, and at first resolved to send some before to Melancomas; but at length out he went of the Castle, and according to former agreement, Bolis coming behind him by a whistle gave a sign to those in ambush, and held him by the clothes till he was taken. Being brought into Antiochus his Tent, who sat late at night with a few attendants to see the issue of the project; the King was amazed, and could not forbear weeping to see him, so eminent a man, lye bound before him upon the ground in so sad a condition; but a Council of War being called, after several wayes of punishment proposed, at last it was agreed, that he should have his outward members and limbs cut off, after that his head, and that being sowed into an Asses bladder, his body should be nailed to a crosse, which was executed accordingly. This end had he who was son to Andromachus the brother of Laodice wife to Seleucus, who had married Laodice daughter to Mithridates, and had held all Asia on this side Taurus, having recovered it by his own industry and valour; a man he was exceeding wise, and of great experience, yet left (as Polybius observeth for us) a double warning to posterity, not to trust any rashly, and not to be puffed up with prosperity, or be secure of any thing incident to mankind, to which we may add another, viz. that none presume to rebel against their Sovereigns, for punishment will overtake them. His death being known within, as they all first agreed in making lamentations for him, so shortly after they fell at odds, being divided into two factions, of which the one stuck to his wife, and the other to Ariobazus the Governour; so that having suspicion of each other, both parties yielded themselves and the place to Antiochus.

Antiochus maketh an Expedition into the East.

24. A year or two after, Antiochus undertook an Expedition into the East to reduce Media and Parthia which had revolted, and he passing through both, thereupon caused Arfaces to withdraw himself into Hyrcania, which he considering, and judging that he would not have forsaken this Country if he had been able to have defended it, resolved to follow him, so that with great difficulty he passed over the hills, and entered also into that Region, where we find that he took some Towns; but what further he did against Arfaces, or upon what terms he returned, if Polybius his history had been kept entire, we might have known. After this he quieted the upper Asia, and coming into Bactria for a good while endeavoured to drive out thence Euthydemus the King thereof, whom he defeated, and behaved himself most stoutly, whence he got great credit for his valour. At length Euthydemus complaining that he was injurious in opposing him thus who had not revolted from him, but cut off the posterity of those that had, beseeching him also not to envy him the name of King, especially considering that by this dissention neither of their affaires could be secure, for that a number of the Scythian Nomades hovered at the borders, and were like to overrun the Country, Antiochus, who being tired with the tediousness of the War, had sought occasion to make a Peace, not unwillingly now heard the overtures of it, especially after that Euthydemus sent his son Demetrius to him, with whom he was so taken for his person and parts, as thinking him worthy of a Kingdom, he first promised him one of his daughters, and then yielded that his Father should take the title of King. Then the conditions of the league being written down, and sworn to, and taking with him all the Elephants that Euthydemus had, he marched over Caucasus, and renewed the confederacy with Sophagasenus the Indian King; then taking with him more Elephants (of which he had now 150) and leaving Androsthenes of Cyzicus to bring the treasure treasure promised him, he came to Arachosia, and so through Drangiana into Carmania, where he was forced to Winter, having received this fruit by this Expedition, that besides the Countries recovered, and the maritime Cities and Dynasties on this side Taurus added to his Dominions, he struck such an awe into his Subjects, as kept them more in order, and he was thought to be esteemed as well by the People of Europe as those of Asia, worthy to govern.

25. Not long after this, Ptolomy Philopater dying and leaving a young son behind him but four years old, Philip of Macedonia and he (as we before hinted) made a wicked League for the ousting him of his Kingdom, and dividing it amongst them, wherefore he striking again at Cæleſſyria and Phœnicia, got Judæa into his power, which * as Josephus telleth us, was tossed betwixt these two Crowns as a ship with the waves. For Scopas the Ætolian recovered it again out of his hands for young Epiphanes, and yet again not long after lost it with Cæleſſyria, being overthrown by Antiochus (near the fountains or heads of Jordan) at the City Panaas, with whom the Jews then presently joyned, but the Inhabitants of Gaza standing still out for Ptolomy, their City was taken and razed. In the mean time whilst Scopas was recovering the Cities of Syria, Antiochus himself was busie in invading the Kingdom of Attalus, who then being employed with the Romans in the Macedonian War against Philip, had left it naked of defence both by Land and Sea, but upon his complaint to the Roman Senate they sent to Antiochus to tell him, that seeing Attalus was employed by them against Philip the common Enemy, he would do a thing very acceptable unto them to abstain from his Territories, adding withall, that it was convenient for all the Kings which were the friends and allies of the People of Rome to be at peace amongst themselves; with the authority of which message he was so moved, as he drew out his Army again from the borders. But this respect to the Romans continued not many years, he entering upon such courses as gave them offence, and proceeding therein at length to an open War.

Yet he mini-streth occasion for a War with them.

26. For having reduced all Cæleſſyria into his power, and wintered at Antioch, the next Spring sending before his two sons Ardyes and Mubridates with the Army, and command to stay for him at Sardis, he himself followed with the Fleet to attempt the several maritime Towns of Cilicia and Caria, which were under Ptolomy, and also to help Philip both at Sea and Land, who now was busie in the War with the Romans. Divers places by fair and foul means together he took in; yet Coraceſum stood out, and whilst he lay before it came Ambassadors from the Rhodians to denounce War against him, in case he came within Nepheſis the Promontory of Cilicia, nor out of any hatred to him, as they said, but lest joyning with Philip he should hinder the Romans now active for the liberty of Greece. Though he heard this with much disdain, yet thought he it wisdom to give them good words for the present, and please them in this particular, but they, after all danger was over from Philip (who this Summer was beaten at Cynſcephala) not tying themselves with him to the former condition, sent aid to the Cities their associates, and preserved several in their liberty. He took at length Coraceſum, and after it several others, and amongst the rest Ephesus, where wintering, he endeavoured to reduce also the Cities of Asia, under the obedience they paid to his Ancestors, and thinking it not difficult to be done by any of them, except two, viz. Smyna in Æolis, and Lampsacus upon the Helleſpont, he sent Forces to besiege them both.

27. Now the Romans, with all others, doubted not but his Army was for Europe, after his affaires had succeeded in Asia, and they had the more cause to be jealous of him, for that Hannibal their old and sworn Enemy had now been with him; therefore in the setting of the Greek Cities at liberty (after the overthrow of Philip King of Macedonia) the Senate had left it to the Commissioners appointed for that work, to deal as they should think fit with Chalcis, Demetrius, and Corinth, the keys of the Country, and whether out of a desire of the glory of setting all the Greeks at liberty, or to awe and affright him, they decreed, that all such Cities, as well in Asia as Europe, should be freed. The ten Commissioners sitting now in Greece about these affairs; they of Smyrna and Lampascus (whom he had besieged) sent to them for relief, and Antiochus himself thinking fit not to anticipate his opportunities, sent thither also his Ambassadors, to whom the Commissioners lay'd open the pleasure of the Senate, and in case he contain not himself and Forces in Asia, threaten him with War: and withall promise that some of their number should come to him. Yet he in the beginning of Spring comes over into Europe, got a great part of the Chersonesus into his power, and then marching to Lysimachia, there found the Commissioners, who pressing him to the things formerly mentioned, he demanded by what right the Romans questioned with him about Asia, seeing he medled with nothing done in Italy; and added, that the Greek Cities should obtain their liberty, not by their commands, but his bounty. Now it was moved that those of Smyrna and Lampascus might be heard; which being obtained, and the Delegates using their liberty of speech, he out of indignation, that he should be forced to plead with them before those Judges, interrupted them, saying, the Rhodians (and not the Romans) should have the hearing of the cause; and so the Treaty ended without any conclusion or agreement at all.

28. A rumour was spread abroad, during this Treaty, that Ptolomey the King of Egypt was dead, which much affected both parties, yet strove they to hide it from each other: Lucius Cornelius one of the ten, who was also ordered to endeavour the reconciliation of the two Kings, demanded a little time to go into Egypt; and Antiochus being restless, out of an itching desire to get that Country into his hands, sailed with his Fleet back to Ephesus; whence sending again his Ambassadors to treat with T. Flamininus chief of the Commissioners (on purpose to hold them a little in hand till he could bring about his design) came to Patara, where he heard that Ptolomey was alive. Now he changed his purpose of invading Egypt; but withall resolved for Cyprus, to attempt that Island; but such a tempest fell upon him, that he almost lost his whole Fleet. Not long after, Hannibal being driven from home (by the malice of such as incensed the Romans against him, whilst he onely endeavoured the Publick good) returned to Antiochus, who though before he did but fluctuate in his resolutions for the War, yet was now confirmed by him so in his purpose, that henceforth he thought not so much of it, as of the reward of the Victory. Hannibal denied that the Romans could be overcome any where but in Italy, and desired but 100 Gallies, 16000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, with which he would first go to Carthage, hoping to draw his Countrymen to revolt, and though that should not succeed, yet would he seize upon some part of Italy. The King closing with his propositions at this time, he went not himself, but sent a certain Tyrian to Carthage, who under pretence of trading should break the ice; but he being suspected by Hannibal's adversaries, was glad to shift for himself, and notice thereof was presently given to the Romans. In the mean time Antiochus sent three Ambassadors to Rome, who under colour of procuring a right understanding, should feel how the Senate stood affected. They expostulating the matter, that their Master should be forced to quit the Cities of Asia, and forsake his ancient right in Thrace, were referred to the Commissioners in Greece for answer; to whom repairing, Flamininus and his Colleague, urged that the King should either leave Europe, or the Romans have power to protect their friends in Asia, and make as many more there as they could. The Ambassadors answer, they neither can, nor will conclude any thing to the prejudice of their Master's crown, and so the Peace was not nearer than before.

29. Antiochus his resolution being set therefore for the Warre, that he might prevent any thing that would divert or call him back, he resolved to make alliances with his neighbours. In Spring he set upon the Piside, a people inhabiting about Silga, being desirous first to bring all Asia to his beck, & at the same time came Ambassadors from Rome to discover his designs and preparations, and either to take off the edge of Hannibals hatred, or at least by their intercouple with him to render him suspected to the King. Visiting Eumenes first, as they had it in charge, they were egged on by him to the war. Sulpius one of them falling sick, was forced to stay at Pergamus, but Villius hearing how Antiochus was employed, went to Ephesus where Hannibal then lay, & according to his instructions often met and discoursed with him. Thence he travelled to Apamea, where the King met him; but news coming that Antiochus his son (whom he had lately sent into Syria) was dead, it broke off the Treaty; so that Villius loath to be unreasonable returned to Pergamus, and the King breaking off the War, to Ephesus, where holding secret consultation with one Minio, he gave way that the Ambassadors should be called thither. When they had there arrived, they were referred to Minio, and both sides arguing for themselves as formerly, came to the same conclusion, and the Romans having scarcely obtained that they came for, returned home.

30. The Ambassadors being departed, Antiochus then fell into another serious debate about the War, to which Hannibal being now suspected was not called, till acquainting him how, when a Child, his father had made him swear at the Altar never to be a friend to the people of Rome, all jealousies were removed. About the same time came Thous, and others from the Ætolians (who being fallen out with the Romans about plunder, after the overthrow of Philip at Cynoscephala, had ever since greatly grudged, and now stirred up the several Princes against them) offering him the Command of their Forces, and exhorting him to pass over into Greece, where things were ripe enough for the War, and not expect the coming down of his Army from the Inland Countreys. They having gotten Demetrius (a Town of prime note) into their hands by a wile, in confidence of an opportunity thence arising, he came over with an Army of 10000 foot, 500 horse, and six Elephants, after which going to the general meeting, he was by a publick Decree received as General, and then sending to summon Chalcis, had the Gates opened to him, and so easily became Master of all Eubœa. In the midst of Winter holding another Council, he thought fit the Thesalonians should be, by all means, drawn in to joyn with them; but Hannibal pressed above all things, that Philip and the Macedonians might be dealt with; for then as he said, the Thesalonians, and other Græcians (feeling themselves invaded by the Romans) would easily return to their accustomed duty: he advised further, that the Forces with all speed should be sent for out of Asia; and this onely was observed. Antiochus returning to Chalcis, fell in Love with an obscure Girl, daughter to Cleopolemus his host, with whom prevailing at length to marry her, he spent all the remaining of the Winter in feasting and jollity, his Army for Company falling into idleness and all excess.

mus sent his brother Attalus to acquaint the Senate therewith, and that the Ætolians were preparing to joyn with him; whereupon Babius was then ordered, with all his Forces, to passe over into Epirus, and hover about Apollonia. The next year came over M. Acilius Glabrio the Consul, with 10000 foot, 2000 horse, and fifteen Elephants; who taking in divers places held by Antiochus his Garrisons, marched towards the Bay of Malea, took Thaumachia, and wasted the Territories of Hypaia. Antiochus something herewith awakened, sent to the Ætolians to have all their Forces in readinesse, and then came down with lesse then 10000 foot, and 500 horse; but fewer of the Ætolians came together than usual, and his own Army, expected out of Asia, loitered, so that wanting it, and forsaken of his Confederates, he fortified himself in the Straights of Theomopyla, and sent the Ætolians (whereof there were but 4000) to keep Heraclea and Hypaia. Upon the approach of the Consul, bethinking himself of the Mountains, which he knew had been formerly passed by some of Xerxes his Army, and fearing the Romans should come over upon his back, he procured some Ætolians to secure the passages. But Glabrio hearing of it, sent M. Porcius Cato (then a Colonel in the Army) and L. Valerius Flaccus to beat them off, which being done by the former, he got over, and approaching the Enemies Camp, they at the first fight supposed them to be friends; but then again understanding their error, cast away their Arms and fled. But being closely pursued 500 of them onely escaped, though but fifty of the Romans were missing.

acts in Asia.

32. Antiochus flying to Chalcis, passed thence with his new married wife unto Ephesus, after whose departure the Gates of Chalcis were presently opened to the Consul, who having taken in Phocis and Boeotia in his passage thither, all Eubœa presently returned to obedience. Then fell he upon the Ætolians, whom (though not long before they had sent to the King for aid, yet) now he forced to yield, and after he had used their Ambassadors something roughly, and threatened to chastize them to purpose; through the intercession of T. Flaminius, gave them liberty to send their Ambassadors to Rome. Antiochus now lay at Ephesus altogether secure of the Romans; but Hannibal told him, he rather wondred they were not there already, than doubred at all of their coming, and procured the Forces to be sent for out of the upper Provinces; and with those ships which were ready the King sayled into the Chersonesus of Thrace, fortifying it, and placed stronger Garrisons in Sestus and Abydus, where the Romans were to passe over the Hellepont into Asia. At this time Lucius Salinator being sent from Rome to succeed Acilius in the Government of the Fleet, came with it to Delus, which Antiochus hearing, hastened from Thrace to fight him before the Rhodes and Eumenes should joyn with him; but they coming in in good time, his Fleet was worsted, and chased as far as Ephesus.

at Sea.

33. After this defeat he set himself with all his might to repair his Navy, and left his son Seleucus in Æolis to look to the Maritime Coasts. Livius the Roman Admiral coming into the Hellepont, took Sestus, and had done the same by Abydus, had not Polyxenidas a Fugitive of Rhodes, destroyed by Treachery all the Fleet belonging to that Island; whereupon he raised his siege and departed. Seleucus fell upon the Territories of Pergamus, and then besieged the Citie it self (Attalus being unable to grapple with him in the field) with whom also at length Antiochus himself joyned, till hearing that the Roman and Rhodian Fleets were coming to relieve the place; and, worse than this, that Lucius Scipio the Consul (together with his brother the African) was already in his march as far as Macedonia, and preparing now to passe the Hellepont against him, he sent to Æmylius Rhegillus who had succeeded Livius in the Fleet, to treat of a peace. He calling Eumenes from Pergamus, and the Officers of the Rhodians to consult, these were content to Treat, but Eumenes being averse to it, and urging that nothing could be concluded of, before the coming of the Consul, an answer to that effect was returned to the King, who leaving his son still before Pergamus, harassed the Territories of the Roman Confederates, and taking divers places, ces, returned to Sardis. Seleucus was presently beaten off, and forced to raise his siege, by 1000 foot, and 100 horse, sent to relieve the place by the Achaean, and Hannibal returning with ships from Syria, was met by the Rhodians, who put him to flight, and caused him to be blocked up in Pamphilia.

Hannibal wounded at Sea.

34. Antiochus from Sardis sent to Prusias King of Bithinia, to joyn in Confederacy with him against the Romans; but he (though he formerly hung in suspense, yet) of late was fully drawn to their party by the Letters of the Scipio's, and an Ambassage sent from Rome for the same purpose. Failing therefore in this enterprize, he went to Ephesus to his Navy, where (concluding that no other way could be hinder the Consul's passing the Hellespont than by being strongest at Sea) he resolved to try another battel, and so set upon the Maritime Town near to Ephesus, that the Romans coming in to succour their friends, Polyxenidas his Admiral might have an opportunity to work some notable feat. But he engaging with 90 Gallies against Eumenes and the Rhodians, who made up a Fleet together of about 83. being overmitched both in the valour of his men, and the nimbleness of his Vessels, he lost 42 of his Navy (12 of which, together with the men, were taken) having broken but two of the Romans, and by meer chance carryed a Rhodian away with him to Ephesus. The King now terrified at the message of this third overthrow, madly drew out his Garrison from Lyfimachia (which might have given a stop to the passage of the Consul) lest it should be cut off; and raising his siege from before Colophon, departed to Sardis, whence he sent into Cappadocia, to Ariarathes his son-in-law, for aid, and all over else where he could bethink himself, he raised forces, neglecting in the mean time his true opportunities. For, the Scipio's in the mean while came to Lyfimachia, where they were received with such plenty of all things, as if Provision had been made for the Roman Army, and thence marched through the Chersonesus of Thrace to the Hellespont, where all things being in readiness through the care of Eumenes, they passed over without any disturbance into Asia.

He sendeth to the Consul about a peace.

35. Antiochus being so befottered as to ly still, and suffer the Consul quietly to come over, was now exceedingly discouraged, and sent out of hand to him, and his brother, to treat of peace; with order also to deal in private with the African about it, whose authority he knew would sway his brother to either side indifferently. The Ambassador being arrived at the Roman Camp, deferred the delivering of his message till the African's coming, who was yet behind; but after his arrival, and audience given, had these conditions set him: To pay all the expences of the War, of which Antiochus had been the cause, and not onely quit the Cities in Aolis and Ionis, but all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. Being no whit satisfied with the proposals, he made no further overtures to the Consul; but, according to his instructions, offered to his brother (in case he would procure a peace on the terms proposed by his Master) the restitution of his son who had been taken prisoner, as much money as he would ask, and more than that, to be partaker of what the Kingdom it self would amount to. The African answered, that the discharging of his son would exceedingly oblige him, and as for the rest, had he kept Lyfimachia in his hands, fortified the passage into the Chersonesus of Thrace; or at least had he opposed them at the Hellespont, and then offered these conditions, much might have been done for him. As things now stood, he advised to consider into what estate he had brought himself, by all means to decline the War, and refuse no conditions offered to him. But he thought no harsher terms could be imposed upon one already Conquered, and therefore casting off all thoughts of peace, made what Provision he could possible for a battel.

He prepareth for a battel.

36. The Consul being desirous to do something before Winter (which now drew on) resolved, if possible, to fight him, though his brother the African falling sick, had departed to Elea, to whom Antiochus now to comfort him, him, restored his son without any ransom; which hapning as a Cordial to him in that condition, he advised him in way of requital (being able to do no more at present) that he should not ingage in fight with his brother, before his return to the Camp. Being much moved with his authority, he declined an ingagement to his utmost endeavour, but the Consul still dogging him from place to place, and being ready to storm his Camp, for fear of utterly discouraging his men, he was forced to draw them out. (a) Some say he had 70000 Foot, and about 12000 Horse (though others (b) mention but 70000 in all) with 54 Elephants. The Consul brought into the field but 50000, whereof two, being Macedonians, were left to keep the baggage; and sixteen African beasts placed in the rear for a reserve, lest (being worsted by the Indians) they should break their ranks. The battel was fought near Magnesia a Town situate at the Foot of the Hill Sipylus. It hapned then that such a mist fell as blinded so the Kings Army, that both the wings thereof could not be seen to one standing still in the same place; and their weapons were also spoiled with the wet. His chariots armed with fishes which he had placed in the front, proved his ruine; for the Horses being gored with arrows (according to the direction of Eumenes) brake down all behind them, and so disordered the ranks, that the Auxiliaries fled; which occasion the Romans taking, pressed hard upwards, and discomfited the whole left wing. In the right he had better fortune; for he put both Horse and Foot to flight, and drove them to their Camp; but M. Emilius Lepidus who was left there for the security of it, met them, and forced them to face about and to charge the pursuing Enemy, so that he and Attalus (the brother of Eumenes, who came in in good time with 200 Horse) renewed the battel with such earnestnesse, that now the King (who ere while gave the charge) betook himself to his heels. The Roman Cavalrie, in the pursure, did great execution, and the rather, because of the multitude of Chariots, and Camels, which blocked up the way; inasmuch as 54000 were slain, and 1400 taken. Of the Romans fell but three hundred forty nine.

37. Antiochus, with a few about him, fled to Sardis, and thence to Apamea, making Zeno Governour of the former, and Timon of Lydia; but they were despised by the Soldiers and Townsmen that held the Castle, who gave up the places to the Consul; which was followed as an example by divers Cities of Asia. The Consul being once arrived at Sardis (with his brother now upon his recovery) the King presently sent and desired safe conduct for some Commissioners to treat of Peace. This being granted, Zeuxis who had formerly governed Lydia, and Antipater the Kings brothers son, shortly after arrived, desiring their Master might know upon what terms to purchase the friendship of the People of Rome. Publius Scipio the African, in the name of the rest, answered, that the Romans used not to insult over their conquered Enemies, and therefore nothing should be required of him more than formerly; save onely to pay 15000 Talents of Eubæa to defray the charges of the War, by certain portions; 400 to Eumenes (together with such Corn as was due to him, by virtue of an agreement made with his Father) to give up Hannibal, Thoas the Ætolian, and other incendiaries, and lastly, to deliver for the performance of these conditions twenty Hostages.

And hath well nigh the same terms as formerly were set him.

These proposals being accepted of, Ambassadors were out of hand dispatched to Rome, to pray the confirmation of the Peace, which accordingly was ratified both by Senate and People; and for that Eumenes and the Ambassadors of Rhodes, differed about some Cities in Asia, it was ordered by the Fathers, that the People inhabiting on this side Taurus, which before obeyed Antiochus, should now be subject to Eumenes, except Caria and Lydia, as far as Maander; and these should be delivered up to the Rhodians. As for the Greek Cities, they which were formerly tributaries to Attalus, should so remain under Eumenes his Successor; but such as had been under the jurisdiction of Antiochus, should be left to their own Laws: and ten Commissioners were sent to compose all differences risen betwixt the several Cities and States.

38. Antiochus, unwilling to give up Hannibal, gave him notice of what was required, that he might shift for himself. The Province of Asia being taken from him, he said the Conquerors dealt bountifully with him therein; for now seeing his Kingdom was contained within moderate bounds, he was onely discharged from too great a burthen of Government. Two or three years after, he got another Army together, and having declared his son Seleucus his Successor, made a progresse into the upper Provinces; where (either for that he really wanted money to pay the Tribute imposed on him, or took that occasion to pretend poverty) hearing the Temple of Jupiter Belus in Elymais to be exceeding rich, he went with his Forces by night and spoiled it of a vaste treasure, making a show as if War had been made upon him by the Inhabitants thereabouts, who getting knowledge of it, came upon him, and without the help of any other, destroyed him and his whole Army. This is the end which, by the consent of Historians, hapned to him; though one there be * that telleth us, how after he was overcome and banished beyond the Mountain Taurus, he was slain by his companions, whom he had beaten in a drunken fit. He died when he had reigned 36 years, A. M. 3818. in the second of the 148 Olympiad, 185 before the Era of Christ: M. Aemilius Lepidus, and C. Flaminius being Consuls.

39. Seleucus his son succeeded him (whom he formerly declared his Successor as was said) in the 35 year of Philip King of Macedonia. This Seleucus surnamed Philopater, was no stirring man, and might have an excuse for it, being so weakened by that blow his Father received from the Romans. Once he got together a considerable force of men, and prepared to passe over Taurus to the aid of Pharnaces King of Pontus (who now waged War with Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Eumenes of Pergamus) but bethinking himself that it was not lawful to do it, by virtue of the League which the People of Rome had made with his Father, he gave over his enterprize. He revered much at first the Temple of Hierusalem, allowing out of his own revenues the charges of the publick Sacrifices; but afterwards his bounty was almost turned into rapacity by the means of Simon a Benjamite. This man being Captain of the Temple, and in contention with Onias the High Priest, when he could not have the better of him, told Apollonius Governour of Cælesyria and Phœnicia, that in the treasury there were great sums of money, which the Priests having no need of, it might well enough be taken out into the Kings Coffers. Apollonius acquainting the King with this, he sent Heliodorus his Treasurer to seize upon the money, to whom Onias declared that it belonged to widdows and orphans, that the sum of it amounted but to 400 talents of Silver, and 200 of Gold, and that such was the holinesse of the place, that it must not be violated. Heliodorus not being perswaded by this, entered the Temple, and was smitten by an Angel dead for the present, but being restored by the prayers of Onias, returned to the King, declaring the holinesse of the place, and power of God. Simon after this calumniated Onias, as if he, who had well deserved of his Nation, had been the cause of this evil, and being backed by Apollonius, in his fury proceeded to slaughters, so that Onias was forc'd to go to Seleucus, and, as some have it, got him banished, though it seems not incredible that the King was dead ere he came to him, being slain by the treachery of Heliodorus after he had reigned twelve years.

But when he died Antiochus was in his way home come as far as Athens. Eumenes therefore and Attalus, that they might bind him to them, being now a little offended at, and jealous of the Romans, drove out Heliodorus, who affected the Kingdom, and placed him in possession of it. He was called by the Syrians Epiphanes or Illustrious, because strangers usurping the Kingdom, he appeared the vindicator of the Dominion of his Ancestors, though others accounted him rather by an inlet was made, as unto idolatrie, and prophanenesse, so unto that bloodshed and cruelty which ensued from the wickednesse of this Prince, his instruments and successors. For three years onely kept he this Office, being then served in his own kind. For, sending Menelaus the brother of that Simon whom we before mentioned, to the King, to carry the money promised, and sollicit his affaires, he circumvented him after the same manner he had done his brother, promising for the Priesthood, over and above what he paid, 300 Talents; so that he had his desire, and Jason was forced to flee into the Country of the Ammonites. Antiochus being seized of Cælesyria, Ptolomy Philopater, who pretended it belonged to him, being passed over to his father as his mothers portion, sought to recover it out of his hands, whereupon he marched down to Egypt, which, having overthrown his Enemies in battel betwixt Pelusium and the mountain Cafius, he easily got into his power, pretending friendship to the young King for all this, and a provident care for his affaires. Menelaus taking occasion at his absence, took divers Golden Vessels out of the Temple at Jerusalem, some of which he gave away, and others he sold to Tyre, and other places, for which being accused of Sacrilege by Onias the lawful High-priest, he procured him to be murdered. Going on in such mischiefs he was accused to the King; but bribing Ptolomy the son of Dorymenes, got off, and procured the death of his accusers. At this time Antiochus went down the second time with a great power into Egypt, which he recovered again (the King thereof flying before him) and getting the fortified Towns into his hands, there staid, till the sons of the Jews procured his return to their destruction.

Being possessed of the Kingdom, he would slip privately out, with two other in his company, and wander about the City, keep company and drink with the meanest persons, coming on a sodain upon them with his cup and musick. Laying off his robe he put on a gown, and according to the custome of the Roman Candidates (who stood for Offices) took the People be the hand, desiring their voices for the Ædileship or Tribuneship of the People. Having then obtained the Magistracy by the Suffrages of the People after the Roman manner, he sate and gave Judgment out of an ivory chair with such diligence, as the wisest wondered what he meant, some attributing it to simplicity, some to imprudence, and others to madnesse it self.

2 Maccab. 5.

Again.

42. A false rumour being spread abroad of his death, Jason having got 1000 men at his heels, set upon Jerusalem, and getting the City into his hands, forced Menelaus into the Castle, and then made slaughters, as if he had not been amongst his Countrymen and kindred, but foreigners and Enemies, yet obtained he not the Priesthood, but was forced to betake himself back into the Country of the Ammonites, where being accused to Aretas King of the Arabians, he fled from place to place like a Vagabond, hated of all men as a forsaker of the Laws, and as the publick Enemy of his Country, and died at length at Lacedamon. Antiochus hearing in Egypt that they at Jerusalem rejoiced at the report of his death, and suspecting because of these stirrs of Jason that Judea was about to rebel, in a great rage departed thence, and came and took the City by force, and giving no quarter for three dayes space, put 80000 to the Sword, and afterwards sold as many. Yet not contenting himself with this, he prophanely entered the Temple, Menelaus that Traitor to his Country being his guide, and rifling it of the holy Vessels, killed swine upon the Altar, and with the blood of the flesh of them sprinkled the place; then taking away with him 1800 Talents, he got him back to Antioch, leaving behind him to afflict still the People at Jerusalem Philip a Phrygian, and Andronicus in Samaria; and besides them Menelaus more grievous to, and despightful against, his fellow Citizens, than the other. Two years also after this, he sent Apollonius a cruel man with an Army of 22000, commanding him to kill all that were arrived at ripeness of age, and sell the women and children for slaves. He coming to Jerusalem, kept himself still until the Sabbath, and then taking the opportunity of the solemnity of the day, set upon those imployed therein, then running through the City slew a great multitude, plundering it and setting it on fire, pulled down the houses and walls round about, and led away many women and children into captivity, whilst Antiochus his Master was busie again in his attempts upon Egypt.

43. For Ptolomy being stirred up by Eulais the Eunuch to attempt again the recovery of Cælesyria, to prevent that, he went down into Egypt, where putting him again to flight, he might have destroyed all his men, but riding to and fro himself to forbid it, he thereby procured such love, as he presently got into his hands Pelusium, and not long after all Egypt, except Alexandria. Ptolomy after this sent his Ambassadors to him, with those of the Acheans, Athenians, and others, to excuse the matter, and lay all the blame upon the Eunuch; but getting no good thereby, after he had spent some time carelessly without any further provision for his affaires, he departed to his younger brother to Alexandria, whom the Citizens there had made King after his overthrow. The Alexandrians at first received him, and made him partaker with his brother, but afterwards for some distaste banished him again, at which Antiochus took an opportunity, as thinking it best to accomplish his designs, by pretending to protect and reduce him into his Kingdom; wherefore he engaged at Pelusium with Ptolomy the younger in a naval fight, and getting the better, on a sodain laid a bridge over the Nile and besieged Alexandria. Ptolomy and Cleopatra his sister being in this danger, sent Ambassadors to Rome to crave aid; but he attempting once the walls, and experiencing the strength of the places, having sent his Ambassadors also to Rome after the other, raised his siege. About this time came the Ambassadors of the Rhodians to him to intercede, whom he put off, saying, that his intent was onely to re-establish the elder Ptolomy, which if the Alexandrians would admit of, all things with his consent might be composed. Presently after this, leaving at Memphis Ptolomy the elder, for whose sake he pretended to wage this War, and giving up the rest of Egypt to him, he only left a strong Garrison at Pelusium, and so departed into Syria, concluding with himself, that keeping this in his power, the key of the Country, he might safely suffer the two brothers to try out the quarrel; for the Conquerour being wearied beforehand, would easily be brought under by him.

44. The Ambassadors of Ptolomy obtained their desire, the Romans being jealous of the increasing power of Antiochus. For, C. Popillius Lenas, with two others, were sent with order first to go to Antiochus, after that to Ptolomy, and to denounce unto them, that except they gave over the War, him that was the hinderer of the Peace they would not account as their friend or allie. Whilst they were on their way, Ptolomy the elder bethinking himself what little cause he had to trust Antiochus, sent to his brother, and through the mediation of Cleopatra was reconciled to him, and reigned with him, the Alexandrians being willing to receive him, because their City was much straitened for provisions, by reason of the Warre. Antiochus hearing this, contrary to his former pretences, was grievously fretted, and then more eagerly than ever preparing for the War against them both, sent a Fleet against Cyprus, where Ptolomy's Forces were worsted, and in the beginning of Spring marched down for Egypt. In Cælesyria the Ambassadors of Philometer met him, and gave him thanks in their Master's name, for that by his means he had obtained the Kingdom, desiring he would continue Having perused them, he said he would consider with his friends what was to be done, and then give an answer, but Popilius after a certain insolent fashion, made a Circle round about him with his rod, and commanded him to answer before he went out of it; at which the King being amazed, after a little pause, said he would do whatsoever the people of Rome commanded; and so within a short time prefixed, grievously unwilling, and sorrowing, but judging it fit for the present to yield to the time, he drew out his Forces from Egypt and Cyprus.

45. After this he published an Edict, commanding all throughout his Dominions to observe one and the same religion, and relinquishing their own and former Rites, to conform themselves to the religion of the Greeks under pain of death, sending divers Overseers who should compel each people to the observation of his Order. Into Judea he sent an old man of Athens, with order to defile the Temple, and name it the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, as that at Gerizim the Temple of Jupiter Hospitalis; he commanded the sacrifices to be left off, the Sabbath he prohibited, he commanded them to defile the Sanctuary, build up Altars, Groves, and Chapels to Idols, to sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beasts, not to Circumcise their sons, but to forget the Law: Moreover, an order was sent unto the Neighbouring Cities, that they should force the Jews to partake of their sacrifices, and kill those which would not come over to their Rites, so that many by fear obeyed, the Temple was polluted by the dalliances of the Gentiles, the abomination of desolation, viz. the abominable idol of Jupiter Olympius was set up therein, the Scriptures burnt, and a Decree published, that with whomsoever they should be found, or whosoever should approve them, should be put to death. Many yet were they that stood out, contemned the Kings Edict, and defiled not themselves, so that being enraged he caused divers to be brought before him to force them by Torments, but they stood out courageously, and enduring the pains sealed the truth with their blood; amongst whom are very notable the Mother and her seven Sons, from the eldest of them called Macchabeus. The rage of this persecution coming to Modin, a Town situate near to Diospolis found some opposition; for there Mattathias a Priest eminent in degree, especially for his five sons, not onely refused to sacrifice, but killed a Jew at the Altar that was so doing, and after that the Kings Officer who was sent to compel the people. Then exhorting all that were zealous for their Law to follow him, he fled with his sons into the Mountain.

Many went out after him, and lived with their Wives, Children, and Cattel, in Dens and Caves, which coming to the knowledge of Philip the Governour of Jerusalem, the Garrison Soldiers were presently drawn out to pursue them, so that falling on them on the Sabbath, and they not at all resisting for the observance thereof, they cast in fire, and burnt them to the number of 1000 persons. Mattathias, and they that were with him hearing this, resolved for the time to come to repulse the Enemy on the Sabbath, and then the Asidians, a sort of religious men joyning with him, with such as dayly fled out of the Countrey, he made up a little Army, and therewith prosecuted the wicked ones, and drove them to fly to the Nations about, pulled down the Altars, and Circumcised such Children as they found in the Coasts of Israel; then after he had been Captain of this wandering Company the space of a year, he died, leaving his son Simon for a Counsellour, and Judas surnamed Maccabeus for a Captain to them. This Mattathias was the son of John, and Grand-son to Simeon, surnamed Asmonaeus. * Jacobus Capellus thinketh that this Simeon was Simon the second, son of Onias the second, and Grand-son to Simon the first, surnamed Just. But Schinterus thinketh this Simeon to have been the son of Hasmonaeus. From the * words of Josephus it should seem that Mattathias was the Great-grand-son of Asmonaeus, so-called, or Hasmon, from whom his posterity were named Hasmonaeans. * David useth the word Hasmanim to expresse Ambassadors, Princes, or Great-men. It is also observed that the Jews in Italy call the Cardinals Hasmannim or Hasmonaeans.

47. Judas being assisted by his brethren, and his fathers followers, fell upon the linemy, burnt divers of their Towns, and seized upon the Commodious places, coming usually upon them in the night, so as he forced many of them to quit the Land; Apollonius the Governour of Samaria coming against him, he overthrew, and slew him, and getting his sword ever after used it in the Wars, and after him he overthrew also Sevon, who governed Cale-Syria. Antiochus in this mean while lying about Antioch, made there Magnificent Games and Shows, imploying the money he had got in Egypt, and out of the Temples he had rifled, to that end and purpose, and enentaining his Guests in a vile and servile kind of observance. This being ended, an Ambassador from Rome arrived at his Court, sent on purpose to spy out his designs. Whom he received with such courtesie, as over doing in that point, he easily concealed the grudge he had conceived for his stop at Alexandria, and the bent of his mind which was sufficiently alienated from the Romans. But hearing of the successe of Maccabeus, and the losse of his Forces, he was exceedingly enraged, mustered all his Army, to which he gave a years pay, and commanded they should be ready at all occasions.

48. He purposed to march against Maccabeus, but seeing his Treasury exhausted by the pay of the Army (for that the Jews now being revolted, he thereby lost his 300 Talents of annual Tribute, and much also which he was wont to receive from other places, which being unwilling to quit their own religions as well the other, were in combustions) and fearing he should not have to satisfie for his gifts, wherein he took a pride to exceed all his ancestors, he resolved to make a progresse into Persia, and the upper Countreys, to gather the Tributes thereof, and fill his Coffers. But before his departure, making Lysias his Kinsman Governour of the Regions betwixt Euphrates and Egypt, to whose care he also committed his young son, he gave to him half his forces, and this in charge, to blot out the Nation of the Jews utterly, and to give their Countrey to strangers to inhabit. Philip the Governour of Jerusalem seeing to what an height Maccabeus was grown, wrote to Ptolomy the son of Dorimenes the Governour of Calesyria and Cilicia, who presently dispatched Nicanor one of his chiefest friends, and the son of

That night Gorgias thinking to oppress the Jews, at unawares, came to their Tents with a party of 5000 foot and 1000 horse; but Judas having notice thereof, turned it to his own advantage, resolving to go and fall upon Nicanor in the absence of the other, whom he knew to be the more experienced Captain. Gorgias finding the Camp empty, thought the owners had fled for fear of him into the Mountains, and sought for them there, but they being got to Nicanor engaged with him in the morning, and routed his whole Army, laying above 9000 dead upon the place; so that he, and his men perceiving presently what was done by the smoke of their Camp now set on fire, fled again, and the Jews coming to plunder the field found great Treasure, of which part being set aside for the infirm, Widows, and Orphans, the rest the Soldiers divided amongst them. After this, Judas overthrew Timotheus and Bachides, both of the Kings party, killing above 20000 men, so that then they recovered many strong holds; at which Lysias was exceedingly troubled, things falling out so contrary to his expectations, & the next year invaded Judea with an army of 60000 choice foot, and 5000 horse, but being met by Judas with 10000 men, he was received with such resolution that with the losse of 5000 he was glad to retreat to Antioch, intending greater preparations for his next expedition. Judas returning to Jerusalem cleansed the Temple, & offered sacrifice upon a new Altar, after the Heathen had held it just three years; then kept they a feast for eight dayes, and ordered it to be observed to posterity, which in the Gospel is called the Feast of the Dedication.

Afterwards hearing that the Citie Elymais in Persia was exceeding rich, and therein a Temple (of Venus, or Diana, both being asserted) wherein were laid up very rich Arms left by Alexander the Great, he being greedy of this prey, attempted to rife them both, but the Inhabitants taking Arms, repelled, and caused him shamefully to retreat. Being come to Ec-batan, he there heard of the overthrow of Nicanor and Timotheus, and then journeying towards Babylon, in the Borders of Persia, of the defeat given to that great Army of Lysias, the throwing down the Idol of Jupiter Olympius, and the fortification of the Sanctuary, whereupon he fell into a great rage, resolved to revenge himself upon the Jews for his shamefull retreat, and commanded his Chariot driver to make speed, saying, he would make Jerusalem the common burying place of them when he should come thither. Scarce had he made an end of threatening, when he was suddenly struck with exceeding torment in his bowels, which yet reduced him not to any good constitution of mind, he still breathing fury and revenge against the Jews, and crying out to make haste, but the Chariot being driven very fast, he was shaken out of it, and by the fall so sore bruised, that he was constrained to betake himself to his Litter, and then Worms crawled out of his body, the flesh whereof rotted, and fell from him yet alive. None could endure to carry him for the stench thereof, which also offended his Army, wherefore being forced to stay his journey for Oxyton, he stayed at Taba, a Town in Persia. Before his death he confessed this to have fallen upon him for the injuries offered to the Jews, acknowledged the Sovereignty of God, and his own pride, vowed if God would restore him, to grant immunities to his people, to adorn his Temple, to turn Jew himself, and to travel through the habitable world to declare his strength and power. And when he perceived his end to draw near, he wrote most kind Letters to the Jews, desiring them to stand faithfull to him, and his son after him, then constituting Philip, who had been brought up with him, the Protector and Guardian of his son, till he should come to age, he died, after he had reigned 12 years, A. These things being executed, provoked one Leptines so far as he slew *Cn. Gorgias fomenteth a War with the Jews.

52. Gorgias being Governour of the parts about Judea, fomented a continual War with the Jews, and with him joyned the Idumeans, who received all runnagates, and gave them entertainment. Against those therefore, Judas Maccabaeus marched; took divers places, and put 20000 to the Sword, after which turning upon the Ammonites, he overthrew them in divers engagements, and taking Jazer with the Territories thereto belonging, returned again into Judea. Timotheus the General of the Ammonites hereat enraged, and gathering many men out of Asia, came as if he would devour Judea, but Judas with his having humbled themselves, and called upon the name of God, gave him battel, in which 20500 Foot, and 600 of his Horse being slain, he fled to Gazara, a strong Garrison kept by his brother, but that being taken, he was pulled out of a cave where he had hid himself, and slain, together with the other. After this the Nations about Galaad and Galile afflicting sore the Jews, Maccabaeus divided his Army into three parts, one of which (viz. 3000 men) he delivered to his brother Simon to relieve them of Galile, the second to Joseph the son of Zechariah, to defend Judea, giving it in charge not to fight with any Enemy till his return, with the other he marched himself to the succour of them in Galaad. Simon fought many battels with the Enemy, and killed many of them, brought his Countrymen into Judea with great gladnesse, and Judas had the like successe, taking many Towns, and putting many thousands to the Sword; but those that were left at home desiring also upon the report hereof to archieve some military glory, marched to Famnia, whence Gorgias issuing out, put them to flight, and following the chase as far as the borders of Judea, killed about 2000 of them.

53. Lyfias the King's Protector and chief Minister of State, was displeased at the report of Judas's successe, and taking 80000 Foot with all the Horse along with him, resolved to make Jerusalem an habitation for the Greek; the Temple to pay tribute, and the Priesthood thereof to set to sale every year. He came and besieged Bethsura night to Jerusalem; but Maccabaeus then meeting with him killed 11000 of his Foot, with 1600 Horse-men, and forced him with the rest (many of them wounded and disarmed) to shift for themselves. Considering this defeat, and that God fought for the Jews, he sent to them to treat of Peace, and according to his promise brought the King to yield to such reasonable conditions as were offered by Maccabaeus; but it was quickly broken by Timotheus, and other Captains, that governed the places adjoyning to Judea, at which time they of Joppe also drawing

After this he stormed the City Caspis (wherein was such a slaughter made of the Inhabitants, that a Lake thereto adjoining seemed to be full of blood) and then proceeding 750 furlongs came to the Jews called Tubieni inhabiting the Land of Tob (concerning which mention is made in the Book of Judges) whence Timotheus was departed, but had left a strong Garrison, which being taken by Dositheus and Sosipater two of Judas his Officers, they put to the sword above 10000 men.

54. Timotheus gathered together from the Nations round about him and the Arabians 12000 Foot, and 2500 Horse, wherewith, putting up the women and children into a strong Fort called Carnion, he came and pitched his Tents against Raphon beyond the brook; but his great multitude was so surprized with fear upon the approaching of Judas, that every man shifted for himself, and what by their running upon one anothers swords, and the pursure which Maccabeus followed on with much earnestnesse, 30000 of them were slain, and he himself fell into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, from whom he obtained his liberty, upon promise of dismissing such of their Countrymen as he had taken. Judas then proceeding took Carnion, wherein 25000 were put to the sword, after which he gathered all the Jews out of Galaad to bring them into Judaea, and for that the City Ephron, through which they must needs passe, denied them entrance, they took it by force, and destroying the Inhabitants, went through and came up to Jerusalem to the Feast of Pentecost. The Feast being ended, he taking 2000 Foot, and 400 Horse along with him, went and fought with Gorgias, whom one Dositheus of Bacenor his Company had once taken, but holding him by the cloak, a certain Thracian came and cut off his shoulder, so that the prisoner escaped. After the Victory the Jews coming to strip and bury such of their own party as had fallen that day, found under their coats certain things dedicated to the idols of Jamnia, so that it appearing that this being forbidden them by the Law was the cause of their death, they betook themselves by Prayer to God, intreating that it might not be charged upon them all. After this Judas subdued the Edomites, and the Philistines, their idols he burnt, and overthrew their altars, and then returning into Judaea, for that he found the Kings Garrison Soldiers which yet kept the Castle to straighten and infect the Israelites about the Sanctuary, with all the People, he besieged them close, but some of them with certain Jewish fugitives getting out, went straight to Antiochus, and perswaded him with all expedition to come and give a check to the growing power of the Jews.

Passing through Idumaea he came and sat down before Bethsura, where Judas by night with a choice party fell upon his Camp, and piercing as far as his own Tent slew 4000 men, and the prime Elephant, with those upon him, and giving an Alarm to the whole Army at break of the day, safely retreated, whereupon the King marched towards him the next day, and coming to an engagement lost 600 men more; but the Jews seeing themselves overpowered, retreated. Then returned he to the siege, which Judas sore molested, cutting off many of his men, and relieving the besieged with provisions, who being not provided within themselves, because this was the Sabbatical year, yielded up the Town upon composition. Antiochus having herein placed a Garrison marched up to Jerusalem, and there made made all provision possible for gaining it, all manner of engines being raised for the casting of fire and stones; which the besieged resisted as well as they might by others of their own, but as for provisions, were in no better condition than they of Bethsura had been, which gave opportunity enough to the King; but before he could perfect his work, came news that Philip, whom his Father had ordained to be his guardian, being returned out of Aegypt, was coming with the Forces which Epiphanes had left in Persia and Media to recover his right usurped by Lysias. Hereupon both he and his Captains were presently perswaded by Lysias (because their provisions began to fail, the place was strong, and the affaires of the Kingdom required it) to make Peace with the besieged upon such terms as they required.

56. Going to the Temple he offered sacrifice, and shewed civility and respect towards the place, but a little after considering the strength thereof, caused the wall round about to be demolished, contrary to his oath. Then returning to Ptolemais, the Inhabitants being great Enemies to the Jews, stickled hard to break the League, but Lysias by his defence quieted their minds, and confirmed the Peace. The King halting thence towards Antioch, Lysias accused Menelaus the High-priest to him, as an incendiary, and he that had been the cause of the War, so that being thrown into a Tower full of ashes, he there miserably ended his life, and in his room was substituted one Alcimus of Aron's line, but not of the family of the Priests, through Lysias his direction, which Onias the son of the last Onias the Priest understanding, went into Aegypt, where insinuating himself into Ptolomy Philometor and Cleopatra, he obtained a Temple like that at Jerusalem to be built in the Province of Heliopolis, and himself to be made Priest thereof. Antiochus coming to Alexandria, found Philip Master thereof, but setting upon it he took it by force, and taking him therein put him to death, and so quickly quieted these stirs, being reserved with his Guardian, though but a little time, for others more dangerous. His Ambassadors now, which Lysias had sent about the death of Octavius, had been at Rome, where labouring to clear him of the fact, they were sent back without answer, whereat Demetrius the son of Seleucus being much startled, began to cast again in his head how to obtain his freedom, and the Kingdom, according to his title, which was so clear and evident.

57. Consulting with Polybius the Achaean and Historian, whether he should not once more move the Senate in the businesse, he advised him not to dash himself twice against the same Rock, but attempt something of himself worthy of a Kingdom, hinting thereby what he would have him to do. But he being ruled by one Apollonius his intimate friend, but a young unexperienced man, requested the Fathers again, that at least he might not be constrained to stay there as an Hostage, seeing they had secured the Kingdom of his Cousin Antiochus. They yet remained of the same opinion, and resolved as formerly, so that then he consulted how to escape, first with Diodorus a cunning man, who was come from Syria, and had belonged to him, and then with Polybius, who procured Menethyllus the Aegyptian Ambassador to hire a Carthaginian ship just then sailing for Tyre; so that Diodorus being sent before to feel the People's mind, and seek for advantages, he taking a few friends along with him supped at a friend's house, whither, for fear he should stay too long, Polybius sent him a secret hint, not to let slip this opportunity; whereupon making as though he was sick, he arose from the table, and came that night to Ostia upon the mouth of Tyber. Menethyllus going before told the Master of the ship, that he had received orders from his Prince to reside still at Rome; but that he would send some young men of approved fidelity to him, to acquaint him with the affaires of his negotiation: So Demetrius and his followers going on shipboard, away they sailed by break of day. At Rome nothing was known of his escape till the fourth day. On the fifth the Senate met about it; yet did not make any provision for the pursuing of him, thinking it to be too late; but a few dayes after, they sent three Commissioners into Greece, who viewing the affaires there, were commanded thence to passe into Asia, and amongst other things have an eye to what he should attempt.

58. Landing in Lycia, he thence wrote to the Senate, that he had no intentions to disturb his Cousin Antiochus, but onely revenge upon Lysias the death of Citavius; then getting into his hands Tripolis, a Town of Phœnicia, as sent by the Senate to possesse the Kingdom, none gain-said him; so that he seized also upon Sparnea. Thence, having gotten some forces together, he marched towards Antioch, out of which Antiochus, with Lysias his Governour (for that they thought he was sent by the Romans, and therefore feared to oppose him) coming out to meet him in a friendly manner, was presently made away, after he had reigned about two years. Demetrius having thus obtained the Kingdom, displaced Heracles, whom Epiphanes his Uncle had made Treasurer at Babylon, and his brother Timarchus, whom he had also placed Governour there; for that he had badly behaved himself in his Office, whence from the Babylonians he got the surname of Soter, the next after Antiochus the son of Seleucus Nicator, as * Appian observeth. The Roman Commissioners being now come to Ariarabes into Cappadocia, he sent Menocharis thither to them, to deal with them about his confirmation in the Kingdom; offered also to Ariarabes the Widow of Persens of Macedonia, and his sister to wife; but he refused her for fear of giving offence to the Romans. After the return of Menocharis and his report, thinking it his main interest to oblige these men, he cast off all other things, and labouring to please them, sent first to them into Pamphylia, then to Rhodes, offering to do any thing whereby to purchase his being acknowledged King by the Romans, and Tiberius one of the Commissioners stood him in great stead for the obtaining of this his desire. He shortly after sent Menocharis, and others in Ambassage to Rome, and with them Leptines the murderer of Octavius (who offered himself to be sent) and a Crown of Gold in token of his thankfulness for his good usage all the time of his being an Hostage. The Senate long deliberating upon the business, resolved at length not to receive Leptines, lest they should seem to be satisfied for the publick affront; but rather lay the blame upon all Syria, and reserve to themselves an occasion of revenge, when, and as often as they should see convenient: as for Demetrius himself, they bestowed their friendship upon him, with this condition, if he would give sufficient caution to be thenceforth as much in their power as formerly.

59. Alcimus, who had procured from Eupator to be made High-Priest, and now was not received nor owned by the people, because that in the dayes of Epiphanes he had defiled himself, came to Demetrius with other Apostates, and such like as himself, and accused his Countrey-men, especially the Hasmoneans (i.e. Judas and his brethren) that they had cut off, and banished his friends; whereupon he sent one Bachides a trusty friend with great forces into Judea, confirming the Priesthood to Alcimus, whom he sent back with him. All their design, being arrived there, was to get Judas into their hands; divers Scribes going out to them to sollicite for peace, being confident because the Priest was of the seed of Aaron, he most wickedly, and contrary to his Oath given, slew sixty of them in one day; then Bachides going from Hierusalem, sent about, and caused divers that had fled from him, and many of the people whom being slain he cast into a great pit, and so committing the Countrey to Alcimus (to the defence of which he left him some forces) he returned unto his King. After his departure, Alcimus striving to confirm himself in the Priesthood, made great havock of the people, to restrain which, Judas went throughout the Countrey, and compelled his party to shut themselves up within their holds, and growing stronger, he restrained their invasions, so that Alcimus being afraid of him goes once more unto the King, carrying along with him a Crown of Gold, a Palm, and of the boughs which were used solemnly in the Temple; and seeing he could not have any more access to the holy Altar, taking a fit opportunity when he was asked of the affairs of his Countrey, accused the Asideans, and especially Judas, as seditious, of depriving him of the Priesthood (the honour as he said of his Ancestors)

Ancestors) and plainly affirmed that as long as Maccabeus lived the Kings affairs could not be secure. This being seconded by some ill-willers to the Jews, Demetrius was inflamed, and sending for Nicanor one of his chiefest Princes, and a bitter Enemy to the Israelites, made him Captain over Judea, and sent him forth with a Command to slay Judas, to scatter them that were with him, and make Alcimus High Priest of the great Temple.

Nicanor at first much loveth
Maccabeus.

60. When he was come thither, and understood the courage and resolution of Judas, his brethren and companions, for the defence of their Country, he feared to try the chance of War, and sent to make peace with the people, who having agreed unto the Covenants, the two Captains came together to consult about the League. Nicanor was so taken with Judas as he continued with him, loved him in his heart, and perswaded him to marry, and beget Children; and so remained constant in his affection to him, till Alcimus perceiving it, and understanding the Covenants which were made betwixt them, took a third journey to the King, told him that Nicanor had taken strange matters in hand, and appointed Judas, a Traitor to the Realm, to be his Successor. Demetrius being hereat displeased, by Letters checked him for these things, and commanded him in all haste to send Maccabeus bound unto Antioch, which grievously troubled him, that he, who had done no hurt, should be thus used, but conceiving it necessary for him to comply with the pleasure of the King, he waited for a convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Behaving himself thenceforth more roughly to him, the other suspected something by the great change of his carriage, and therefore gathering a few of his men, withdrew himself from him, but he followed him with a strong power to Jerusalem, and drawing him out to talk with him, had prepared some to seize on him; yet he having notice hereof got away, and would see him no more. Seeing his design to be discovered, he went and fought with him near Capharsalama, in which he lost about 5000 of his men, and the rest fled into the Citie of David. After this he came up to Mount Sion, and some of the Priests with the Elders of the people went forth of the sanctuary to salute him peaceably, and shew him the burnt-offering that was offered for the King; but he jeering hereat, demanded Judas to be delivered unto him, and they affirming with an Oath that they knew not where he was, he stretching out his hand against the Temple, swore that except Judas and his forces were delivered up, he would when he should return in peace, set the sanctuary on fire, demolish the Altar, and build there a stately Temple to Bacchus. The Priests hearing this went in, and standing before the Altar, with tears begged of God that he would frustrate the mans intentions, and be avenged upon him and his Host for his blasphemous words.

61. Hearing that Judas was gone from Jerusalem into Samaria, he went and pitched his Tents in Bethhoron, where new supplies from Syria came to him, the Enemy being in Hadasa 30 furlongs off, with no more than 3000 men. He would fain have fought on the Sabbath day, which the Jews, who were constrained to follow, friendly dehorting him from, with great blasphemy uttered against God, he refused to hear them, demanding if there were a living Lord in heaven, who commanded that seventh day to be kept, and saying, he himself was mighty upon earth to command them to Arm themselves, and to perform the Kings businesse. But coming to the ingagement, he himself was slain first, which when his Army saw, they cast away their Arms and fled, and the Israelites following the chace slew 30000. so that not one of the Army was left remaining. Coming to the plunder of the field they cut off Nicanor's head and hands, and carried them to Jerusalem, where they were hung up before the Temple, his tongue being cut in pieces, and cast unto the Fowls. Then they decreed, that the 13th day of the 12th moneth Adar (as the Syrians call it) the day before Mardocheus his day, should be observed every year, as the Author of the second book of Maccabees tells us, who with this story finisheth his work, being the Epitome of the five books of Jas- and then Judas hearing of the power of the Romans, and their compassion of the distressed, and how much Demetrius stood in awe of them, sent Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazer on an Ambassage to the Senate, that entering into society with them, the People might be freed from the yoke of Demetrius and the Greeks. But Demetrius hearing of the mischance of Nicanor and his Forces, sent Bachides and Alcimus again into Judea with the greater part of his forces, who coming to Jerusalem to seek for Judas, marched thence with 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse against him, who had but 3000 men in all. With these few he setting upon Bachides, all of them forsook him but 800, with which yet he so charged him, as fighting from morning till night, he put to flight the right wing in which he stood, but they of the left perceiving this, followed him behind as he gave the charge, and compassing him in, slew him, all his men then shifting forthemselves. This hapned A. M. 3844. of the Greeks or Seleucida the 152, in the second of Demetrius Soter, and after he led the People, from his Fathers death, six years.

62. A great famine then raging, almost all the Country submitted to Bachides, that they might the more commodiously get bread, and he made such wicked persons Governours, as bringing to him the friends of Judas, he mocked them, and revenged himself upon them. But such of them as remained, and could do it, assembled themselves together, and chose Jonathan (Surnamed Apphus) their Captain in the room of Judas his brother, which Bachides hearing sought to kill him, but he understanding thereof, fled into the Desert Thecoa, having sent his brother John (Surnamed Gaddis) with a party to the Nabathæan Arabs, to desire they might leave their baggage amongst them. He going down with it, was met in the way by the children of Iambri from Medaba, who killing him and those with him, seized upon the prey; but no great joy had they of their booty; for Jonathan and his brother Simon hearing that they were about to make a great marriage, and bring the bride from Medaba with great pomp, being the Daughter of one of the noblest Princes of Canaan, they went, and hiding themselves under the covert of the Mountain, when the Bridgroom and his friends came forth with Timbrels and instruments of Musick, rose up out of the ambush, slew many of them, and took the spoil; so having revenged the death of their brother, they returned again unto Jorden. When Bachides heard this, he marched down, and came thither with a great Army upon the Sabbath Day, and Jonathan being beset behind and before with the Enemy, and on each side with the River and Marishes, encouraged yet his men to fight, and lifting up his hand struck at Bachides. But he declined the blow; then seeing himself too weak for the Enemy he leaped into the River after he had slain 1000 of them, and sworn over with his men to the further side. Bachides would not adventure to follow, but returning to Jerusalem, built up the strong Forts throughout the Land, and placed therein strong Garrisons, that thence making excursions, he might endamage the Jews. He fortified the Cities Bethsura and Gazara, with the Castle at Jerusalem, where he placed Soldiers with provisions, and taking the sons of the chief of the Country for Hostages, he secured them in the later.

63. The Ambassadors sent by Maccabeus to the Romans were well received, and entered into a League and society with the Romans, which being written in Tables of brasse, contained an ingagement mutually to succour and relieve each other. The Senate also wrote to Demetrius, charging him no more to hurt or indamage the Jews, being their confederates, under pain of being prosecuted with War both at Land and Sea. Not long after Alcimus the High-priest commanded the wall in the Temple, which severed the Court of the People from that of the Gentiles, to be pulled down, which had been built by Zorobabel, and the Prophets, whose monuments he began to pull down and destroy; but at the same time he was so smitten that he could not open his mouth, being taken with a Palsie, so as he could not speak nor give order concerning his house, and died with great torment. When Bachides chides saw that he was dead, he returned unto the King. Two years then did the Land continue quiet, but at the end thereof, certain wicked persons sent for Bachides to return, telling him he might easily apprehend Jonathan and all his Company in one night, at which message he arose with great haste, and sent letters privily to his adherents to take them, but they having notice of it, took fifty of these men, which had been the greatest sticklers, and slew them. Then Jonathan departing into the Wilderness, built up the walls of Berthusa, and fortified it, which Bachides having notice of went down thither, and closely besieged it; but such was his entertainment from the besieged (who getting out killed his men, and burnt his engines,) that having lain before the place a long time to no purpose, and seeing his journey to be frustrate, he eased his stomach against those that had been the cause of his Expedition, and putting to death many of them, resolved to retreat into his own Country. Jonathan having notice of this, sent to him to treat of Peace, and exchange the prisoners, which he gladly accepted of, and made an oath never more to disturb him. Returning then home he never brake it; so that the Warre being removed, Jonathan dwelt at Machmas (or Michmas) in the Tribe of Benjamin, began to govern the People, and destroy the ungodly out of Israel.

64. Ariarathes (the fifth of that name) King of Cappadocia, married (as we said before) Antiochia the daughter of Antiochus the Great. She having no children by him at the first, introduced two suppositious boyes, Ariarathes and Orophernes, he knowing nothing hereof; but a little after growing fruitful, she brought forth two daughters, and a son called Mithridates, and then acquainting her husband with what she had formerly done, procured the two Counterfeits to be sent, the one to Rome, and the other into Ionia, lest they should disturb the true one in his succession, who, being named Ariarathes, and brought up in the fashions and customs of the Greeks, obtained the Kingdom after his Fathers death. Orophernes afterwards resolving to venture for it, came to Demetrius, complaining he was injuriously deprived of the Kingdom by his younger brother, and craved his assistance for the recovery of it. He being offended at Ariarathes for the refusing the marriage of his sister the widdow of Persus, bargained with Orophernes for 1000 Talents, and expelled Ariarathes from Cappadocia, though he was helped by Eumenes King of Pergamus. Orophernes having thus invaded the Kingdom, behaved himself not like one who intended to secure it to himself in the love of his People, but tagging against them with pillages and slughters, and corrupting himself with the luxurie of Ionia (where he had been brought up) pulled upon him the hatred of all his Subjects, which he perceiving, made onely as an occasion further to prosecute his wicked and unreasonable designs. Ariarathes went straight to Rome to crave aid; and the Ambassadors both of Demetrius and the other, followed to excuse what was done, and re-criminate him, which those of Orophernes performed so dexterously, that no body being present that could confute their lies, they seemed to gain credit, and Ariarathes because he had been the confederate of the Romans, was ordered to reign together with his brother. This was all he got at Rome; but shortly after Attalus the brother and successor of Eumenes expelled Orophernes and Demetrius quite out of Cappadocia, and restored him to the entire possession of his Kingdom.

65. Not long after, Demetrius casting in his head how to enlarge his Dominions, offered Archas, the Governour of Cyprus for Ptolomy Philometor, 500 Talents to betray the Island into his hands; which the man consented to, but being discovered and sentenced, prevented the execution by hanging himself. Being thus frustrated in this design, he thenceforth giving himself up to idlenesse, having built a Castle fortified with 4 Towers not far from Antioch, wherein he passeth away the time without any attendance of State affaires, out of the sight of his Subjects. merkindness, as to conspire with them to rob him of his Kingdom and life. He getting knowledge of this, spared his life, lest he should free Ariarathes from the fear of a competitor, and caused him to be kept securely at Seleucia; but the Antiochians not at all terrified from their attempt, went on in their rebellion, to which Attalus of Asia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Ptolomy lending their helping hand, they suborned a young man of the basest condition (by one (a) called Prompalus, by others (b) Ba'as, and (c) Balles) giving him the name of Alexander, and reporting him to be son of Antiochus Epiphanes, to recover as it were his Fathers Kingdom by force. This youth, together with Laodice Antiochus his daughter, did (d) Heraclides (whom Demetrius cast out, as we said, of the Office of Treasurer at Babylon) carry to Rome, where he brought him into the Senate, and caused him to desire that he might be helped in the recovery of the Kingdom, at least that he might not be hindered in his endeavour that way; then he seconding him inveighed against Demetrius, and heaped up the praises and merits of Antiochus so far, as though to all sober minded men his impudence was distasteful as well as his person, yet he so bewitched the generality of the Fathers, that a Decree was made, whereby power was given to them to return, and aid ordered them for the recovery of the Kingdom (being the children of their late friend and ally) as they had required.

66. Heraclides having obtained this act of the Senate, presently hired Souldiers, and getting many eminent men to joyn with him, went to Epheesus, where he made all possible preparation for the War. Not long after Alexander got Ptolemais a City of Phœnicia, being betrayed to him by the Garrison Soldiers, which Demetrius hearing, gathered together his Forces to go and fight with him, but considering the uncertainty of the chance of War, sent away his two sons Demetrius and Antiochus unto Cnidus to be out of the danger, and be reserved to revenge his death or deprivation if need should require. He sent also to Jonathan the Captain of the Jews, to renew Peace with him, giving him power to raise forces against Alexander, and commanding the Hostages kept in the Castle at Jerusalem to be restored to him, which he using as a good opportunity, began to build Jerusalem anew, and repair the walls, but Alexander having notice of Demetrius his message, and the promises made by him, sent to him in like manner, and amongst many privileges and immunities granted to the Nation, appointed him to be the High-priest, sending him Purple and a Crown of Gold. So, in the seventh moneth of the 160 year of the Seleucida, Jonathan put on the holy robe, in the ninth after the death of his brother Judas (the Priesthood having been vacant seven years from the death of Aleimus) being the first of the Hasmoneans that arrived at this dignity, and of the priestly family, but not of the Pontifical, to which Onias (who now was in Egypt) was next heir. Demetrius hearing of the agreement his Enemy had made with the Jews, was sore troubled thereat, and laboured again by incredible promises to allure them to his own party; but they having had experience formerly how his affections stood towards them, refused to entertain his overtures. Balas gathering his forces together, not onely those that revolted to him in Syria, but his Auxiliaries also sent from Jonathan, Ariarathes, Attalus, and especially from Ptolomy Philometor, gave battel to Demetrius, whose left wing put those to flight which fought against it, but the right having the contrary fortune was forced to run, which yet he would not do, though in it, but fighting manfully, light with his Horse into a bog, where he fought stoutly on his feet, till at last he was slain with many wounds, after he had reigned twelve years. Contendeth for the Kingdom of Syria

And Demetrius being slain in battel

67. Alexander Balas obtained the Kingdom, and shortly after his possession of it, remembering how much he was beholding to Ptolomy Philometor for it, sent to him for his Daughter to wife, which he willingly assenting to, brought her to Ptolemais, and married her to him with royal magnificence. Thither came down Jonathan from Jerusalem, bringing presents for both the Kings,

Alexander Balas getteth the Kingdom and marieth Ptolomie's daughter.

Kings, but was followed by divers naughty persons to accuse him; Yet Alexander was so far from listning to any tales, that he caused him to be clothed in purple, to sit near him, and by proclamation commanded all his accusers to forbear, at which they being discouraged, went their wayes. After this Alexander giving up himself to idlenesse, & luxurie, and minding nothing else, the affaires of the State were wholly managed by one Ammonius, who made slaughter of all his friends, and amongst the rest slew Laodice the Daughter of Epiphanes. Which being heard by Demetrius the eldest Son of Demetrius Soter, he hired Soldiers in Crete, and came into Cilicia, at which the other being affrighted, hastened to Antioch to secure his estate before his coming, where he made Hierax, and Diodotus (or Tryphon) governours. With Demetrius joyned Apollonius the Governour of Cœlesyria, who being ordered to fight against the Jews, who still stood true to Alexander, with great pride provoked Jonathan to fight with him, and he accordingly marched from Jerusalem against him with 10000 men. In his way he took Joppe, which Apollonius understanding marched to Ashdod, and left an Ambush in the way to intrap him, but he getting clear of the Ambush, put all his forces to flight, whereof many men fled into the Temple of the idol Dagon, which he set on fire, and what by this means and by the sword perished about 8000 men. This coming to the ears of Alexander, he honoured Jonathan more than ever: he sent him a button of Gold, wont to be given to the Kings kinsmen, and gave him Accaron a City of the Philistines with it's Territories as an inheritance.

68. Ptolomy Philometor with great forces both by Land and Sea, came out of Egypt, under pretence of aiding his son in Law, but indeed with an intention to seize upon Syria, and accordingly all the Cities being commanded to receive him honourably, he placed therein Garrisons of his own. He got into his hands all the maritime Cities as far as Seleucia upon Orontes, and then being clear out of conceit with Alexander (for that he demanding Ammonius who had plotted his destruction, he would not deliver him up) he sent and made an agreement with Demetrius, promising him to take away his daughter from Balas and give her to him, together with the recovery of his fathers Kingdom. The Antiochians slew Ammonius, and let Ptolomy into their City, who there put two Diadems upon his head; but presently brought them to receive Demetrius, promising them that this should make amends for the injury formerly offered his Father, and then the Soldiers revolted also. Alexander being now in Cilicia consulted with the Oracle of Apollo Sardinicus, from which he had answer, that he should look to himself in that place which had brought forth a double formed spectacle, which seemed to point out the City Abas in Arabia, where a certain woman named Herais, being married to one Samias turned to a man; and where he was slain not long after. For invading Syria with fire and sword, Ptolomy with Demetrius his new son in Law met and overthrew him at the River Oenopara, and then he flying to Abas, his head was cut off by Zabd the Prince of the place, and sent to Ptolomy, who though he received it with much joy, yet having in the fight received a great hurt in the head, upon the searching of the wound he died also the third day after. Such end had the strange fortune of this counterfeit Alexander, after he had reigned about five years.

69. Demetrius then according to his right obtained his Father's Kingdom, and for that he had subdued this counterfeiter of his family had (the next after Seleucus the founder of the race) the Syname of Nicanor or Nicator. About this time Jonathan besieged the Castle at Jerusalem, and did all he could with his Engines to reduce it; but this being by some illwillers made known to Demetrius, he wrote to him, in anger, to raise the siege, and appear before him at Prolemais, which he obeyed so far as to go to him; and partly by his presents and otherwayes so appeased him, as rejecting his accusers, he confirmed to him the Priesthood, and upon promise of 300 Talents granted him immunity from tribute, with the Principality of three other places. After this, seeing his Realm to be quiet on every side, Demetrius disbanded all his old Soldiers, retaining onely some Cretians and other Islanders, which so intraged them, being wont by the former Kings to be kept in pay, as an incouragement to them for future service, that they thenceforth became his Enemies, and shewed it upon occasion which he also himself presented them, being wholly ruled by one Lasthenes, who had helped him in the recovery of the Kingdom. By this man's advice, thinking himself secure enough of his estate, he cruelly raged against such as had been against him, and plunged himself into bad courses; which (together with the alienation of the minds of the Soldiers) one Diodotus an Apamean, and one of Alexander Balas his Captains, considering, went to Elmalchueles the Arabian, with whom Antiochus the young son of that Alexander by Cleopatra was brought up, and acquainting him how things stood, at length obtained to have the boy delivered to him, to be restored to his Father's Kingdom. Demetrius seeing his Soldiers alienated from him, desired of Jonathan a supply, with great promises of respect and succour. He sent him 3000 men, which stood him in good stead, for he going about to disarm the Antiochians, they flatly refused it, and rising, came many thousands to the Court to make an end of him, but these Jews so repelled them, as slaying a great number they set the City on fire, whereupon the inhabitants were glad to submit.

Tryphon intending to set up for himself,

70. Diodotus, or Tryphon, took Antiochus the young son of Balas, brought him out of Arabia into Syria, and there crowned him, giving him the surname of Theus. Hereupon all the disbanded Soldiers came over to him, so that Tryphon made open War against Demetrius, and overthrowing him in battle forced him to flie to Seleucia. Then sent Antiochus to Jonathan messengers with presents, and great promises, to draw him to his party, which he easily did, because Demetrius had falsified his word, and proved very ingrateful towards him, who now therefore gathering his men together, reduced the Country beyond Jordan as far as Damascus, and overthrew a party which there met him, killing to the number of 3000 men, after which he sent an Ambassage to the Romans, to renew the alliance made with them by Judas. Tryphon having brought his design thus far on, as to break the power of Demetrius, and having to that end desired the friendship of Jonathan, yet now desired his ruine above all things, as standing in his way for the accomplishment of his intended treason. He resolved to seize upon the Kingdom himself; but fearing Jonathan might stand fast to the interest of his young King, and oppose him, came down to Bethsan to see if he could apprehend him. Thither came Jonathan down with 40000 men to meet him, who entertained him with exceeding great respect, and advised him to dismisse all his Army, and with a few go along with him to Ptolemais, which he promised to put into his hands. He consenting to this, sent all his men back but 1000, which taking along with him, upon their entrance into the Town they were all cut off, he himself being kept prisoner. Then Tryphon invaded Judea with a great Army, which to oppose, Simon the brother of Jonathan was chosen General in his stead by the People; so that he seeing the Jews prepared for resistance, feigned as if Jonathan was onely detained for 100 Talents of Silver which he was in arrear, which if they were sent, together with his two sons for Hostages, he promised he should be released. Simon, though he distrusted him, yet lest it should be said that he neglected any thing for his brothers safety, sent his nephews with the money, which having received, he nevertheless slew Jonathan, and then returned into Syria.

Then killeth Antiochus his new made King. Seeketh friends in vain.

71. He presently after made away young Antiochus, for giving out he was troubled with the stone, under pretence of cutting him for it, he caused the Physicians to kill him. Then after he had gotten the Kingdom, he laboured to confirm himself therein by the approbation of his most powerful Neighbours, sending to Rome an Ambassador not empty-handed, but the Senate taking the present (a Golden image of Victory of great value) instead of his name, ingraved that of his young King whom he had murdered. For all this he proceeded with great resolution, coyned money with his own effigies and name, having taken that of Tryphon upon him. Simon being disdisobliged, and accounting his acts to be but as Robberies, sent a Crown of Gold to make his peace again with Demetrius, who considering the respect the Romans had shewed his Nation, promised to bury all things in Oblivion, and confirmed the immunities formerly granted; so that the yoke of the Gentiles now being removed, the people began to dare their instruments according to the years of their High-Priests. The year after he had the Castle of Jerusalem surrendered to him, the Defendants being almost all consumed with famine, which he cleansing and fortifying anew, together with the Hill of the Temple, dwelt then in Jerusalem, and after he had been High-Priest about three years, by a publick instrument of the Priests, Nobles, and the people (after a recapitulation of his merits and services to his Nation, amongst which an Ambassage lately sent to Rome, and there well received, was a great inducement) he was made their Prince and High-Priest perpetually, till God should raise up the true Prophet, and all Ornaments and Privileges of Majesty were given to him. This being made in brasse, was fastened to the Wall that compassed the sanctuary, in an open place, and a Copy thereof was laid up in the Treasury, that Simon and his sons might have it.

72. But the Cities all over revolting from Demetrius, who, we said, was driven to Seleucia, that he might shake off suspicion of laziness, he resolved to make War upon the Parthian, who had extended his Empire from the River Indus as far as Euphrates, and done no lesse things than Arfaces himself. The Macedonians and Greeks not well bearing the pride of their new Masters, the Parthians, sent to him often, with promise to revolt to him if he would but come up. He being tickled at this Message, made haste thither, not fearing but if he once were Master of these Provinces, with ease to drive Tryphon out of Syria; and being received with great alacrity, and strengthened with the Auxiliaries of the Persians, Bactrians, and Elymeans, he overthrew the Parthians in several battels, but at length being circumvented by the cunning of one of their Princes (sent, under colour of treating of peace, to entrap him) having lost his Army, he fell into their hands, and then being carried for a laughing stock up and down the revolted Countreys, was cast into prison. Arfaces having so soon recovered all, raged not against the Revolters, but carried it towards his people with humility and respect, and not long after sending Demetrius into Hircania, there maintained him with royal equipage, and not onely so, but gave him his daughter in marriage, with promise also to restore him to his Kingdom. But whilst Demetrius lived thus in exile, Tryphon's Soldiers being weary of his conditions revolted to Cleopatra his wife, which then lived in Seleucia with her Children, and now taking it in great disdain that he had married Rhodoguna the Parthian's daughter, sent to his brother Antiochus (the second son of Demetrius Soter, whose surname he also obtained from the Jews) offering him marriage, and the Kingdom. He willingly accepting of the offer, took the name of King upon him, sent into Judea to Simon, offering him great privileges to joyn with him in Alliance, and returning into Syria presently married Cleopatra.

Whilst Antiochus lay before Dora, Simon by virtue of their Alliance sent him out of Judea a party of 2000 choice men, with silver and gold, and much furniture for the War; yet he would not receive them, but brake the League, and sending Athenobius to him, complained of his holding Joppe, Gazara, and the Castle at Jerusalem, his destroying the borders, and having the Government of divers places of his Kingdom, requiring him either to deliver up the Cities with the Tributes of such places as were without the borders of Judea, or else to pay 500 Talents for the Cities, and the harm he had done, and for the Tributes of the places other 500, upon pain of being prosecuted with War. To these things Simon answered, that he held no Towns belonging to any other, but had recovered his own by right of War; but as for Joppe and Gazara which had done great harm to his people, he offered to pay him 100 Talents, at which the King was so displeased, that following at that time Tryphon to Ortobasias, he left Cendebeus to oversee the Sea-Coasts, with order to build up Cedron, whence he might make War upon the Jews. He coming to Iamnia made inroads upon Judaa, and built up that Town according to order, which John the son of Simon then lying at Gazara understanding, gave notice thereof to his father, who now being decrepit, committed the War to him and his brother Judas. He taking with him 20000 foot, and a party of horse, marched straight down against Cendebeus, and then placing his horse in the midst of the foot, that it might protect, and be protected against the Cavalry of the Enemy, which was exceeding strong, he overthrew him, and putting the whole Army to the rout, some betook themselves into the Fort newly built, and others flying away, he pursued them as far as the Towers of Azotus, which having set on fire, and slain 2000 men, he retreated safe into Judaa.

74. This success of John sufficiently moved Antiochus to punish Simon, but it was done to his hand by one who of all others might least have done it. There was one Ptolomy the son of Abubus, son-in-law to Simon, and by him set over the Province of Jericho. He entertaining his father-in-law as he went his Circuit about the Countrey, to take care for the Government thereof, slew him treacherously after a feast, together with his two sons Mattathias and Judas, when he had governed the people 8 years. His design was, being rich, to obtain the Principality of that Countrey where he lived, and therefore he presently certified Antiochus of his fear, desiring an Army of him, wherewith he might subdue the Cities of Judaa. He also sent certain cut-throats to murder John, Simons son, wrote to the Collonels of the Army to draw them over to him, and sent others to seize upon Ierusalem and the Temple; But John having timely notice of his treachery, prevented his death by that of the Messengers, and was made High-Priest in the room of his father: and here the Author of the first books of Maccabees concludes his work, having therein delivered the history of 40 years. Antiochus taking the opportunity of Simons death, came into Judaa, which wasting round about, he drove up John (surnamed Hyrcanus) into Ierusalem, to which he laid close siege, his Army being divided into seven parts. The besieged, being exceedingly helped from the strength of the Walls, stood out manfully, so that he raised an hundred Turrets, from which he endeavoured to scale the Walls, and compassed in the Town with a double Trench, that none might escape, but they still defending themselves, sometimes sallied out, and did him harm. Hyrcanus seeing a great and uselesse multitude in the Citie, which consumed the victuals, put out the more infirm out of the Walls, whence being hindered from going any further by the siege, they wandred about the Walls almost famished, till at the feast of Tabernacles, out of pity, they were again admitted.

75. At this feast of Tabernacles, Hyrcanus sent out to Antiochus to desire a Truce for seven dayes, because of the celebration thereof. He not onely granted this, but sent in also Bulls with gilded horns, golden, and silver Cups, with all sorts of spices, and beasts for sacrifice, and made a feast to the Army, by which the other taking notice of his great humanity (whence he was surnamed Pius, as also, uncertain for what other reason, Sideres) withall, considering that the Sabbatical year being now at an end, and the people being hindred from sowing, a famine was likely to insue, he sent out to him, desiring that the Jews might be suffered to live according to their own Laws. Many about the King advised him utterly to destroy the Citie, to blot out the very name of the Jews from under heaven, at least to dissolve their Laws, and change their course of life, so diverse from, and disagreeable to other Nations ; but he being moved by a principle of magnanimity and bounty, rejected this counsel, and approving of the piety of the Jews, commanded them to deliver up their Arms, pull down their Walls, pay Tribute for Joppe and other Towns without Judæa, and receive a Garrison, upon which conditions he offered them peace. They yielded to all but the last, because they would not converse with the Gentiles, yet in Lieu of it chose to give Hostages (amongst others Hyrcaus his own brother) and pay 500 Talents, whereof 300 at present, whereupon the siege was removed, and they were freed from any further incumbrance. Hyrcaus opening the sepulcher of David, who had been the richest of Kings, took out thence 3000 Talents, wherewith filling his Coffers, he first lifted strangers in his Militia, and entertained Antiochus and his Army in Ierusalem very plentifully.

76. Antiochus Sidetes in the eighth year of his reign, three years after his departure from Ierusalem, undertook an expedition against Phraates the Parthian, to fetch back his brother Demetrius still kept there in free custody, who had twice attempted an escape, but being retaken still, was sent back to his wife and children, not so much out of any pity or respect of alliance, as because that King having an itching desire of getting Syria also into his power, preserved him to use against his brother, as time and opportunity should serve. Antiochus with a great (but extraordinarily effeminate) Army marched into Media, where many Eastern Princes met him, with all their hearts giving up themselves and Countreys to him, and cursing of the pride of the Parthians, whereby he got such strength, as overthrowing the Enemy in three several battels, he reduced him within the bounds of his own Countrey. But what he thus suddenly got, he almost as quickly lost again; for upon the approach of Winter, quartering his Soldiers abroad in the Countrey, the people were so oppressed, what by the exaction of provisions, and their insolence, that they again revolted to the Parthian, and upon agreement, at one and the same time, set upon them as they were severally disposed of in their quarters. Antiochus hearing this, with that party which lay with him came in to relieve the next to him, and there met with Phraates himself, against whom he fought most courageously, till being forsaken of his men he was slain, or else killed himself. Phraates had a little before this, to divert him from Parthia, sent back his brother Demetrius with a Guard of Parthians to seize upon Syria; but now repenting him of that, sent some to pursue him, and bring him back; but he fearing such a thing, had by his speed prevented it. Phraates finding a daughter of his, which her Uncle Antiochus had taken along with him in his expedition, fell so in Love with her, as he married her out of hand.

77. Demetrius then recovered all the Kingdom of Syria, though not long likely to hold it, by reason of that malice he contracted both from Soldiers and People. Hyrcaus the High Priest and chief Magistrate of the Jews taking this occasion, leads down an Army to the Cities of Syria, supposing indeed as it was, that he should find them unmanned, took Medeba in the sixth moneth, then Samega and Sicima the Metropolis of the Samaritans, and so to no King after Antiochus Sidetes were the Jews subject, but shook off the yolk of the Syrian Kingdom. The Parthian King intended to make war upon him, but was hindred by the Scythians, whom having sent for to aid him against Antiochus, because they came something too late, he denied them their pay, for which they harrassed his borders, and he opposing them with the Greeks, whom he had taken before in the War, and cruelly used, was betrayed by them, and so slain with the rest of his Army. Demetrius being absent in Ægypt, the Antiochians first, then other Cities revolted, nor enduring his pride as they pretended, which he had increased by his durance in Parthia, so that he was forced to return; but they sent to Ptolomy Physcon, desiring him to send them some one of the posterity of Seleucus to reign over them. He sent them a young man, an Ægyptian, the son of one Protarchus a Merchant. A fable was invented of his being adopted by Antiochus Balas, whereupon his name being Zabimus (or Zabinus) he was firfirmnamed Alexander, and the Syrians being willing to have any rather than Demetrius, readily received him. Being come into Syria, it happened that the reliques of Antiochus Sidetes were sent at the same time into Syria, which being received very solemnly by all the Cities, he also counterfeired a true mourner, and got himself thereby much favour from his new Subjects, not discovering his tears to be feigned. Not long after he fought with Demetrius near to Damascus, and overthrew him, who then fled to Cleopatra his wife to Ptolemais; but being excluded by her and his sons, with a few servants he went to Tyre, hoping to save himself there by the religion of the Temple, and was slain by the procurement of his wife, or Zabinas, after his return from Parthia, in the 189 year of the Seleucida, A. M. 3881, the first of the 164. Olympiad.

78. Alexander Zabinas then a counterfeit succeeded Demetrius, by the favour of the People, though he left two sons, by Cleopatra, Seleucus and Antiochus firmnamed Grypus from his hooked nose. The former of these taking a Diadem upon him, at the years end his mother slew him with a dart by her own hands, because he did it without permission, fearing perhaps he might revenge his Fathers death, or being caried out with that height of spirit wherewith she ordered (and ruined) all things. Alexander entered into a League and alliance with Hyrchanus of Judaea. Three of his greatest Captains revolted from him, and seized upon Laodicea, but he reduced and yet pardoned them, being of a mild and pleasing deportment, whereby he got the affections of all men. But him he alienated from him whom it most concerned him still to oblige, viz. Ptolemy, who of late had set him up. He despised Ptolemy now, growing insolent, as being able to stand on his own legs, which the other taking in great disdain, that a creature whom he had raised out of the dust should so requite him, laboured faster to pull him down than ever he had done for his advancement. He reconciled himself to his sister Cleopatra, and for that Antiochus whom she had by Demetrius was yet alive (unto whom having bestowed the title of King she ruled all her self) he sent him great aid, and his daughter Tryphana for a wife, which the People seeing, began to revolt apace from Alexander. At length they ingaged in a battel, in which Alexander was overthrown, who then fled to Antioch, where wanting money to pay his Soldiers, he took out of the Temple of Jupiter an image of Victory of massie Gold, jesting it out, that Jupiter had lent him Victory. But a little after attempting to remove secretly and take away Jupiter's image it self of an infinite weight, he was discovered, and forced to run away by the multitude, after which being oppressed with a grievous Tempest, and forsaken by his followers, he was taken by thieves, and by them brought to Antiochus Grypus was killed (though some give other accounts of his death) after he had reigned four years.

Antiochus Grypus son to Demetrius defeateth and killeth Alexander Balas the usurping counterfeit.

79. His mother was sore grieved at his Victory, thinking her dignity was lessend by it, having an ambitious desire of reigning her self, with which she was so far driven, as to offer him a cup of poyson, as he once came in from exercise, which he having knowledge of beforehand, refused as it were in civility, desired her to do it her self, and then urging her to it, at length producing witness of her wicked intent, told her there was no way to clear her self but by drinking that which she had prepared for her son; so that being forced to do it, her wickednesse fell upon her own head. Being thus rid of his unnatural mother, he reigned securely eight years, but then Antiochus his half brother, the son of Antiochus Sidetes (begot on his mother, and from Cyzicus the place where we was brought up under Craterus the Eunuch, called Cyzicenus) began to be his emulator for the Kingdom, whom he then going about to poyson, provoked him to a more speedy attempt of what he had but before designed. At this time it hapned that Cleopatra the sister and wife of Ptolemy Laburnus, being divorced from him by the means of that notable woman her mother, came into Syria, and married with this Cyzicenus, and for that she would not seem utterly to come without a dowry, brought over to him the Army of Cyprus, whereby thinking himself sufficiently strengthened against his brother, he joyned battel with him, but was forced to retire unto Antioch. Cleopatra continuing here was besieged by Grypus and taken; and then Tryphana his wife and her sister required her to be delivered into her hands, that she might put her to death as her enemy and emulator, and though he refused it utterly, as being against the custom of Warriors to rage against the weaker Sex, especially when allied in blood so near as she was, and protected by the religion of the Temple to which she fled; yet she being more hereat enflamed, as judging his answer to proceed from love rather than pity, sent some Soldiers in, who murdered her imbracing the image of the Goddesse. This was not left long unrevenge, for Cyzicenus renewing the War, and giving battel again to his brother, now by the turning of the chance of War overthrew him, and taking Tryphana, with her blood appeased the ghost of his wife, and expelling Grypus out of Syria seized on the Kingdom.

80. Antiochus Grypus fled to Aspendium, whence he got the surname of Aspendius; but the next year returning, ordered the matter so with his brother, that the Kingdom being divided, he made him be contented with Cælesyria. Both of them after this gave up themselves to nothing but idleness and luxurie, onely preying upon each other as their opportunities served them, which difference of theirs mightily conduced to the settlement of the affairs of the Jews. Cyzicenus getting of Ptolomy Lathurus 6000 men, went to relieve Samaria, which Hyrchanus besieged, by waisting his territories, but to no purpose. Afterwards it hapned that Lathurus being expelled Egypt by his mother, and she fearing that by the help of Cyzicenus he might recover his Kingdom, she sent great supplies to Grypus, with Selenes for a Wife (whom she had taken from her son before his expulsion) to provoke him thereby against his brother, whence succeeded those civil Wars betwixt them, concerning which we have onely the title left unto us in the Epitome of the 68 Book of Livie, who related the story. Grypus died first, being slain by the treachery of one Heracleon, after he had lived 45 years, and reigned 26, whereof 15 were in conjunction with his brother. He left five sons, whereof Selencus his eldest and successor made War upon his uncle Cyzicenus for the Kingdom, and overthrew him in battel, after which the Horse of Cyzicenus ran away with him into his Camp, wherein, when he was about to be taken, he killed himself, after he had reigned eighteen years. Selencus after this, obtained Antioch, and the Kingdom, but against him arose Antiochus surnamed Eusebes, or Pius, the son of Cyzicenus, who having avoided his snares by the help of a certain Courtizan that extremely loved him, went to Aradus, where taking a Diadem, he gathered forces, and in one battel clearly overthrew him. Selencus then fled into Cilicia, where being received by the Mopsuestians (as they are called) when he began to exact money of them, had fire set to the house wherein he lay, and was burned quick with those about him.

Demeirius, raised his siege, and taking him prisoner sent him into Parthia, where he was honourably treated till his death, and Philip marching to Antioch again, as it's said, obtained the Kingdom of Syria, or (as is most probable) part of it. Antiochus Dionysus the younger brother getting Damascus into his hands, made War against the Arabians, and was slain in a battel with their King Arctas, who then was chosen King by the inhabitants of Damascus, and thereby obtained the Kingdom of Cœlesyria. The histories which onely give us hints of these things are so confounded, as no certain thing concerning the ends of Antiochus Pius or Philip can be assigned; yet this we find, that the Syrians taking occasion at these dissentions and Wars of the Seleucida amongst themselves, began to think of forein aides, and cast their minds upon forein Kings. At length they all agreed to make choice of Tigranes King of Armenia, who being called in, held Syria for the space of 18 years, and by his dealing with them, made them know they had had no reason to rebel against their natural and rightful Princes.

The Ægyptian Kingdom.

From the death of Ptolomy the son of Lagus, to the death of Cleopatra, and the reducing of Ægypt into the form of a Roman Province, containing the space of

Ptolomy* the son of Lagus had several sons by Eurydice his wife, the daughter of Antipater, and by Berenice, which woman was sent down by Antipater, onely to accompany her, with whom yet he fell so in Love, as marrying her, he passionately affected her alwayes; and a year or two before his death made one of her sons, called afterwards Ptolomy Philadelphus, his Copartner in the Kingdom, and more than that, served him sometimes as one of his attendants, saying it was more excellent than a Kingdom to be the son of a King. His eldest son by Eurydice seeing this, thought it was no staying for him in Ægypt, but fled to Seleucus, by whom being honourably entertained, with some hopes of being settled in Ægypt after his fathers death, he so badly requited him, as he treacherously slew him, as we before shewed. Philadelphus, after his fathers death made away two of his brothers, the one as conspiring against his life, and the other as suspected to raise a Rebellion in Cyprus. In power and riches he surpassed his father. Being learned himself above the common raite of Princes, he sought to promote knowledge, by rewarding the most eminent and industrious (of which flourished many in his time) and founding that his famous Library at Alexandria, consisting of 200000 Volumes. Demetrius Phalereus that noble Philosopher, and sometime Prince of Athens, being he that was employed in the Collection, perswaded him to send to Eleazar the High-Priest of the (a) Jews to desire their Law, and that he might be the easilier induced to send it, by the Counsel of Aristeas (who wrote the story) he purchased the liberty of all such Jews as were slaves in Ægypt, to the number of about 100000. which cost him more then 460 Talents. He sent also extraordinary rich gifts to the Temple; and the High-Priest chusing out 72 men most eminent for birth, learning, and experience, dispatched them into Ægypt with the Law to be translated by them into Greek. Being nobly entertained, and feasted by him for several dayes, they were set to their work in the Island Pharos right over against Alexandria, which in 72 dayes with admirable agreement they are said to have finished, after which the King having exceedingly admired the wisdom of the Law-giver, and commanded the book carefully to be kept, dismissed them with great Rewards to themselves, and Presents to him that sent them.

The Translation of the Septuagins.

2. He got the surname of Philadelphus, not for any Love shewed to his brothers (two of whom he put to death) but to his sister Arfinoe, whom after an incestuous (though Ægyptian) fashion he married, having Children before by another Arfinoe daughter to Lyfimachus; by his sister he never had any, she dying before she was delivered. Demetrius Phalereus laboured to dissuade his father from leaving him his successor, and counselled him to bestow the Kingdom on some of Eurydice's sons, for which he was now cast out of favour, and died by the biting of an Asp, which he put to his hand. He had a brother by his mothers side named Magas, whose father was one Philip a Macedonian, but of base Original. Him his mother had procured to be made Governour of Cyrene, the Inhabitants of which he now raised, and caused them to revolt from him, and marched with an Army towards Ægypt; and Ptolomy securing all the passages, went out to encounter him. But news coming in the way that the Marmaridæ, a people of the

Lybian Nomades had rebelled, Magas retreated in all haste back to Cyrene, and Ptolomy then intending to follow him, was hindered by the Galls in his Army, whom he having hired amongst others, he found to have plotted to seize upon Egypt; but he brought them all to the number of 4000 through the Nile to a desert Island, where with famine, and other wayes, they were made away. Magas after this having married Apames the daughter of Antiochus Soter, perswaded him to break the League betwixt him and his brother, and invade Egypt, which he prepared to do; but Ptolomy sent several parties abroad into Syria, and found him so much work at home, that he could have no time to look abroad, and Magas before his death having a Justin lib. 26. desire to be friends with his brother, betrothed his daughter to his son. Betwixt this Ptolomy, and the next Antiochus surnamed Theos were continual Wars, till both being weary thereof entered into an Alliance, Ptolomy giving him in marriage his daughter Berenice, which proved but an occasion of greater trouble; and the destruction of the Bride, though he lived not to see it. For he, notwithstanding all his learning, gave himself up to luxury, and fondly dreaming he should live alwayes, and that by him alone was found out immortality, presently died, after he had reigned 38 years alone, and one (with some odd moneths) together with his father, A. M. 3758. and the 2d of the 133th Olympiad. Athenens lib. 12. cap. 17.

3. Ptolomy his son by Arfinoe, the daughter of Lyfimachus, succeeded him in the 16th year of Antiochus Theos, and was surnamed Evergetes. As soon as he came to the Kingdom, he had work enough made him in Syria; for there Antiochus, who had put away his former wife (upon the marriage of Berenice his sister) now overcome with Love, took her, and her Children, again into his Court, whereupon she fearing yet his sicklenesse, and another disgrace, to prevent it, procured him to be poysoned, and conveyed his Kingdom to Seleucus Callinicus her eldest son. Berenice she committed to two of the Chief of Antioch to be made away, but the Lady, when she heard that some were sent to kill her, shut up her self in Daphna, where being besieged, the Cities of Asia, moved with the remembrance of the Dignity of her family, sent her aid, and Ptolomy her brother marched in all haste possible to deliver her, but ere she could be relieved she was circumvented by those that with an Oath promised her security, and slain together with her young son. Out of disdain at this unworthy act the Cities revolted to Ptolomy, who entering Syria killed Laodice, passed to Babylon, and got almost all Asia into his hands, at which time he visited Jerusalem also, where he offered many sacrifices of praise to God, and dedicated gifts suitable to so great a victory. Josephus contra Apion. lib. 2. The Kingdom of Syria had become a Province to that of Egypt, in all probability at this time, had he not been recalled by domestick troubles, which being very urgent, he left Cilicia to the Governance of Antiochus his great favourite, to Xanthippus another of his Captains the Provinces beyond Euphrates, and so plundering Seleucus his Kingdom of 40000 Talents of silver, he carried down also many costly Vessels and Images of Idols to the number of 2500. amongst which were those which Cambyses had after his overthrow of Amasis, and Psammiticus, conveyed out of Egypt: And therefore the Egyptians, because after so many years he had restored to them their gods, honoured him with the surname of Evergetes. Justin lib. 27.

4. Seleucus provided a Fleet for the recovery of the places revolted, but before he could come to use it, lost it all by a Tempest, which yet proved the greatest gain; for the Cities out of commiseration of his estate, and as if he had already sufficiently smarted for his parricide, returned again to their obedience. Being exceedingly encouraged, and animated herewith (as richer by his losse) he then made War upon Ptolomy; but as if he had been born for a laughing stock to fortune, and not recovered the Kingdom for himself, he was overthrown again in battel, and as destitute of followers, as after the shipwrack, fled to Antioch, when applying a remedy worse than the disease, he sent to his brother Antiochus (from his ravenous disposition surnamed Hierax) for aid; and so Ptolomy fearing himself not to be able to grapple grapple with both, made a Truce with him for ten years. Whilest he was abroad in Asia, his wife Berenice, daughter to his Uncle Magas, and betrothed to him, as we said before, vowed to consecrate her hair to the gods, in case he returned safe, and accordingly cutting it off, laid it up in a certain Chapel, whereupon Canon the Mathematician, who flourished at this time, out of flattery to them both, feigned it to be taken up into heaven, and invented that constellation which yet is known by the name of it. In his time a Phoenix is reported the third time after the dayes of Sesostris, and the next after them of Amasis to have flown (being a bird sacred to the Sun) accompanied with a great number of other birds, admiring her new face, to the Citie Heliopolis, as Tacitus tells us, who reports that the same thing hapned afterwards in the reign of Tiberius; Paulus Fabius, and L. Vitellius being Consuls. To this Ptolomy fled Cleomenes the King of Sparta after his overthrow received from Antigonus Dofon of Macedonia, and the Achaans, who honorably receiving him, and prizing him very much for his worth, was much ashamed that he had suffered such a man to be defeated, and promised to re-establish him; but he died before he could bring it about, after he had reigned 24 years, in the 139th Olympiad, within which Polybius * observes both Antigonus Dofon, and Seleucus Ceraunus, King of Macedonia, to have left the World, and their Kingdoms to their Successors.

5. His son succeeded him, being surnamed Philopater, ironically, if we believe Justin, who out of Trogus accuseth him of making away both father and mother. Certainly if we look at his general carriage and disposition, he was likely enough to do it, giving up himself to all luxury and effeminatenesse, thereby neglecting his affairs, whence he obtained the name of Tryphon. Finding his brother Magas by his mothers means to be very great with the Army, he made them both away by the means of Sofibius, who was his greatest Counsellour, and manager of his publick businesse. His laziness, and neglect, encouraged Antiochus the Great to make War upon him for Celestria, in which though he got the better, yet can it not be ascribed to any thing of his, he thinking of nothing lesse than preparation for resistance, and whereas he had opportunity enough after the battel to have outed his Enemy of Syria, yet being overjoyed that he had recovered Celestria onely, he sent Sofibius to confirm the peace. In his return out of Syria he went to Jerusalem, and would needs see the inward holy places of the Temple, but was smitten so with a blind horror, that he fell, and could scarcely be recovered to himself, but departing home raged against the Jews at Alexandria. Then with great earnestnesse returning to his a little intermitted jollities he doted so upon Agathoclea his Concubine, that he killed his sister and wife Eurydice, and forgetting all credit and Majesty, spent the nights in filthinesse, and the dayes in feasting. These things at first privately acted within the Court Walls, presently shamed nor at the publick view; the impudence of the Strumpet containing it self in no bounds, being increased by the favour of her brother Agathocles, one of as filthy a life as her self, and the Conjunction of her mother Euanthe, who spent high, and presumed much on the score of her Children's great grace with the King. Henceforth these women not contenting themselves with the King, possessed the Kingdom also, and shamed not to appear in publick in great equipage to be revered. As for Agathocles, he reigned, and not Ptolomy, by the direction and advice of his two Assistants, Mother and Sister, disposing of Offices and Commands in the Army at his pleasure.

6. Yet, had Ptolomy the strange fortune to overcome all difficulties he met with. Cleomenes the Spartan entertained, as we said, lovingly by his father, with promise to endeavour his restitution, now finding things to make for it at home, by the death of Antigonus, and the Conjunction of the Aetolians with them of Sparta against the Achaans, earnestly desired to be dispatched away; but he minding nothing but his pleasures, and buried in slothfulness, regarded him not at all. Sofibius indeed considered of the thing, & called his friends to advise about it; but upon mature deliberation concluded it not wisdom to dismiss him provided of men and arms, lest finding all clear abroad, his Enemies being now dead, or quiet, he, who knew sufficiently the state and condition of Egypt under such a Prince, might attempt something rather beneficial for himself, than safe for it. Hereupon its resolved he shall be retained still, and after some time an occasion was found to confine him. For one Nicagoras a Meffenian, who ought him an injury, coming to Town, he not at all considering to whom he spake, jeered the King to him for his filthy manner of life; which he being glad of, as having an opportunity against him, acquainted Sofibius with his words, and they two put together that Nicagoras at his departure should leave a Letter directed to the other, wherein he should accuse Cleomenes of an intention to make stir in Egypt, except he were sent away according to the promise of Euergetes. This being laid to his charge by Sofibius, and soundly aggravated to the King, he was secured in free custody, having a large house, but kept with a Guard, assigned to him; whereupon growing desperate, one day when Ptolomy was gone out of Town, he made his Keepers drunk, and with his followers brake out into the streets, and called the people to liberty. But none stirring, being all astonished at the greatnesse of the Enterprize, they made for the Castle, which finding to be strongly defended, he and all with him, after a Lacoman fashion, as Polybius termeth it, killed themselves. This was the end of this famous man, who being indued with a singular dexterity and promptnesse of wit, had a genious suitable to great and weighty matters, and was fitted by gifts of nature as well as experiences, for the Offices either of a great Commander, or a Prince.

7. Though Cleomenes his sodain and unexpected attempt made no such impression upon the City, as that any insurrections ensued thereupon; (and indeed the luxurie of the Court had infected it and the whole Land with the same distemper) yet the minds of the People being something scowred by the Wars with Antiochus from this rust, and elevated upon their successe against him, after the battel at Raphia, and the recovery of Calesyria, they began to slight their lawful King, and then arose to such an height, as they clearly revolted, intending to set up against him a Captain of their own making, which shortly after they did, and waged War with him; though in what manner, or with what end, we know not, further than thus, that, as it seemeth, he had the better of it, for he retained his dignity and power. About this time 60000 Jews are said to have been slain in Egypt, who seeing they amounted to such a number, we may have ground enough to think that they took part with the People, and that his cruelty towards them ensued as a revenge hereupon, though others there be that judge the contrary, and deliver it as a thing not to be doubted of. This is certain, that about this time he grievously persecuted those of that Nation which lived at Alexandria, abusing them first with libels, and seeking to withdraw them from their Religion. Those that refused to turn, were either put to death, or being deprived of all dignity and liberty, were branded with the image of an Ivy leaf as the badge of Bacchus; and because they were suspected to withdraw others from their obedience to the King, all the Jews throughout the Land were in forty dayes space gathered together, to be destroyed by 500 Elephants, to which was given wine mingled with much frankincence to inrage them. But in the morning when Ptolomy should have come out to the fight, a sluggish fit is said to have detained him until dinner, and on the next day such a forgetfulness to have seized on him, as he thought them mad which mentioned the thing to him; and then on the third, when the beasts were ready to be let loose, two terrible Angels appeared, which struck King and People with extraordinary horror, and drove the Elephants upon those who came to be spectators of the cruelty. Hereupon ensued such a change of the Kings mind, as he dismissed the Jews, after he had feasted them seven dayes, and giving them leave to kill the Apostates, acknowledged God to be their protector. At length he died (leaving a childe of five years old, and begotten of his sister, behind him) him) after he had reigned about eighteen years, A. M. 3801, in the first of the 144 Olympiad.

8. His son a child of five years succeeded him, being declared King by him before his death, in the 20 year of Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, and was surnamed afterwards Epiphanes. The death of Philopator was for a long time kept close, by Agathocles and his party, till his mother and sister had rifled the Court, and he had found out such a way as he thought most effectual for the establishment of himself in that power he already enjoyed. Then brought he out the King to the Macedonians, and with great expressions of sorrow for the death of his Father, tells them the child was by him delivered into the arms of Agathoclea his sister, inveighs bitterly against one Ptolemy (who being a true Patriot was an eye-sore to him) as if he intended to seize upon the Kingdom, labouring to impose upon the belief of the Soldiers, and secure himself by their strength; but no man gave any credit to whatever he said, so intirely was he hated by all. The remembrance of the former outrages committed by him and his, being more freshly renewed by some other attempts of cruelty whilst things still hung in this condition, so enraged the multitude, that from all the quarters of the City flocking to the Court, they would not be satisfied, till having the young King first delivered to them, they broke open the doors, and getting him, his sister, mother, and other of his creatures into their hands, they put them to death, mangling their bodies afterwards; it being natural to that People to be cruel if once in choler. After this, such as had an hand in the murder of Euridice the Queen were knocked in the head by her women. The infamy of the Nation being thus in some measure expiated by the slaughter of these miscreants, Aristomenes an Acaranian was made Protector of the King, his Realms and Dominions, who though for his own interest he beforetime temporized with Agathocles, yet now managed the affaires of his Prince with much honesty and wisdom. And indeed such there was need he should be at this time, when the King, being obnoxious by reason of his years to injury and wrong, was struck at by two the greatest Princes then living, viz. Antiochus King of Syria, and Philip King of Macedonia, who pretending fair things to his Father, and nothing towards him but kindnesse, now sought to devour him, and make a prey of his Kingdom; Philip by laying hold upon Egypt and Caria; and Antiochus on Cælesyria and Phœnicia. The onely remedy was to send to Rome to complain, and desire aid; and an Ambassage was quickly dispatched away for that purpose.

9. The Ambassage was no whit displeasing to the Romans, who sought an occasion against Philip, for his entering into alliance with Hannibal, and were seldom backward to medle in the affaires of other Nations, especially now fearing none of them after the overthrow of the Carthaginians. Ambassadors were sent then to the Kings, to require them to abstain from Egypt, and M. Lepidus thither to be Governor and Protector of the young King, whose Father, at his death, left him to the tuition of the People of Rome; over and above that it was now desired of his friends. But ere the Ambassadors could reach to him, Antiochus had got Phœnicia, and other Cities belonging to Ptolemy into his power, and then despising their errand, went on in his conquests. Scopas the Ætolian a year or two after sent into Cælesyria with a great Army, reduced many Cities thereof, with Judea, to Ptolemy's obedience, but again quickly lost all, being overthrown by Antiochus at the head of the River Jordan near to Panea, whence he fled to Tyre, where the King besieged him with 10000 men; and though Aropus and Menocles, two famous Captains were sent out of Egypt to relieve him, yet was he forced for want of provision to yield the Town, and march thence without his Arms. Antiochus then in pursute of this Victory, besides what he did in Cælesyria, withdrew divers places in Cilicia and Caria from Ptolemy, concerning whom also a rumour being spread that he was dead, he made haste to seize upon Cyprus. What Cities he had got in Asia, the Romans divers times by Ambassadors demanded to be put into their hands, which being refused by him, this, with his ambition, and other things, ministred occasion of a Warre betwixt them (as is shewed before) and that turned to the commodity of Ptolomy. For he being unwilling to have any Enemies at his back, sought to enter into affinity with several Kings; and amongst the rest gave to him in marriage his daughter Cleopatra, and with her in dowry all Cælesyria and Judea; having this also in his eye, by means of her to get some footing in Ægypt, though he was mistaken. For Ptolomy his Officers understanding his cunning well enough, behaved themselves more warily; and Cleopatra together with the man married his interest, and acted accordingly.

10. Scopas the Ætolian, Ptolomy his General in Cælesyria, returning to Alexandria after this overthrow, fell into discontent, and thence to plot against the King and State. Yet though he had many Soldiers at his command, had he no heart to stir, and though having a sufficient opportunity in the minority of the King, he still delayed to execute his designs, till he was prevented. For Aristomenes having discovered what he was about, just when he was plotting with his associates, sent for him to the Council, whither being constrained to come, he was accused by the King first now sitting in Council, then by Polycrates the Governour of Cyprus, and lastly by Aristomenes, who laboured to prove him guilty of what was alleged, for that he was found in consultation with his friends, and refused to come unto the King when sent for; and he confirmed the charge from the testimony of divers eminent Græcians, and the Ambassadors of the Ætolians, who were then sent about a Peace. His answers were no whit satisfactory; so that being condemned not onely by all the Council, but such forein ministers as were present, and being secured that night, was together with his complices the next day taken away by poyson, being a man so extraordinarily covetous above all others, that having broke down the walls (as Polybius terms it) of the Kingdom, he had exhausted it with rapines. With him fell Dicaearchus one of his companions, who being tortured to death, thereby (as the Historian tells us) made satisfaction to all Greece, against which he was made Admiral of the Fleet by Philip of Macedonia, when he wickedly set upon the Islands Cyclades, and also to the gods, into whom as well as men he thought to strike a terror, for casting anchor in the Haven, he there erected two altars, one to Impiety, and another to Iniquity, on which he sacrificed to them as gods. This conspiracy being thus suppressed, such Ætolians as would, had leave to depart with all they had, and then the Country betook themselves to prepare for the solemnity, constantly observed when any one was saluted King, termed Anacleteria; for though he was as yet something too young, yet they thought that when it was known he was his own Master, and at his own disposal, his Kingdom would be more quiet, and his affairs be more promoted.

11. He carried himself exceedingly well for some time, and with great commendation, but afterwards was undone by flatterers, and so far corrupted, as he poysoned Aristomenes, whom he had before constantly observed as a Father, and who had deserved well of him and the Commonwealth. After this he degenerated more and more, whence he contracted such hatred of his Subjects, as he well nigh had lost his Kingdom thereby. Towards his later end, having some high designs in his head, he sent Demetrius an Ambassador to the Achaens, to renew friendship and alliance with them, who gladly accepting of his offer, sent back to him Lycortas Father to Polybius the Historian, Theodoridas and Rhysieles to confirm it by oath on their part, and to receive the like assurance from him, which they obtained with a great present of money and arms. Some six years after he sent other Ambassadors to them, now having well nigh fallen out with the Romans, offering them ten ships of fifty oares, sufficiently manned and furnished for War, which as of concernment, amounting almost to ten Talents, they accepted of most gladly, and dispatched back to him Lycortas again with Polybius his son (though he was too young by the Laws for such an employment) with Aratus the son of famous Aratus the Sicyonian, to give him thanks for the former present, and

For plotting now against Selencus Philopator, who had succeeded Antiochus his Father in the Kingdom of Syria, and preparing an Army against him, when one of his Captains asked him where he would get money sufficient for such an enterprize, he answered, that his friends were riches to him, which being told abroad amongst the People, his Officers fearing he would fleece them to supply himself, took him away by poyson, after he had lived 27 years, and reigned 24 thereof. Ptolomy Philometor.

Prepareth for Salestria.

But his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes preventeth him by getting all Egypt into his hands.

12. He left two sons and one daughter, all very young, of which the eldest son succeeded him, being surnamed Philometor, in the eighth year of Selencus Philopator King of Syria. After his Anacleteria, his mother Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus the Great being lately dead, through the perswasion of Eutaius the Eunuch, and Lenæus his principal Counsellours, he began to cast his thoughts upon Cælesyria, which being given to his mother as a portion, was unjustly kept from him as he conceived, by his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, who now had succeeded his elder brother in the Kingdom of Syria. Antiochus hearing of their preparations for the War at Alexandria, came down into Egypt to prevent them, and overthrew the King several times as hath been said, and got the whole Country, except that City, into his power; after which Ptolomy deliberating with Comanus and Cineas what was to be done, it was resolved, that a Council of the most expert Captains should be erected, by the advice whereof all things should be managed. The first resolve of this Council was, that such Græcian Ambassadors as were present, should be sent to Antiochus about an agreement, with whom Ptolomy joyned of his own two others. The first day after their arrival, they were entertained very nobly, and on the next had audience, wherein they laid all the blame upon Eutaius the Eunuch, and urging the youth and kindred of the King to him, laboured to pacifie him. He after he had assented to them in these things, and spoken more to the same purpose, laboured with much earnestnesse to demonstrate, that Cælesyria belonged to the Crown of Syria, alleging it to have belonged to Antigonus the first founder of that Kingdom, and produced the conveyances of it to Selencus after the death of the other, from the Macedonian Kings. Moreover calling to their remembrance, that Antiochus his Father had lately obtained it again by right of conquest, he flatly denied that ever he passed it over as a portion with his daughter, to the late King of Egypt, and so having discoursed on this subject to the satisfaction of all his hearers, he then departed to Nacranis, where friendly treating the Inhabitants, and giving a largesse to such Greeks as dwelt there, he thence departed for Alexandria, deferring to give any answer to those that had been sent to him, till such time as Aristides and Theris were returned, saying, he would have all the publick ministers of Greece to be conscious to, and witnesses of, all his intentions.

13. But no satisfactory answer (if any) was given, or any thing done for Philometor by Antiochus, so that being thus outed of his Kingdom after 12 years reign, and giving up himself for all that to nothing but sluggishnesse and luxurie, the Alexandrians took upon them to make his younger brother King, surnaming him Euergetes, (though the badnesse of his manners made them afterwards change it into Cacergetes) being also called Physcon from his extraordinary fat paunch. Philometor was forced at length to betake himself to the Alexandrians too, who receiving him, made him partaker with his brother in the Kingdom, but shortly after again expelled him; which thing Antiochus made use of, and under pretence of restoring him continued the War, and overthrowing young Ptolomy in a Sea-fight, besieged Alexandria; but seeing that to be to no purpose, arose and departed into Syria, leaving Philometor at Memphis, to whom he restored all Egypt, except Pelusium, which he kept as the key of the Country in his own hands, not doubting but when one of the brothers had ruined the other, to come, and with ease enough devoure the Conquerour. But though his two Nephews were otherwife foolish enough, yet in this they shewed prudence, to disappoint him, for the elder seriously considering how little he ought to trust him, sent to Cleopatra his sister, who seconding him to her brother, both by advice and entreaty, procured a peace to be made with consent of both their friends, the Citizens of Alexandria giving way the more readily, because of the dearth which troubled them, by reason of the War as well when they were at liberty as besieged. This drew off the Vizard from Antiochus, who, whereas he ought to have rejoiced, if he really intended the restitution of Philometor, fretted exceedingly hereat, and nothing would serve him, but needs he must come down again into Egypt, and had laid siege to Alexandria the second time, had not the Roman Ambassadors terrified him from his purpose (as we shewed in its more proper place) and forced him to quit both Egypt and Cyprus.

14. The Roman Ambassadors took some pains by their Authority to make them two friends, not being thoroughly reconciled before, and so they continued for six years peaceably together. But then differences betwixt them arose so high, that the Senate at Rome wrote to their Ambassadors, sent into Syria after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, by all means to reconcile them, of which mediation we yet hear of no fruit at all, for presently the younger expelled his elder brother. Philometor being thus spoiled of his Kingdom, with a very few attendants, and in a pitifull habit, came to Rome for help, making his Inn the house of an Alexandrian Painter; which when the Senate understood, they sent for him, and made as formal an excuse as possible, that they had neither sent a Quaestor to meet him (after the fashion of the receiving persons of his quality) nor entertained him at the publick charge, which hapned not by any neglect on their part, but by reason of his sudden and secret arrival. Then was he conducted from the Court to the publick House of entertainment, and desired, that laying off his unseemly habit, he would move for audience, and a Quaestor was appointed to make him presents every day. At length, according to his desire, Cannucius and Quintus were sent back with him to Alexandria, who restored him to the Kingdom, and made the two brothers assent to a division of it, whereby Philometor was to hold Egypt and Cyprus, and Euergetes possesse Cyrene, the Covenant being most solemnly confirmed. But Euergetes not being at all satisfied in his part, hastened to Rome to reverse the agreement, alleging that he gave not his consent freely at all, but out of necessity of yielding to the times; wherefore he desired of the Senate that Cyprus might be also adjudged to him, with the addition of which his part would yet be far inferiour to his brothers. Menestylus being sent after him by Philometor, replied, that he ought not onely Cyrene, but his life also to his brother, so great hatred had he contracted from their subjects, that with the wonder of all, and beyond his hopes was that Kingdom bestowed on him, and urged the agreement most religiously made and confirmed, with faith given on both sides. But Ptolemy denying stiffly all this, the Senate, for that it seemed to them that the parting of the Kingdom was not yet fully concluded, and especially thinking it to be for their interest that the division should be equal, assented to his request, and ordered T. Torquatus, and Cn. Merula to go with him, and put Cyprus into his hands. For the Romans understanding now fully the strength of Egypt, and considering what it might aspire to if united, wisely made use of this difference, and gratified the two brothers one after the other in their ambitious (but imprudent) desires.

15. Departing out of Italy into Greece, he there hired a strong band of men, intending to sayl with them for Cyprus; but the Roman Commissioners calling to mind the Decree of the Senate, which was, that they should reduce him without force, perswaded him again to dismiss them, and passe over to Cyrene, and they in the mean time going to Alexandria, would endeavour to perswade his brother to comply with the Senate, and bringing him along with them meet him in the Confines of both Kingdoms. He accordingly went to Crae, where hiring 9000 Soldiers, he passed over to Libyna, where he

he expected to hear from Alexandria; but the Romans there treating with his brother about a reconciliation, and the yielding of Cyprus up to him, something he assented to, and put off others, on purpose drawing out the time in length. Forty dayes with extraordinary entertainment he detained them at Alexandria, during which time news came to Euergetes that the Cyrenians had revolted from him, who understanding well the mind of his brother from his present carriage, and seeing nothing suitable to royalty in Euergetes, acting all things after a Tyrannical manner, could not bring themselves to submit any longer to his Government. Hearing this, he sailed to Catabathmus, thence to make for Cyrene, in which place he found the Straights kept against him, but sending some about to come upon the Defendants on their backs, set upon them also himself, and so cleared the passage, but coming to Cyrene, and ingaging with the Natives, was worsted by them. Whether he recruited himself again, and recovered his Sovereignty here or no, we have nothing from History to speak expressly; but not long after he was in a capacity to attempt Cyprus (being encouraged by the Senates renouncing their friendship with his brother upon his account) where he was also overthrown by his brother, and then besieged, and taken in the Citie Lapithus. Yet did Philometor spare him, what for his innate clemency and brotherly affection, and for fear of the Romans; and not onely so, but made a Covenant with him when Conquered, wherein he restored him Cyrene, and for Cyprus certain Cities with a quantity of Corn yearly, and promised him his daughter in marriage, worse than this being not accounted incest in that Countrey.

16. Not long did they accord, for Euergetes, some two or three years after, being encouraged by his former successe, made another journey to Rome, where in the Senate he made another loud complaint against his brother, accusing him of plotting against his life, for a witnesse of which design he shewed skars upon his body, and aggravating the thing with all his might, endeavoured to move the minds of all to compassion. Two Ambassadors were present from Philometor to answer to whatsoever he should accuse him of, but all mens ears were so filled with the others accusation, that no place would be found for their defence; so that they were instantly commanded to be gone, and five Commissioners were appointed (furnished all with Gallies) to go, and bring him into possession of Cyprus; their Associates also, both in Greece and Asia, being written to, and leave given to as many as would to assist him in the recovery of it. What was done as to the recovery of it, through defect of History, we are ignorant, though some grounds we have to think he did not obtain the Island, and no more do we hear of him till his brothers death. In the dayes of this Philometor, Onias the son of Onias the third, High-Priest of the Jews, seeing the Priesthood to be alienated from his family into that of the Hasmoneans, living in Egypt, and having well deserved of the King in his Wars, that he might eternize his memory, petitioned him for leave to build a Temple in the Province of Helio-polis, after the fashion of that at Jerusalem, signifying that thereby would be better provided for the quiet of his Kingdom, the Jews badly agreeing amongst themselves through the variety of their places of worship in that Countrey, and misapplying the Prophecy of Isaiah, concerning the spiritual Priesthood, and reign of Christ, to this his ambitions and unlawfull design. His Petition was granted, and in that Countrey built he a Temple resembling the true, and lawfull one, 180 furlongs distant from Memphis; onely he put therein no Candlestick, but hung up a Lamp in a Golden string, which cast a light about like to the Sun-beams.

17. In the time of this Philometor, the Jews and Samaritans inhabiting Alexandria fell out about their way of Worship, they contending earnestly that the Temple of Jerusalem, those that that at Gerizim was founded most according to the prescript of Moses, and so earnest was the dispute, that both parties appealed to him and his Council for a decision of the controversy, who being to judge according to evidence produced out of the Law, was to put to death those pleaders which could not make good their cause. For the Jews appeared Andronicus the son of Messalini, for the Samaritans Sabbau, and Theodosius, who being heard by Ptolomy in a full Assembly, all were so well satisfied in the proofs brought by Andronicus, as the King gave sentence on his side, and condemned Sabbau and Theodosius. Philometer about this time was deeply engaged in the affairs of Syria; for, Demetrius Soter having molested him much with War, together with Attalus King of Asia, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia, all these agreed to suborn a young man of base condition, who counterfeiting himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, spoiled Demetrius both of his Kingdom and life. This Alexander (as he is called) being especially beholden to Ptolomy for this change of his condition, desired of him his daughter in marriage; which he readily agreed to, and brought her (named Cleopatra) to him to Ptolemais, where the nuptials were solemnized with great state. Afterwards Alexander giving up himself to cruelty and luxury, Demetrius, the son of Demetrius Soter, having hired Soldiers in Crete, attempted the recovery of his fathers Kingdom. Ptolomy with great forces both by Land and Sea, came then into Syria, under pretence of helping his son-in-law; but getting a great part of the Countrey into his hands, as far as the River Orontes, and the Citie Seleucia, he had other intentions, having conceived great prejudice in his mind against Alexander, the special occasion of which was, that whereas one Ammonius, a great Officer of his had conspired against his life at Ptolemais, he refused to give him up to him upon his demand. Wherefore, though he went to Antioch, and there set two Diadems on his head, the one for Syria, and the other for Egypt, yet perswaded he the Antiochians to receive Demetrius for their King, and taking away his daughter from Alexander, gave her to him; Alexander was overthrown, after which he fled into Arabia (as we said) and there was made away. But in the fight it hapned that his Horse being affrighted at the noise of an Elephant, threw him, which the Enemies perceiving came upon him, and gave him such a wound in his head, that for four dayes he lay fencelesse, and though coming to himself, on the next, he was mightily pleased at the sight of the head of Alexander Balas, which was sent him; yet proved it not such a Cordial, but the third day after, as his Physicians were busie in dressing his own he died, after he had reigned 34 years, A. Ptolomy fighting against Alexander King of Syria, whom he had formerly set up, received a wound and dieth.

Ptolomy Physcon unjustly obtaining the Kingdom his cruelty.

18. After his death the order of succession was first changed in this Kingdom. For whereas hitherto the son had continually followed his father, and now Cleopatra his wife with the help of the Princes, endeavoured to have it so, in his son and hers; yet his brother Euergetes the second, or Physcon, then reigning in Cyrene, withstood her purpose, and forced her, for to put an end to the controversie, to marry him. Coming to Alexandria, he first caused the favourers of the Child to be slain, and then the boy himself in the arms of his mother on their Wedding day, and amidst the solemnities; according to which beginning he proceeded, being nothing milder towards those that had sent for him. For, giving liberty to the outlandish Soldiers to kill, and rifle, he filled all places with slaughters; many being accused, as though they had plotted against him, were made away with cruel torments, others under some pretence or other banished, and their goods confiscate. Having a son born of this his sister, he named him Memphius, after the place of his birth, but whilest he was keeping his birth-day, that he might also feed his cruel humour, he put to death divers Cyrenians, who brought him into Egypt, for taxing him somewhat liberally for his too much familiarity with Irene his Concubine. As his cruelty, so also his lust knew no bounds; for ravishing first his wives daughter, and his own Niece, both by Father and Mother, he put away his wife and married her; whereat the Inhabitants of Alexandria being affrighted, for fear of death quit their habitations, so that he being left alone as a King of houses, and not of men, by Proclamation called, and gave leave to strangers to inhabit them. It hapned that at such time as they flocked thither came also

so P. Scipio Africanus the younger, Sp. Mummius, and L. Metellus, sent from Rome to visit the Kingdoms and States of the East, and compose their differences. Scipio being landed, and having his face covered, the People flocked about him, and desired him to uncover himself, which he granting, they out of the great pleasure conceived at the sight of such a person, gave a shout. Phyſcon himself coming out to meet them, was exceedingly ridiculous to them, being a man otherwise sufficiently deformed, of a low stature, and such corpulence, as his belly resembled rather that of a beast than a man. He provided magnificent entertainment, but they despising his dainties (as corrupting the manners of men) ate very sparingly, onely minded that they came about, and travelled into the Country, where viewing the several places thereof, considering the populousnesse, strength, and convenience of their situation, they concluded Egypt a convenient seat for the greatest Empire, if it had but Lords that knew how to make use of it, and so departed to Cyprus, and thence into Syria.

19. After some time he became so odious to the new inhabitants also for his cruelty, that they set fire to his Palace, and he was driven with his wife and son to get away to Cyprus, after which they restored the Kingdom to Cleopatra his sister, whom he had put away. Hereupon he raised an Army, and made War upon her and them, and fearing that they might send for his eldest son from Cyrene, and make him King, to prevent that, he murdered him; which being known, they cast down his statues and images. He taking this to be done as well in favour of his sister Cleopatra, as in despite of himself, to be revenged sufficiently on her, commanded their son Memphites a comely and towardly childe to be killed in his presence, and then his head, hands, and feet to be cut off, and being sent to Alexandria to be presented her, as she was feasting at the celebration of her own birth day. This struck not onely her but all the City into exceeding horror and amazement, and the sad spectacle was shewed to the People, to let them know what they might expect from such a King. He notwithstanding all this, yet went on in his own way; for considering how he was hated by his People, that he might reign more securely, as he thought in their weaknesse, he caused a place of publick meeting full of youth to be set on fire, and destroyed all therein either with fire or sword. Cleopatra having put an end to mourning for her son, and seeing her self pressed with War by her brother, sent to Demetrius Nicator King of Syria, and her son in Law, for aid, offering him the Kingdom for his pains in securing it. He gladly accepting the offer, came down, and waged War with Phyſcon for some time, but his People revolting from him at home, was forced to return, so that she being then in a manner destitute, was glad to follow him into Syria. Phyſcon then reentering, and being seized anew of the Kingdom, the Antiochians knowing his prejudice against Demetrius, sent to him for one of the posterity of Seleucus to reign over them, whereupon he suborned a young man and son of a Merchant, to mend the matter giving out, that Alexander Balas was his Father. The counterfeited by his help outed Demetrius of his Kingdom; but then not being able to bear so high a condition, for which he was never bred, grew proud, and despised him. Therefore to be revenged on him, being now reconciled to his sister, he pulled him down again, by sending aid, and his daughter for a wife to Antiochus Grypus the son of Demetrius. Not long after Phyſcon died, after he had reigned (from his brothers death) 29 years. A. M. 3888, and the last of the 165 Olympiad.

20. He left three sons and as many daughters behind him. One of his sons being base born, and called Ptolomy Apion, he left King of Cyrene by his will; as for Egypt he left that to his wife, and to either of her sons which she should chuse, judging that the State of Egypt would be better served than the Kingdom of Syria, when the mother making choice of one son, should make the other her Enemy. She thinking that her youngest named Alexander would be more pliable and observant of her, laboured with the People to accept of him for their King; but they not at all yielding to this, she was forced to call home the elder, Lathurus (or Labyrinthus) from Cyprus, whither she had procured his father to banish him; but before she gave him the Kingdom she took away his beloved wife Cleopatra, and commanded him to marry his younger sister Selene. Cleopatra being thus divorced by her mother, rather than forsaken of her husband, married to Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria (as we before said) and carried away with her the Army in Cyprus for a portion. The Queen mother, that she might be the more awful to Lathurus her son, in the second year of their reign made Alexander King of Cyprus, and sent him thither, and then at the end of other six, took away from him, his wife Selene; though she had brought him two sons; and again to compleat her malice, stirred up the People against him. For taking such of her Eunuchs as were most faithful to her, she brought them wounded into the publick, accusing him of having endeavoured to make her away, and of so using those that were true to their trust in her defence: at which the Alexandrians being sore moved, came so upon him, as he narrowly escaped with his life, and then sent they for Alexander from Cyprus, and made him King.

21. Lathurus made but an exchange with his brother, as it fell out, making himself Master of Cyprus, whither yet his mother followed him with her hatred, and War the effect thereof. Here he lay not idle, for Alexander Jannæus at this time King of the Jews besieging Ptolemais, the inhabitants thereof sent to him for aid, and though they repented them of the bargain made with him, and sent to stop his journey, yet he came on, and at his approach the siege was raised. Then invaded he Judea, and overthrowing Jannæus in a great and bloody battel, harassed the Country. Cleopatra his mother was startled at this his power and prosperity, and resolved he was to be brought down, else her affaires were but in a tottering condition; therefore sending a good part of her treasure with her Nephews and testament to the Island Cous, she came herself into Phœnicia, besieged Ptolemais, and persecuted him into Cœlesyria. He having some hopes to get Egypt into his hands in her absence, marched in all haste down thither; but being disappointed, and pursued by a party sent by her, he was forced to return and winter at Gaza. She in the mean time took Ptolemais, whither Jannæus came to her, with whom a little after she renewed the League at Seythopolis, and then he prospering much in Cœlesyria, Lathurus was forced to return to Cyprus, and his mother seeing this, departed also into Egypt. During these Wars betwixt the mother and son, it hapned, that he was once taken by her General, but dismissed again, whereat she was so enraged, as she put to death her Commander. Her son Alexander being afraid, that at length her cruelty might extend to him also, withdrew himself from her, preferring a secure though obscure estate, before a dangerous reign. She notwithstanding went on in her way, not neglecting her affaires, and fearing her elder son might be helped by Antiochus Cyzicenus, sent great supplies to Cyprus his half brother and rival, with Selene for a wife, taken formerly from Lathurus, and by messengers prevailed with Alexander to return. Divers years then they lived and reigned together, but at length she really plotted his destruction, and being caught in the manner, was according to her deserts (though perhaps not his duty) put to death, after she had domineered over him, and expelled his brother eighteen years.

She is killed by Alexander her son.

Who being thereupon expelled Lathurus is restored.

22. Alexander being known to the People to have killed his mother, such a Sedition was thence moved, as glad he was to flie for his life; and thence they recalled his elder brother Lathurus from Cyprus, and restored him his Kingdom for many years after his expulsion, being now (if we may believe Justin) so satisfied with his present condition, as of himselfe, hee would never have made War upon his mother, nor thereby sought to recover out of his brothers hands what he had formerly enjoyed. About this time his base brother Apion of Cyrene died, and left the People of Rome his heir, which thereupon left the Country to it's own freedom; but after ten years was it sore shaken, and almost rent in pieces by Wars and Tyranny, which fell on it being destitute of a Royal Monarch. Lucellus going thither composed composed the differences, and settled the Commonwealth as he thought, which after other ten years came to be reduced out of necessity to a Roman Province. From Cyrene Lucullus returned through Egypt, and in his passage being set upon by Pyrats, lost almost all his Vessels; yet escaped he safe to Alexandria, the Kings Fleet being sent out to meet him, where Lathurus entertained him with great magnificence, lodged him in his own Court (which favour had never before been bestowed on any stranger) and presented him with gifts to the value of 80 Talents. But he onely received what was necessary, and neither visiting Memphis, nor seeing any of the rarities of Egypt, being called away by his occasions, returned through Cyprus unto Sylla, whose Lieutenant then he was in the War against Mithridates King of Pontus. After this the Inhabitants of Thebes revolted from him, but in the third year he reduced them again to obedience, which is not to be understood of Thebes in Baotia, seeing he had nothing there to do, but of the City so called in his own Country. Not long after he died, 37 years (wanting some moneths) after the death of his Father Physcon, A. M. 3925, and the first of the 175 Olympiad.

23. It's difficult to assign certainly who succeeded him. (a) Some say Cleopatra his daughter, and wife to his brother Alexander; others, that Alexander's son being received into familiarity with Sylla the Roman Dictator, was by him placed in the Kingdom, then destitute of issue male. They may be reconciled, by that which is further affirmed by the former, viz. that he married Cleopatra then Queen. Apian saith, that being seized on the Kingdom, the Alexandrians not enduring his insolence, on the nineteenth day drew him out of the Court and killed him; but Porphyrie reporteth him to have slain her nineteen dayes after he had married her. Certainly though his reign be accounted no longer, and that of Auletes to begin here, yet cannot be rejected that which is produced to the contrary. For, Suetonius reporteth, that Julius Caesar in his younger dayes having ingratiated himself with the People, attempted by their Tribunes that Egypt might be assigned him as a Province, having gotten an opportunity of extraordinary command, for that the Alexandrians had expelled their King, on whom the Senate had bestowed the title of friend and allie. This can in no wise be meant of Auletes, for when he was expelled and came to Rome, Caesar was then above such a condition, having spent some years in the Wars of Gall. And that King of Egypt mentioned by Cicero to have died at Tyre, and reported to have left the People of Rome his heir in his Consulship, can be meant of none but of this Alexander the Second, who being expelled rebelliously by his Subjects, lived and died there in exile; so that we must necessarily assign him (counting from the death of Lathurus to the Consulship of Cicero) about fifteen years; during which time of his life, he is to be supposed to have reigned longer than onely so many dayes, contrary to the vulgar opinion.

25. Alexander being expelled by the Alexandrians, they immediately set up in his room, the son of Lathurus, surnamed Dionysius and Auletes, because he was too much addicted to the rites of Bacchus, and dancing to the sound of Cymbals and Pipes. He was base born, as appeareth by the Prologue to the 39 book of Trogus, and so was also his brother the King of Cyprus, if that be true which Pausanias speaketh of his Fathers having no legitimate issue, except one daughter. After some years, they that set him up pulled him down; for his brother of Cyprus being most unjustly spoiled of his Kingdom by the Romans, through the malice of Clodius Tribune of the People, they pressed him sore, either to demand Cyprus of the Romans, or renounce their friendship. Being unwilling to do this, and by reason of his great exactions which hee made for paying of his debts (contracted by his purchase of the Roman alliance) he incurred their hatred, and whereas he could neither quiet the tumults by fair means nor foul, was glad to withdraw himself out of the way, and went to Rome. At Rhodes he met with Cato, who was sent by Clodius out of the way, under colour of doing him honour, to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Roman Province, who advised him to return, and be reconciled to his Subjects, rather than leaving his former happy condition to expose himself to danger, and the avarice of the Roman Officers, which Egypt it self could not be able to satisfie. Being by the Counsel of his grave and wise man reduced as into his wits, he was minded to follow his advice; but was presently again turned by his friends, and hasted to the Citie, where he had time and cause enough to repent of his despising the Oracle (as then he accounted it) of so great a man.

25. Being come to Rome, he created the Senate much trouble, being commended to it by Pompey, whom some reported to have been the cause of his leaving Egypt, more than any injury offered him by his Subjects, that so he might afford matter for new Wars. He desired he might be reduced into his Kingdom by Cornelius Lentulus the Consul, to whom Cilicia was decreed for a Province; and upon the reporting of the matter, an order was made; Lentulus to stop Pompey's mouth, procuring him to have the charge of Provisions (in that time of dearth) throughout the Empire. The Alexandrians in the mean while ignorant of his voyage into Italie, and thinking he had some wayes miscarried, set over the Kingdom Berenice his legitimate daughter, together with Tryphana her elder sister (called also Cleopatra the elder) and sent into Syria to Antiochus Asiaticus to come and reign with the women, and afterwards, he dying, to Philip Euergetes the son of Antiochus Grypus by Tryphana, daughter to Lathurus late King of Egypt, but he was also hindred by Gabinus, then late Roman President in Syria. But hearing at length how things went at Rome, they sent 100 of their Countrey-men thither, to make their defence, and recriminate their lawfull King, which he understanding, procured most of the Messengers to be made away in their journey, and the rest coming to the Citie, he either took away, or deterred, or else perswaded them to hold their peace. The Senate hearing of this was grievously moved, and the rather, because that divers publick Ministers of others their Confederates had been made away with the rest; as also for that it appeared, that there was much corruption amongst themselves. They sent therefore for Dion the Chief of the Embassie, but Ptolomy his money had such influence upon him, that he appeared not, and not long after was also dispatched out of the way. Pompey harboured the King all this time in his own house, being yet desirous to restore him himself as Cicero signifieth to Lentulus then the Pro-consul of Cilicia, who still waited also for the employment. At length Sibylla's books being consulted, were reported to forwarn the people of Rome never to reduce him by force, and therefore to that purpose another decree was made in the Senate. A great debate then ensued how the thing should be done, some proposing one way, and some another, till at length Auletes perceiving it was neither likely to be effected by Pompey nor Lentulus, despaired of his return, and getting him into Asia, expected at Ephesus in the Temple of Diana, a better advantage for the recovery of his right out of the hands of the imperious Rebels.

26. And he had not been long there, when a convenient opportunity presented it self. For Gabinus the President of Syria having grievously afflicted his Province by oppression, not thinking that sufficient, but hearing the Parthians to be exceeding rich, set his resolution strongly to invade them. When he had passed the River Euphrates, Ptolomy came to him with Letters from Pompey, and offered him 10000 Talents (besides a great sum of money to the Soldiers, part whereof they should have in hand) to restore him. Most of the Officers were against the thing, and Gabinus himself somewhat stuck at it, but being stirred up to it by Antonius (who then Commanded the horse under him) and especially bewitched by the money, notwithstanding it was not lawfull for a President to stir out of his Province, nor undertake Wars at his pleasure, and the people at Rome out of respect to the Verses of Sibylla had forbidden Auletes to be restored (at least such a way) yet he onely made the difficulty of the thing a means to inhance the price of it, and omitting the Parthian War, undertook that against the Egyptians. Berenice had about this time called one Seleucus out of Syria, who vaunted himself of the blood royal of that Nation, and made him partaker of the Kingdom, marrying her self unto him; but finding him to be of a fordid, and base condition, made him away after a little while. Then an husband of a royal stock being enquired out for her, Archelaus the son of Archelaus (General to Mithridates the great King of Pontus) and who had been made by Pompey Priest of the Tomani, counterfeiting himself the son of the King, procured by his friends to be received on the same terms with the other, and reigned with her six moneths.

27. But Gabinus leaving Syria to the tuition of a Child, his son, marched for Egypt through Palestine, and coming to the sandy desert, sent Antonius before with the horse to secure the Straights at the entry of the Countrey; which he not onely bravely performed, but took also Petufium, thereby gaining entrance for the whole Army, which presently put to flight the Egyptians. Archelaus himself was now taken; but Gabinus considering that perhaps Ptolomy would be unwilling to give him so much money as he expected, if with so small ado he should compleat the work; being also soundly bribed by Archelaus, he dismissed him under pretence of an escape. A little after, the Egyptians (more earnest alwayes in rebellions than Wars) were utterly discomfited, Archelaus was slain, and all Egypt recovered, and restored to Auletes, who presently put to death his daughter, and the richest of the Nobility, as they deserved, standing then in great need of money. Gabinus leaving a Guard behind him for Ptolomy's security (which stayed at Alexandria, married, and begot Children, giving up themselves to the luxury of the place) went back into Syria, and thence to Rome, where his great gifts meeting with the corruption of the times, onely purchased him his life, being fined for his bribery, and disobedient carriage. As for Auletes we hear no more of him, since that he died 4 years after his restitution. In the year of the World 3954. and the 2<sup>d</sup> of the 182 Olympiad.

28. He left two sons, and as many daughters behind him, of which the eldest of either Sex he ordered should succeed him by his last Will and Testament; which he conjured the people of Rome, (under whose tuition he left his Children) by all the gods, and the Leagues he had made with them, should be observed; and one of the Tables of which were brought to Rome to be laid up in the Treasury; but this being hindred by publick business, it was left with Pompey, who was also appointed Guardian to the young King in this his nonage. After three years the boy, or rather Pothinus (not Photinus, as he is corruptly called in Caesar's Commentaries) the Eunuch who managed his affairs, expelled Cleopatra his sister, and fellow both in marriage and the Kingdom; so that she was forced to withdraw into Syria, there to make provision for her re-establishment by force. Not long it was ere she returned, having furnished her self; which her brother being aware of, went, and pitched his Tents near the Mountain Casius, at the Pelusian mouth of the Nile; where lying incamped, Pompey being then beaten by Caesar at the battel at Pharsalum, fled to him for defence and safeguard, chusing rather to venture upon Egypt than any other place, both for its nearnesse and strength, and hoping upon the account of his Guardianship to be lovingly received. The King then a very boy (about 13 years old) gave no answer to his message; but those most potent about him consulting of it, were perswaded by Theodotus his School-master to receive him, but then, that they might curry favour with Caesar, to make him away; so that being received with small civility into a little boat, he was slain ere he got to the other side, as is more largely expressed in the Roman story. Army,

Army, he thereby incurred the great displeasure of the Towns-men, all things being made worse by Pothinus, who to his utmost ability incensed the superstitious multitude. Cesar also accounting it to belong to himself as Consul, and shortly after, as Dilector, to compose the differences of the Confederates of the people of Rome, took upon him to judge the cause of the King and his sister, which bred such disturbance, as thereupon ensued a troublesome War.

29. There were secret plots laid for his life, which he being aware off, was glad to spend whole nights in feasting to prevent them, and gave way to Cleopatra to come to him, who knowing he was no hater of women, had sent to him to complain, and desire a conference. At the sight of her he became her very slave, and turned from being her Judge to her Advocate, which thing so enraged the King, perceiving her now to be got into the Palace, that he rushed out to the people, crying he was betrayed, and pulling his Diadem from his head, cast it on the ground. A great stir arising hereupon, he was caught by Cesar's Soldiers, and brought back into the house, which the multitude thereat enraged now besieged, and Cesar with promise to do whatsoever they would, scarce appeased the tumult; his men being unprovided for resistance, having not expected any such occasion from those they accounted their friends. Then taking Ptolemy and Cleopatra along with him, he read over their fathers Will in publick audience, which subjecting them to the tuition of the people of Rome (whose Supreme and absolute Magistrature he then was) in execution of the said Will he gave to them two as husband and wife the Kingdom of Egypt, and to their younger brother and sister that of Cyprus, not leaving any thing to himself, but willing rather to add something of his own; such a fear at this time had seized on him. The people hereby was quieted for a time, untill Pothinus, fearing he might be called to account for what had already passed, kindled a new flame to divert it. He first objected, as well he might, what an unworthy thing it was that the King should be called to answer, and then added, there was reason to suspect, that whatsoever Cesar might pretend, yet at length he would put all into the hands of Cleopatra. He sent to Achillas General of all the Forces then lying at Pelusion, alluring him by great promises in the Kings name, to draw down the Army privily to Alexandria; and he, being not backward to cloze with him, marched down with 20000 foot, and 2000 horse. Cesar had not strength enough to go out and meet him, and therefore contained himself in the Citie, yet commanded his men to be in readinesse, and kept the King with him; whose name he knew to be of great force amongst his people, and that thereby this undertaking might appear rather to be the enterprize of a few dissolute, and factious persons, than any thing backed by his consent, or Warrant.

The Alexandrian War.

30. Achillas (a) despising the number of Cesar's Soldiers, after he had entered the Citie, thought presently to have broken in upon him, but he prevented this by blocking up the wayes, and fortifying his house. Then followed a sharp contention at the Haven, the Alexandrians endeavouring to become Masters of the Fleet, and thereby to cut off all Provisions and supplies from coming to him; but he made a shift to burn all the Gallies, from which the fire seizing upon the houses adjoining, consumed to ashes that famous (b) Library Collected by the care and diligence of the former Kings. After this exploit so happily performed, he placed a Garrison in (c) Pharus (an Island over against Alexandria (ennobled by a famous Tower of the same name) but three quarters of a mile distant from the Citie) and after a few skirmishes, sent about into Syria, Cilicia, and other places for aid. Arfinoe the Kings younger sister got out to Achillas, and joyntly with him managed the War; yet with such contention for the Chief command, as proved onely beneficial to the Soldiers, whom both by gifts sought to oblige; for the contest at length arrived at such (d) height, that lying in wait for the life of each other, he was slain by the help of one Ganymedes, who having helped her in her escape, was now preferred to be their General.

Achillas the General is slain, and Porshinus put to death by Caesar.

Porshinus all this while was not backward, but out of the Court sent messengers to Achillas, to encourage him in his work, which being discovered cost him his life, and caused the King to be more nearly looked to. Ganimedes at his entrance upon the Generalship, stopped up the chanel which brought fresh-water into that part of the City where Caesar lay, and with engines conveyed salt from the Sea into the room of it, thinking thereby to discourage the Enemy, and force him out of his hold; but Caesar (though his Soldiers were at first daunted at it) prevented the design by sinking of wells, which abundantly supplied their necessities, to the wonder of the Egyptians, who had no such invention. By this time a legion shipped by Domitius Calvurus, with provisions and arms from Syria, landed on the African shoar, a little above Alexandria; which Caesar understanding, went with his Fleet unmaned to fetch them in, and the Enemy having notice of it, drew out also against him. He receiving the men aboard, had no mind to ingage, because it grew towards night; but a Rhodian Gally, not keeping up with the rest of the Fleet, was set upon, whereby he was constrained to go in to the rescue, and so carried himself, that day-light onely was wanting to his completing the Victory, by utterly destroying the whole Navy of the Alexandrians.

31. They notwithstanding this defeat, in which, and other wayes, of late, Idem ibid.

they had lost no fewer than 110 Vessels (yet being encouraged thereto by Ganimedes) set themselves to the rigging of another Fleet, which being in a readinesse, Caesar brought his about the Island Pharos, and set it in order against them. Both sides being ready to ingage, yet a narrow passage lying betwixt them, each expected till the other should enter first, as then having a better advantage, until the Rhodians desired of Caesar leave to enter the Streight. This once granted and done, they were presently set upon, and then relieved, till a total engagement ensued, in which the Egyptians were worsted (nor a ship of Caesar's receiving any hurt) and in their flight took in in Pharos, where they were received by their friends, and kept off the Romans for some time, but a length were forced to quit the Island with great losse. This being joyned to the main by two bridges, one of them in like manner was forsaken by the Towns-men; but the Romans attempting to gain the other, through the rashnesse of some in their company, were beaten off, and forced tumultuously to betake themselves to their ships. Caesar himself in the hurry was glad to leap into the Sea, and the Enemy following, to dive under water, and take breath now and then as he could; till (having swum almost a quarter of a mile) he was taken up into a ship. He lost 400 of his Legionary Soldiers in this skirmish, as many ship-men and rowers, yet neither he nor his Army were discouraged at all, but were rather incited to redeem their losse by some other exploit, which the Alexandrians taking notice of, sent to him, desiring he would dismiss their King, whom now they professed they were ready to obey; and if he should command them to be friends with him, they would presently yield. He knew there was neither any trusting of him nor them; but considering that if he dismissed him, they would be nothing the stronger, and if he should become the head of their party, the War would be more honourable, he gravely admonished him to act nothing contrary to the interest of his People, or his confederacy with Rome, and then gave him leave to depart, though he pretended an unwillingnesse to leave him, and notably counterfeited sincere friendship with feigned tears.

yet they seeing themselves nothing amended by the accession of his name or presence (which the Romans despised) and that they profited nothing by any of their attempts, were greatly discouraged, yet understanding that great supplies of men and provisions were coming to Caesar, they resolved once more to take the Sea, and cut them off: And they did much hurt to those that came by water, till he sent out his Fleet under the command of Tiberius Nero, and restrained them. from Syria, accompanied with Antipater the Governour of Judea, and Father to Herod the Great, bringing down with him a great power of men, and pierced as far as Pelusium, which also was taken, with great pains and industry by assault. Thence marching down for Alexandria he took in the Country in his way, the Jews inhabiting those parts (though at first they made resistance, yet) being brought over by Antipater upon the producing of the letters of Hircanus the High-Priest. When Ptolomy heard this, and that he had nigh already reached Delia, a place not far distant from Alexandria; knowing he must needs passe the River, he sent out a party to oppose him there, which he received prudently after the Roman fashion, being intrenched in his Camp, and easily sustained it's violence; till seeing them very disorderly, and with great boldnesse to assail his fortifications, he issued out, and killing a great number, had utterly defeated the rest, but that by their knowledge of the Country, and by the Vessels which had transported them, they secured themselves. Whereupon rallying again they once more charged him, and a fight ensued in that place called The Camp of the Jews, in which engagement the wing commanded by Mithridates himself, was forely oppressed, and had been totally overthrown; but that Antipater (who led the other) came in in good time to the rescue, put to flight the Egyptians, and took their Camp; which Mithridates confessed by letters to Caesar, acknowledging Antipater to have been the author, both of his safety, and the Victory. But now by this time was Ptolomy himself coming against Mithridates, and Caesar also to fetch him off.

33. Both went by Sea, but Caesar first got to him, and took him in with his victorious Army. Ptolomy and Caesar encamped then seven miles asunder, the former in an high and most fortified place by nature, having a narrow River with exceeding high and precipitous banks betwixt him and the Enemy, which though the Alexandrians defended, yet Caesar's men got over (the Horse by passing the Foard, and the Foot by laying over a bridge made of long trees) so that Caesar sat down, not far from the Kings Camp. The next day he stormed a Castle in a Village near adjoyning, the defendants whereof flying again to the Camp, his men had well nigh entred with them; but coming to hand-strokes, were beaten back, being severally laid at, both from the fortifications and the ships. But Caesar espying a very high place, which by reason of it's natural strength was little looked to by the Alexandrians, set certain Companies to get up there; which being performed, and a great cry raised on purpose round about, the Romans brake in, in several places, and made great slaughter. Most of the defendants fled upon the irruption, and in great heaps leaped down into the trenches, wherein they first being overwhelmed, the rest with great ease got over, amongst which was the King; but coming to take boat, so many pressed in after him, that the Vessel sunk, and he thereby was drowned, after he had reigned well nigh four years. Together with him fell in this War (though most after another fashion) 20000 men, 12000 were taken with 70 long ships, and 500 of the Romans are said to have been slain. Caesar in confidence and pursute of this Victory, with the Horse marched presently to the City, where he found now not any resistance, the Citizens entertaining him in a suppliant posture, whom he comforted and forgave.

34. Having thus made an end of the War, he laied not Egypt to the Roman Empire, but gave it to Cleopatra, joyning to her in marriage (to colour the businesse) her younger brother as yet but eleven years old; but indeed subjecting all things to her will and power, with whom he was so familiar; as, out of love to her, he staid in Egypt nine moneths, and had done it longer, or else had taken her with him to Rome, had he not been called thence by the urgent affaires of Syria; and not long after she brought him a son, whom by his permission she named Cesarion. At his departure he removed Arsione out of the Kingdom, lest any disturbance should arise upon her account, and left three Legions behind him for the security of these two Princes, who being disrespected by their own People for their respect to him, as yet were not confirmed in their seats.

35. As for the Government, Cleopatra reigned, and acted alone without the control of any, permitting her brother to enjoy the title with his life as yet. Not long after Cæsar's departure, the eldest son of Pompey his Enemy coming to Alexandria, she is (a) reported to have been as familiar and common with him; yet upon Cæsar's invitation (b) went with her brother to Rome, where they were admitted as friends and allies: for her a lodging was provided in his own house, and having built a Temple to Venus Genetrix (which he had vowed before the battel at Pharsalia) he therein placed (c) her effigies beside the Goddess. In the fourth year, her brother growing towards a man, she (d) poysoned him, to be at her own liberty. After Julius Cæsar was killed in the Senate house, she stood ever firm to those that prosecuted the conspirators: to (e) Dolabella, at his request of aid, she sent four Legions, and had a fleet ready to put out had the weather served. To Cassius, who with menacing language demanded supplies, she plainly refused to send any; for that he had an hand in Cæsar's death, his threats only inciting her to go and meet Octavius Cæsar and Antony, who were then making an Expedition against him and his fellow Brutus, the heads of their faction. He getting knowledge of her intentions, sent a strong party with 60 ships to hover for her about Peloponnesus; but such a tempest seized on her Fleet, that her design was broken, and having received great losse, and now fallen sick, she was forced to return into Ægypt. Antony after the overthrow of Brutus and Cassius, being left in Asia to settle the affaires thereof, thither she repaired to him in a strange anrick fashion, and he, who, when he formerly served under Gabinus in Ægypt, had cast a wanton eye upon her, was now so smitten, (though 40 years old) that he also became enslaved to her in his affections. She ruled him and all his affaires, and procured him out of hand, to cause her sister Arione to be made away; who being formerly led in triumph by Julius Cæsar after the Alexandrian War, with the pity of all men, had for her brother and sisters sake been then dismissed.

36. Antony had no power but to follow her into Ægypt, where they spent their time in nothing but extraordinary vanity and dalliance. After his reconciliation to Cæsar, and the making up of the breach betwixt them, by his marrying of Octavia, Cleopatra fearing that this new wife might draw his affections from her self, pretended to be almost mad in love with him, practising upon her body in such sort, that being reduced into a Consumption, she seemed not to be able to live in his absence; whereupon he gave over his intention of invading Parthia for that time, and returned to Alexandria. Not long after she begged of him that part of Judea which bare Balm, and many other places and Countries, which he bestowed upon her, to the great distaste of the People of Rome, who took it in high disdain, as well that such vast possessions should be given her, as that now he had divers children by her, two of which, beeing twins, were named Sun and Moon. Shortly after, she accompanied him as far as Euphrates, then making an Expedition into Armenia, and taking Judea in her way homeward, that part thereof, which Antony had given her, together with Arabia, she let out to farm unto Herod, whom also, either out of her filthy affection to him (which she pretended) or for some other end (having formerly wished for an advantage against him, to get his Kingdom) she solicited to the breach of the chastity of them both; but he instead of giving her satisfaction, consulted with his friends how to kill her, and then being again terrified from that, to do her honour, waited on her home as far as Pelusiuss. Antony having prospered in Armenia returned, and entred Alexandria in triumph, leading with him Arzavases the King with his wife and children, whom he earnestly laboured with to make them fall down before her, as suppliants, but to no purpose. Then spent they their time in feasting, he divided almost half of the Roman Empire betwixt her and her children; she took upon her the name of Isis, and he of Osiris, and Fauber Bacchus, having his temples crowned with Ivy, and wearing buskins; being drawn in that garb, after the fashion of Bacchus, in a chariot through the streets of the City.

37. These foolish and loose practices brought great inconveniences upon them. For Caesar Octavius and he fell presently of recriminating each other, and Anthony not long after had the confidence to send to Rome, to desire from the Senate a confirmation of his donations to her and her children; which gave such offence, that his friends were forced to flee out of the City; whereupon he sent thither again some to thrust Octavia (his wife, and Caesar's sister) out of his house, and took upon him to make War upon both People and Senate. Caesar hereat enraged, found out a way to incense the People against him, by opening his will deposited in the hands of the Vestal Nuns, wherein he had laboured to make Cesarion the lawfull son of the Dictator, named for Heirs his Children begotten on Cleopatra, and commanded that notwithstanding he might die at Rome, yet his body should be sent to her to Alexandria. These things found to be true, gained credit to others which were but reported; as that in case he should get the better, he would bestow Rome it self upon the Queen, and translate the Seat of the Empire into Egypt. When Caesar then was ready for the War, it was decreed against her, and he was deprived of all his Offices, which alone was thought enough at this time, lest once declared an Enemy to the State, the other with him should have been included in the same capacity, of whom divers, being men of great influence, might have been driven through desperation, to act more vigorously for him: Hereby it was thought he would be sufficiently intangled, resolving not to forsake her on any terms whatsoever, and vulgarly accounted to be bewitched by her. And to little lesse could these things practized by him amount to. He called her Queen, Lady, and Mistresse; gave her Romans for her Guard (who had her name ingraven on their Targets.) He went abroad, celebrated Games, sate in Judgement, and sometimes rode with her, and when she pleased to be drawn in her Chariot, ran by her side amongst the Lackies. She was so confident she should be Mistresse at length of the Mistresse of the World, that if she would swear most religiously, it should be by that Law or Sentence, which she was about to pronounce in the Capitol.

He is bewitched as it were by her.

38. For all this ado, yet in the preparation for the War, Anthony mistrusted her, and that so far, as to have his meat tasted for fear of poyson. She taking notice of it, poysoned a Cup of drink, and giving him it, when he was about to set it to his mouth, interposed her hand, convincing him thereby how easie a matter it was for her to do that of which she was suspected to have an intention, and then sending for a Malefactor out of prison, and giving him the liquor, he died immediately. This made him bold and confident of her, and further enslaved his affections, insomuch that that she ruled him in the management of the War. For Camidius, whom she had bribed to get leave for her to continue with him, changing afterwards his mind, or (at least his language) and advising him to send her back into Egypt, and to go into Thrace or Macedonia, and there to decide the controversy in a pitched battel, she prevailed against him not onely to stay, but made Anthony ingage at Actium in a Sea-fight, yet providing rather for flight than victory. Ere it could justly be discerned which party would carry it, she being impatient of delay, with her Golden Prow and Purple sayls, giving a sign to her Egyptians, betook her self to flight, which Anthony seeing, made haste after her as fast as possible, and being received on board, neither saw, nor was seen by her; but sate him down in a sad and thoughtfull posture, holding his head betwixt his hands; and for three or four dayes so continued, till arriving at Tenarus (a Promontory of Lacedaemonia) the women there that were intimate with her brought them together. He passing over into Africa, she returned into Egypt, counterfeiting a triumph with her ship curiously adorned, and melodious singing, that she might be received of her Subjects, the chiefest of which presently she put to death, whom she knew formerly to have borne no good will towards her, and now to be elevated upon the report of the defeat received at Actium. Confiscating their estates, and rifling religious houses, she heaped together a great Masses of Treasure, raising forces therewith with all expedition, and that she might draw into Confederacy the King of Media, she sent him the head of Artavasdes (or Artabazus) the Armenian, his Æmulator. Then, attempting a matter of greatest difficulty, she conveyed ships over the Isthmus, or Neck of Land (which parting the Egyptian (or Mediterranean) from the Red-Sea divideth Asia from Africa) into the Arabian Bay, intending to fly servitude, and seek out some foreign seat, wherein to spend the remainder of her days. But Anthony returning to her, who as yet had heard nothing of the loss of his Land-Army, they encouraged themselves, and she changed her purpose. Her ships were burnt by the Inhabitants of Arabia Petraea, at the procurement of Q. Didius the President of Syria.

39. But Anthony having notice that his Army had revolted to Cæsar, withdrew himself in a sad and Melancholick posture from the sight of all men into the Island Pharos, and then again within a while, having disburthened himself of grief, returned to the Court, where they indulged their genius more than ever, those that were willing to die with them giving in their names, and passing away their time together in nothing but feasting and jollity. She gathered together divers sorts of poysons, which she tried upon Capital Offenders and Brutes, approving above all the biting of an Asp, which she observed without any convulsion to cast the party into an heavy stupefaction, with a moderate sweat upon the face, and so to kill with an easie kind of languishment. Before Cæsar came down into Egypt against them, they sent several times to him. She asked the Kingdom for her Children, and without Anthony his knowledge sent him a Scepter, a Crown of Gold, and a royal Throne, giving up her Kingdom to him, as it were, with those, to gain respect. He received them as a good Omen, and returned to her openly threatening language; yet underhand promised her impunity, and the entire possession of her Kingdom, if she would make away Anthony. And fearing lest she might be brought to undertake some desperate design, he sent one Thyrseus his Freed-man, and a cunning fellow to her, to make her believe he was in Love with her, hoping that then, besides the saving of the Treasure, which she had threatened to burn, she having a great ambition to be loved by all great persons, would not stick at killing Anthony. She desiring indeed that it might be so, & remembering how his Uncle, in time past, and since that Anthony had been bewitched by her, easily fooled her self into a fond belief thereof, and promised her ambition, not onely pardon, and Egypt, but the Roman Empire it self. Anthony seeing her kind to the Messenger above measure, suspected something, and soundly bishing him, sent him back to his Master; and then she to wipe off his jealousy most solemnly celebrated his birth-day (though suitably to her present condition she neglected her own) and sought all manner of ways how to humour him. Yet did she betray Pelussium into Cæsars hands, and when he drew down towards Alexandria secretly forbad the Towns-men to go out against him, though openly she exhorted them to resistance. And when Anthony had provided a Fleet, she caused it wholly to revolt, and in like manner the horse, which Anthony plainly seeing, after the overthrow of his foot, returned into the Citie, crying out that he was betrayed by her into their hands, against whom, for her sake he had taken Arms.

40. She being afraid of him, went to her Monument, as intending to kill her self, under pretence of being afraid of Cæsar, and sent a Messenger to him to tell him she was dead. He giving credit to it, desired Eros his servant to kill him; but he preventing it with his own death, he wounded himself in the belly; but the stroak not being such an one as could presently dispatch him, he intreated his friends to do it, who refusing, and running out of the room, a tumult ensued, and she perceiving what was done, sent for him up into her Monument. He understanding she was alive, arose, thinking he might also possibly live; but the blood issuing out in great abundance, he despaired of it, and was born by his attendants to the door of the build-building, whence he was drawn up with Cords in a lamentable plight, all in goar blood, helping himself as it were, and stretching out his hands to her, and her women, who haled him up thus to the top. When he was got up she laid him on a bed, tore her flesh, wiped off his blood with her face, calling him Lord, Husband, and General, after which he presently expired. Cesar now desired to get her into his power by strong hand, having an extraordinary ambition to grace his Triumph with her, and not willing to promise any thing, and be counted a deceiver by falsifying his word. She continued still in the Monument, hoping at least to purchase her Kingdom by the Treasure she had yet in her power, and refused to come down, talking with the Messengers from above. But presently some got in to her, removed all things out of the way wherewith she might hurt her self, and then bringing her into the Palace, detracted nothing from her former state, thereby to delude her with vain hope. Cesar now without any trouble entred Alexandria with Arius the Philosopher on his right hand, who formerly had read the Sciences to him; he permitted her to bury Antony as she pleased, which after she had done, being spent with sorrow, and her breast all exulcerated with strokes, she thereby contracted a Fever, and glad of that pretence to abstain from all sustenance, and so end her dayes, she consulted also with Olympus her Physician how to reduce her self into a Consumption. But Cesar smelling it out, so terrified her about her Children, that she was content to desist.

41. Shortly after, he coming to comfort her, she cast her self down at his feet, endeavouring with all the art she had to inveigle his affections, which though he perceived, yet fixing his eyes on the ground, he onely said, Be of good cheer Woman, thou shalt have no harm, she being solicitous, not for life, but love, and a Kingdom. Then gave she in an Inventory of her Goods and Treasure, at which Seleucus one of her Officers was so Malapert, as to accuse her of suppressing something, whereupon she flew in his face, and soundly buffeted him, Cesar smiling, and gently reprehending her for it. But she asked him whether it was not an hard case, for her, whom he had deigned to visit, to be accused by one of her own slaves, if she had reserved any thing, not for her self, but wherewithall to present his wife and sister, that they might render him the more favourable to her. Hereat he exceedingly rejoiced, hoping she had a great desire to live, and promised her great matters, vainly supposing he therein deceived her. But she having notice by Dolabella, a young Gentleman amongst his followers, and one that bare her great good will, that after three dayes, she and her Children were to go for Italy, first obtained leave of him to celebrate the obsequies of Antony, which having performed with lamentations, and great shew of affection, she commanded a Bath to be prepared, and sitting down to meat, sumptuously Dined. After Dinner she gave a Letter to her Keeper to carry to Cesar (wherein she desired she might be buried by Antony) sealed, that he thinking the contents to be of consequence, might the more easily be removed out of the way. He being gone, with the help of her two women, she made fast the doors, most gorgeously apparelled her self, as upon some solemn day, with her royal Ornaments, and then put an Asp (which she had procured to be brought in secretly amongst Figs, Grapes, and Flowers) to her left Arm, with the biting of which, she fell presently as into a sleep, and so died. Cesar having read the Letter presently perceived what was done, and endeavoured with all speed to recall her to life, though in vain, grieving sore that he was frustrated of a glorious Triumph, yet pitying and admiring the person, whom he caused to be royally interred with Antony, according to her desire, and afterwards dealt very nobly with their Children. Adorned she was with all the endowments of nature above her Sex. Being learned her self, she was a great Lover and Promoter of knowledge; which she testified in erecting another Library, in the room of that which had been burnt, supplied with books from Pergamus at the procurement of Antony. She lived 39 years, reigned 22. (counted from her fathers death) fourteen whereof

The Judæan Kingdom or Principality of the Asmonæans.

From the departure of Antiochus Sidetes from Jerusalem to the reign of Herod an alien, being by birth an Idumæan, containing the space of 98 years.

1. AFTER Antiochus had raised his siege and departed from Jerusalem, as was said before, he undertook an Expedition against the Parthians, where- in he was slain. John the son of Simon who then was chief both Priest and Magistrate of the Jews accompanied him some way with a band of Auxilia- ries, and got the surname of Hyrcaus from the overthrow of the Hyrca- nians, as it's thought, and returned with great credit into his own Countrey.

AFTER Antiochus his death, he led down an Army into Syria, thinking, as indeed it fell out, that the Cities were left without defence, whereof he took several, Medaba, Samaga, Sicima, and Gerizim, where the Cuthæans had built a Temple resembling that at Jerusalem. In this Expedition he also subdued Idumæa, the Inhabitants whereof he put to their choice, whether they would be circumcised or quit their habitations. They chose the former, and now began to be reckoned amongst the Jews, submitting to all their rites and ceremonies. After this he sent to Rome, desiring that the confederacy made with the Senite might be renewed; that Joppa, Gazara, with other Cities and places taken from the Jews by Antiochus, contrary to their Decree, might be restored, that it might not be lawful for the King of Syria to pass through their Countrey with his Armies, that whatsoever Antiochus had attempted against them in War contrary to their will might be made frustrate, and that the Senate would please to send their Ambassadors to procure those things, and to cause satisfaction to be given for the havock made of the Countrey. The Fathers renewed the confederacy with them, according to their desire, promised to take order they should be no more wronged, and dismissed the Ambassadors with money to bear their charges, and letters commendatory to those through whose Countreys they should passe. The many changes which then presently hapned in the Syrian Kingdom so diverted the several Princes from meddling with the Jews, that they were glad of their friendship, and this proved a sufficient opportunity for Hyrcaus to establish his affaires. For they destroying one another with War, he securely enjoyed the revenues of the Countrey, and got together a great misse of money; so that despising them, he went and besieged Samaria, the Inhabitants of which he was displeased with for their injury offered to the Maris-

2. He cast a trench about it, and committed the siege to the care of his two sons Antigonus and Aristobulus, who sorely oppressed the defendants, hindering all importation of Victuals, so that they were constrained to beg aid of Antiochus Cyzicenus then reigning in Syria. He came, but was overthrown by Aristobulus his Soldiers, and being pursued by the brothers as far as Scythopolis, hardly escaped, and the siege was renewed. The besieged reduced to their former necessities, sent once more to Cyzicenus, who then obtaining about 6000 men of Ptolomy Lathurus (then expelled his Kingdom by his mother) made an inroad into Hyrcaanus his Dominions, and made havoc of all things, thereby hoping to constrain him to raise the siege. But having lost many of his men intercepted by the Enemy, he himself went to Tripolis, and gave over the War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander being more venturous than wife was presently slain, and his fellow was corrupted to betray Scythopolis and other Towns to Hyrcaanus, who then after a years lying before Samaria took it, razed it, and brought the water-courses through the Place, by the filth of which all appearance of a Town was taken away. After this, inviting the Pharisees on a time (whose Scholar he had been) to a feast, he laboured to approve his sincerity to them, and desired, if any of them knew any fault in him, to tell him plainly of it. All approved of his manners but one Eleazarus a seditious and bad man, who told him, that if would be accounted good, he must devest himself of the Priesthood, and be content with the Principality, for that he had heard say, that his mother was a captive in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This being utterly false, Hyrcaanus was grievously offended, and so were the Pharisees; but Jonathan a Saducee of the contrary sect, and one in great grace with him, took thence occasion to tell him, that this affront came from all the Pharisees together, and that he should perceive it by the punishment they would inflict upon him, if their opinion was demanded. They being mercifully inclined, thought it sufficient he should be imprisoned and beaten for no greater an offence: at which Hyrcaanus was sore displeased, as then thinking they had raised that scandal of him. Wherefore being more incensed by Jonathan, he revolted to the Saducees, abrogated the constitutions of the Pharisees, and punished their followers, whence it came to passe, that neither he nor his sons were much beloved by the People. A sedition also arose hereupon, but he quieted all, and having governed the People 31 years died, being honoured with three especial dignities, of the chief Government, High-Priesthood, and also Prophecy, as Jonathan tells us, who relateth, that he foretold his two eldest sons should neither of them long enjoy his Principality. Jewish Sects.

3. Mention being here made of Pharisees, it is requisite to speak something of this sect and others amongst the Jews, according to the nature of this work, Josephus first maketh mention of them in the ninth Chapter of his thirteenth Book of Antiquities, afterwards more diligently and largely * handling them. There is no question but these sects sprang up after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. It's probable that the difference amongst them arose after the building of the second Temple, about their worship and offerings. Some thought they were onely to live by the prescript of the Law, neither above nor below it. Others believed they were not onely to act according to the bare letter of the Scriptures, but also according to such senses and consequences as might be made out from it, and accordingly they offered over and above what the Law required in the service of the Temple, even what they conceived was due according to their riches or other respects. Those that stood to the letter of the Law were called Karvaim: Those that besides the precepts of the Law did works of supererogation, and voluntary service without any compulsion, were named Hafidim, that is Sanctior or Holy, and (after they grew into a body) Hafideans. As long as this voluntary and supererogatory service was free and spontaneous,

there was no such schism; but when this doctrine of the Hasidaans came to be digested into precepts, and the precepts of supererogation into writings and Canons, many doubts, disputes, and controversies, daily arose, whence two dogmatical Sects had their original. One which onely allowed of the Law it self, and Another that imbraced also the glosses and interpretations of it. From the latter, being that of the Hasidaans, sprung up some who called themselves Peruschim or Separate, as those, who by reason of their holiness were not onely distinct and separated from the vulgar, but also from other Hasidaans, for that they taught that those constitutions formerly accounted free, were to be observed out of necessity. These Peruschim in Syriack Pheruschim, came by Greek writers to be called Pharisei. Now as out of the Hasidaans arose the Pharisees, so from amongst the Karaim the Saducees, so named from Sadoc. Antigonus the master of this Sadoc, and scholar to Simeon the Just, amongst other heads of doctrine had taught, that they ought not to be like servants, who served their Masters on this condition to receive their wages, meaning that we ought to serve God out of love, and not for our own gain or advantage. But Sadoc, or Saduc, & Bairhus interpreted this godly saying into a wicked sence, teaching, that there was no reward after this life; and therefore denied the future state, and framed their heresie. The third sect was that of the Esses or Esseni, who as it's probable sprang from the Pharisees, though when it began be uncertain. Philo Judeum thinketh they were so called from their holiness Ἐσσηταί, as though Ὁσιόταί, though more probable from Hasi the Syriack, whence the Greek Ὀσι may be derived. The Hebrew signifieth such as live apart from noise, which agreeth much with those Esseni, who like the Pythagoreans kept silence, and lived in deserts or Villages by themselves, far from others. They had skill in physick, and thence some would derive their name from the Hebrew Afa, which signifieth to heal. This Sect was later than that of the Pharisees, and some think it arose at this time when Hircanus turned Saducee, and persecuted the Sect of the Pharisees; for then might many of the Pharisees to shun persecution depart into the Wilderness and desert places, and afterwards be called Esses or Esseni, who were held more strict than the Pharisees themselves.

4. But, (to return to our matter) John surnamed Hircanus left five sons, whereof Aristobulus the eldest (surnamed Philellen for his love to, and familiarity with the Greeks) succeeded him, and first changed his Principality into a Kingdom, setting a Diadem on his head, 481 years after the return of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. His second brother he loved exceedingly, so as he made him his partner in the Kingdom; but shut up the rest in prison, and with them his mother, to whom his father had left the Principality, and proceeded so far in unnatural cruelty, as to starve her to death. Not long after, he caused to be made away also his beloved brother, though against his will he did it. For he (Antigonus by name) returning victorious from the Wars, at the Feast of the Tabernacles, marched up with his Soldiers to the Temple, as intending to offer sacrifice for his brother then lying sick. This was presently interpreted to Aristobulus as an effect of a bad intention towards him, and a sufficient sign of affecting the Kingdom, and it was represented to him, as if Antigonus would presently come down and kill him, accounting it folly when he might reign alone, to be content with a communicated honour. He having rejected tales heretofore, did not easily give credit to them now, but to provide for his own security, and yet shun suspicion, he commanded some of his guard to stand in an obscure place where he was to come, and if he came armed, then to kill him, but if not, then not to molest him, and he sent also to him to come without any guard at all. But the Queen and the rest of the conspirators, perswaded the messenger to deliver his errand on the clean contrary way, so that Antigonus thinking nothing, but coming to see his brother, was there murdered. After it was done, Aristobulus presently repented of the deed, though knowing nothing concerning the message, which so increased his disease, as he vomited blood for anguish.

of mind. This being carried out by one of his attendants, chanced to be spilt in that place where Antigonus was slain, which being judged by them that saw it, to be done of purpose, they cried out against the thing, and made such a noise, that the King hearing it, forced the matter out of them; after which his Agony increased so highly (crying out, that his blood was required for that of his mothers and brothers which he had spilt, and chiding as it were his body for retaining the Soul required of him by their Ghosts) that in great torment of conscience he presently breathed out his last, when he had scarce reigned a whole year. He profited much his Countrey by his Government, and making War upon Iturea, laid a great part of it to his own Dominions, and frightened the Inhabitants by threatening banishment to them, into an imbrace-ment of Circumcision, and the other Jewish Rites.

5. He being dead, his wife Salome (called by the Greeks Alexandra) Josephus Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 20. set his brothers at liberty, of which Jannæus (or Alexander) was made King, excelling his brothers, as in age so also in modesty. His father is said to have hated him, and sent him out of his sight to be educated in Galile presently after his birth, because being solicitous for his two eldest sons, and desiring of God to know his Successor, his likeness was represented to him in his sleep. Being seized of the Kingdom, he put to death one of his brothers that conspired against him, but the other who was contented with a private life he much honoured. Having settled his affairs at home, he went and besieged Ptolemais, which with Gaza onely of the Sea-Towns remained unconquered, besides the Tower of Siraton (since called Cæsarea) and Dora, which Zoilus the Tyrant had got into his hands. At this time the two brothers Antiochus Grypus (called by Josephus Philometor) and Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria, attending nothing but the destruction of each other, the Defendants had little hope of any succour from either of them, onely Zoilus, who gaped after the Citie himself, gave them a little relief. There remaining no help to be hoped for, but either from Egypt, or Cyprus (whither Lathurus had been expelled by his mother Cleopatra) they sent to him, desiring he would rescue them out of the hands of Alexander, giving him hopes, that he should not onely have them, but the Inhabitants of Gaza also on his side, and that Zoilus, the Sidonians and others would come and help him. He being puffed up with these promises made what haste he could, but Demianetus one of their Citizens perswaded them for reasons formerly recited to refuse his help, notwithstanding which he came on, and pitching his Tents near the Citie, seeing he had no Message from them, began to be discouraged. But Zoilus and the Gazæans came shortly to him, and desired his help against Alexander, who wasted their Territories, whereupon the siege was raised before Ptolemais, and Alexander departed home, where he attempted to overturn by policy the design of Ptolomy. He sent privily to Cleopatra, exciring her against him, but openly counterfeiting himself his Friend and Ally, promised him 300 Talents of silver to take off Zoilus the Tyrant, and lay his Territories to his Dominions. At first he willingly imbraced his friendship and took Zoilus, but then finding he had sent underhand to his mother, renounced it again, and went and besieged Ptolemais, which had shut the Gates on him, where leaving part of his Army to continue the siege, he departed thence to invade Judea. Alexander also understanding his purpose, raised an Army of 50000 (some say 80000) and went to meet him.

6. He took Asychis a Town in Galile, setting upon it at unawares on the Sabbath, and then attempted to do the like by Sephoris, a place not far distant from the other; but was received with such resolution, as he lost many of his men, and arose from thence to go to meet Alexander, whom having found to have reached the River Jordan, he pitched his Tents on this side over against him. Alexander suffered him quietly to passe the River, foolishly supposing that the victory would be more easie if the Enemy had it on his back, and so could not run away. For some time the victory was doubtfull, or seemed to incline to Alexanders party, till his Soldiers being beaten back by a reserve of fresh men, and having none to succour them were were put to flight, and the Enemy gave the chace as long as he could hold a sword for wearinesse, so that 30000 (some have affirmed 50000) were slain in this battel. Ptolomy ranging up and down the Countrey, fell at length into some Villages, which seeing full of Women and Children, he commanded his Soldiers to kill them promiscuously, and cutting off their limbs to cast them into hot Caldrons, that a report going that his Army ate mans flesh, the Enemy might thereby be discouraged. But Cleopatra hearing that her son thus prospered in his undertakings, thought her self concerned therein, especially he being so near her, and therefore she came against him with Forces both by Land and Sea, over which she placed Checcias and Ananias, both Jews. Her son thinking he had her at advantage, being now out of Egypt, hasted thither, but she had left it so provided, as he could not do any thing according to his purpose, and was beaten back to Gaza by a party she sent after him. She having taken Ptolemais, Alexander thither came to her, where he was received as a person distressed by her adversary, and one who onely had refuge in her self. Some advised her to seize his Countrey into her hands, & not to suffer so many good Jews to be at the command and pleasure of one man: but Ananias counsing it wickednesse for him to dispose of a man received into friendship, and his own Kinsman besides, of his estate, and withall thinking that thereby he should lose himself with the Jews in all places, he perswaded her to the contrary, and so she entred into a League with him at Scythopolis, a Citie of Calesyria.

7. Here y<sup>e</sup> he being freed from all danger, both from mother and son, he presently made another expedition into Calesyria, took Gadara after he had layen ten monerhs before it, and Amarhus a strong Castle upon the River Jordan, where Theodorus the son of Zenon had laid up his Treasure, who falling suddenly upon the Jews, cut off 10000 of them, and plundered the carriages. Yet he was not at all terrified herewith from setting upon Raphia and Anthedon (called afterwards Agrippias by Herod) which he took, and perceiving Ptolomy to be gone to Cyprus, and his mother into Egypt, being angry with them of Gaza, for calling him in to help them against him, he set upon the Citie, and wasted their grounds. In the meantime Apollodorus their General brake out into his Camp by night with 12000 men, and as long as night lasted had the better of it, but as soon as it was day the Jews uniting themselves, and encouraged after they saw Ptolomy was not come whom they expected, charged the Towns-men so fiercely as they slew 1000 men. For all this they would not yield, expecting the coming of Arctas the Arabian King; but the Citie was taken ere they could see his face, by the treachery of Lyfimachus the brother of Apollodorus, whom he envying for being in so great grace with the people, murdered, and then getting a party close about him delivered up the place. Alexander upon his entry did no harm to the Inhabitants, but not long after gave Commission to his Soldiers to kill and slay all they would, who ranging up and down with fury and sword, as many of them lost their lives as they slew, the Defendants fighting courageously, and setting their houses on fire, lest they should become a prey to them; and some killed their Wives and Children with their own hands, rather than they should be led into Captivity. It hapned that at the same time that Alexander was let in, the Senate was met, which consistig of 500 men, he put all to the sword, and then razing the Citie, returned to Jerusalem a year after he first sate down before Gaza.

8. He was not at all affected by his Subjects, which they clearly manifested when the feast of Tabernacles came. For then as he was about to sacrifice they threw Orenge at him, and rail'd at him, upbraiding him with Captivity (that I suppose of his Grand-mother objected before to his Father) and crying out that he was not worthy of so high an Office as the high Priest-hood. Being enraged hereat he slew about 6000 of them; made up the place about the Altar with boards to defend himself for the time to come from the violence of the multitude, and furnished himself with Guards hired out of Pisidia and Cilicia. Then overthrew he the Arabians, and imposed Tribute upon the Moabites and Galadites, and levelled Amathus with the ground, Theodoris not once daring to engage. But making another expedition against the Arabians, he was drawn into an ambush by Obeda their King, and being thrust amongst the Craggy and precipitous Rocks by a multitude of Camels, he hardly escaped himself by flight to Jerusalem, his whole Army being cut off. Then were his Rebellious Subjects encouraged by this his overthrow to begin fresh stirrs, which continued six years, during which time they fought often, but he had the better, and destroyed no lesse than fifty thousand of them. This yet was no matter of joy to him thus to lose the strength of his own Kingdom; therefore he endeavoured to make up the breach, and by fair means to be reconciled to them. But being asked by him wherewith he should appease them, they answered, if he would kill himself, for scarce could they pardon him being dead. Then sent they to Demetrius, surnamed Acerus, inducing him with great promises to come and aid them, so that joyning with him they made up an Army of 2000 horse, and 40000 foot, their King having 26200 men in his Army. Both at the first laboured to draw their Enemies men to revolt, Demetrius those Greeks that were in pay with Alexander, and he the Jews which had called him in, but this succeeding on no part, they both resolved to end the controversy with dint of sword. Demetrius had the better of it (all Alexanders Auxiliaries being slain, though they behaved themselves most gallantly) but he was no whit better, but much worse for his victory. For the Jews taking pity of their King after this his defeat, about 6000 went over to him, which so discouraged Demetrius, that he thereupon retreated into his own Countrey.

9. They thenceforth waged War with him by themselves, but still had the worst of it, and many of them were slain. At length he forced the strongest up into a Town called Bethoma, which reducing, he took them in it, and brought them up to Jerusalem, where he caused 800 of them to be nailed to Crosses, and their Wives and Children to be slain in their sight, yet living, he beholding the Spectacle from an high place, banquetting, and dallying with his women. He was highly provoked with that stubborn people, who not onely brought him often into extream danger of life and estate, but not contenting themselves with what they could do by their own power, without calling in of foreign aid, had reduced him to that necessity, that he was glad to restore those places he had subdued in the Countrey of Moab and Galaad to the Arabians: and for animadversion upon them they nicknamed him Thracida. About 8000 men got away by night, and passed all the time he lived, in Exile, and so ever after the Kingdom continued free from seditions. Antiochus Dionysus King of Syria intending to make an invasion of Arabia through his Kingdom, he getting knowledge of it, drew a Ditch from Caparsale (afterwards called Antipatris) as far as the Sea of Joppe, to hinder him, strengthening it with a Bulwark, and Forts built here and there upon it where he expected him. But he burning these up easily got over, and then invading Arabia, was there slain in battel by Arcias the King, who was made King of Cælesyria, and making an inroad into Judæa, overthrew Alexander at Adida, and forcing him to subscribe to his own conditions, then departed. Afterwards Alexander gathering together his Forces, went and took divers Towns with all the Valley of Antiochus (as it was called) and the Castle Gamala, and returned to Jerusalem at the end of three years, joyfully and honorably received then by his people for his valour; and indeed at this time the Nation, what by his own, and the diligence of his Predecessors, arrived at that height for dominion and glory abroad, that they enjoyed many Cities in Syria, Idumæa, Phœnicia, and other Countreys; whereof a Catalogue of most Josèphus hath left unto us, and amongst which Pollæa Town of Moab was destroyed, because the Inhabitants refused to receive the Jewish Rites. Alexander towards his latter end fell to drunkenness, whereby he contracted a Quartan Ague, which held him three years; yet recovered he his antient temper of mind, though not of body, and following on his Wars laid siege to Ragola beyond Jordan, in the Coun-

His advice to his wife to gain the Pharisees.

10. His wife Alexandra seeing his end approaching, bewailed much the condition of her self and children, being destitute of succour, and about to enter upon the government of a People, likely enough to be untoward towards them, which bore him so much ill will. He advised her, that she might reign securely, first to keep close his death till that place should be gained, then going victoriously to Jerusalem to send for the chief of the Pharisees, whom both he and his Father had grievously offended, and thereby incurred the hatred of the People, and to gain their favour to shew them his body, and give them power of disposing of it at their pleasure, either as to bestow burial upon it, or cast it out without Sepulture, or otherwise to abuse it at their pleasure; and withall, to promise them to do nothing without their counsel and advice. The Castle being taken, she ordered her affaires according to his direction, whereby she purchased the love of the Pharisees, who going out and speaking to the People, related the great things done by Alexander, signified to them the losse of a just King, and so stirred up the multitude to mourning and lamentation, that hereby she procured him (even as he foretold her) a more honourable burial than else he could have had, and so sumptuous a funeral as any of his Predecessors obtained. Alexander left two sons by this his wife, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; but to her left the management of the Kingdom. The elder of their sons was not at all made for government, but dull and heavy. She being in great grace with the People, because she ever had pretended to dislike the proceedings of her husband, made Hyrcanus the High-Priest, not so much out of respect to his birthright as his lazinesse, keeping the title of Queen and Governesse, though indeed all things were ordered at the will and pleasure of the Pharisees, whom the People were commanded to obey, and against whom all such constitutions as were made by Hyrcanus were taken away. Yet she took care for something her self, for she kept in pay a great number of foreigners, and so increased her power, that she became formidable abroad, and such a terror to the neighbouring petty Governours, that she constrained them to give Hostages.

Which she followeth and reigneth her self.

11. Yet no great matters were done abroad, but stirs sufficient hapned within the Kingdom; for the Pharisees knowing no moderation in the prosecution of their own ambitious and envious desires, caused her to put to death those that had counselled her husband to deal cruelly with the 800 before mentioned, and they made away divers of them; till such time as those of most power and esteem being backed by Aristobulus (who complained of the too great power of his mother) came to Court, and there laid before her how unworthy it was, that they should suffer so much for their faithfulness to Alexander, and how joyfull news it would be to Arctas the Arabian and others, to hear that the Kingdom was deprived of such men, who had done good service against him. They besought her, that if their adversaries were not satisfied with what blood they had spilt already, to give them leave to depart, and provide for their own safety, or if that could not be granted, to distribute them into several places of strength, that there they might live quietly and meanly, with which condition they would be contented; seeing Fortune so frowned upon the favourers of Alexander. They setting these things off with all advantage possible to gain compassion, and calling on the ghost of Alexander, Aristobulus also soundly reprehended his mother, but withall added, that they were justly punished, for permitting the chief power to a woman, as if no posterity had been left by his Father. She not knowing what to do, delivered into their hands all her Castles, except three, in which she had hoarded up her choicest goods, and shortly after sent her younger son against Ptolomy Mennaus, who troubled sorely Damascus; but he returned without having done any thing. graves the Armenian had invaded Syria with 50000 men, and would speedily come into Judea, which so terrified both Queen and People, that they sent Ambassadors to him then lying before Ptolemais; for Celene or Cleopatra then reigned in Syria, and had advised the Subjects to exclude him. He kindly received the Ambassadors, because come so far to tender him respect, and gave them encouraging words. And after he had taken Ptolemais, word being brought him, that Lucullus in his pursuit of Mithridates the Great, King of Pontus, was entered Armenia, and wasted the Country, he being son in Law to that King, and therefore taking his part, departed home with all Expedition.

Aristobulus her younger son assumeth the State of King.

She dieth.

12. After this, Alexandra falling grievously sick, Aristobulus judged that now or never was there a fit opportunity for him to doe something, and lest the Pharisees should get all into their hands, departed by night with one man in his company, and got the Castles within a short time into his power, which she had committed to their adversaries, even to the number of 22 within little more than fifteen dayes. This being known, she and all the People were struck with consternation, knowing that he would take the Supreme Power, and fearing they should dearly pay for what they had done to his familiars. They thought good then to secure his wife and children in the Castle adjoyning to the Temple at Jerusalem. He increased in followers and in power daily, taking the State of a King upon him, and got an Army from the Mountain Libanus, Trachonitis, and the petty Princes thereto adjoyning. The chief of the Jews therefore with Hyrcanus came to the Queen, beseeching her that some course might be entered into to prevent his attempts, who now had gotten so many convenient places. She with shortnesse of mind told them they might do whatsoever they thought meet and convenient for the Commonwealth, that they had liberty and strength enough both as to Soldiers, and money also the nervs of War; but as for her self, she could look to nothing, her body being now spent; and shortly after she breathed her last, having reigned nine years, and lived 73. A woman of wisdom, courage, and industry above her sex, and who in the whole course of her government could not be drawn (for the generality) from moderation, justice, and honesty. But whereas she looked more at the present than future times, seemed to side with the Enemies of her house, and to have made the Kingdom naked of fit Rulers, after her death the effects of her mal-administration was felt by her family, which came into such misfortunes, as it miscaried and fell from that power, wherein she had laboured and taken so much pains to establish it.

13. For Hyrcanus having entered upon the High-Priesthood in the third year of the 177 Olympiad, Q. Hortensius, and Q. Metellus Creticus being Consuls, his brother Aristobulus now presently made Warre upon him. A battel being fought near Jericho, most of Hyrcanus his Soldiers revolted to the other, whereby he was forced to betake himself into that Castle where Aristobulus his wife and children were kept, and he now made his conditions to be suffered to live quietly a private life, remitting to his brother the Kingdom and Principality, changing estates with him, he removing into Aristobulus his private house, and Aristobulus to the Court, which covenant was solemnly sworn to, and confirmed in the Temple. But not long did this agreement hold, being broken by the means of Antipater, who being Governour at that time of Idumæa, feared the power of Aristobulus, and therefore endeavoured his destruction, both by stirring up Hyrcanus and the most powerful of the Jews against him. The famousnesse of Herod son of this Antipater, causeth his original to be more enquired into. Nicolaus Damascus to flatter the said Herod, derived his pedigree from the chief of the Jews, which returned from Babylon; but Josephus denieth that, and reports him to have been an Idumæan born. * Others have delivered, that this Antipater, or Antipas, was the son of one Herod the Priest of Apollo's Temple at Ascalon, which City being invaded by the Idumæan thieves, he was taken with other spoils out of the Temple; and whereas his father was

He profeſſed to the Jews that it was unjuſt, that Ariſtobulus ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy his uſurped power, from which he had caſt down his elder brother, and had deprived him of the prerogative of his age. The ſame things he often inculcated into Hyrcanus, adding withall, that his life was in danger, except he would in good time ſave himſelf by flight, for that the friends of his brother ſtill conſulted, how they might rid him out of the way, and eſtabliſh the Kingdom upon the other.

Being very great with the Arabian, he laboured to perſwade him to reſtore Hyrcanus, and with his importunity and gifts at length prevailed. Hyrcanus alſo promiſing, if by his means he ſhould recover the Kingdom, to reſtore to him that Country with the twelve Towns, which his Father Alexander had taken from him. Aretas being drawn in by theſe promiſes, undertook this Expedition with 50000 men, and overthrew Ariſtobulus, who being firſt forſaken of his followers, who now fled again to his brother, retired to Jeruſalem, where the Arabian and Hyrcanus beſieged him in the Temple. The Feaſt of the Paſſover hapning during the ſiege, the Priests who onely remained with Ariſtobulus, that the Sacrifices might not be omitted, bargained with the beſiegers for beaſts to be ſold them for that ſervice, but when they had let down the money from the walls, were derided by them. But this wickedneſſe the Hiſtorian obſerveth to have been puniſhed with great ſtorms and tempeſts, which procured extraordinary ſcarcity of Corn. To Hyrcanus bare witness 1000 Jews which Antipater had brought for that purpose, but to Aristobulus a Company of effeminate Gallants, ridiculous to all for their fantastick bravery. Pompey having heard them, and disapproved of Aristobulus his violence, dismissed them both kindly at present, promising he would come to them as soon as he had inspected the affairs of the Nabatheans, bidding them to be quiet in the mean time, and using Aristobulus civilly, lest he should stop up the passages. But hereby he won nothing upon him, for not expecting his promises, he went to Delium, and thence betook himself into Judæa.

16. Pompey being offended with this carriage of Aristobulus, took the Army which he had provided against the Nabatheans, and with other supplies out of Syria, and the Legions which were at his command followed him. Coming into Judæa, and hearing he was in a Castle near Coreas, he sent to him to come and speak him, which he obeyed, being advised by those about him to take heed of Warring with the Romans. When he had disputed the case with his brother, he returned to the Castle, and so he did divers times, willing to please Pompey, and pretending a willingness to obey him in all things, but providing still for the War, fearing the Principality might be bestowed upon Hyrcanus. Pompey in conclusion required him to deliver up into his hands the Garrisons, and write to the Governours of them for that purpose; which he obeyed also, but then presently departed to Jerusalem there to prepare for War. He followed him, and in the way heard how Mithridates of Pontus was killed by his son Pharnaces. His first nights quarters he took up at Jericho, where the Trees grew, that being cut distilled with the precious Balsamum; and the next day marching towards Jerusalem, Aristobulus forethinking what he had done, came and met him, offered him money, and referred himself to his pleasure, so that omitting War he would order things in a peaceable manner. He pardoning him, sent Gabinus to Jerusalem to fetch the money; but he being shut out by Aristobulus his Soldiers, returned empty handed, which Pompey taking in great disdain, committed Aristobulus to custody, and went himself to the Citie. There were two factions disagreeing from each other, that of Aristobulus brake down the bridge, which went out of the Citie to the Temple, and therein fortified themselves, whereupon the other let in the Romans into the Citie and Palace. Then did Pompey besiege the Temple, filled up with the great toyl of his Soldiers the Ditch before it, and then with Engines brought from Tyre battered the Wall, taking occasion at the superstition of the Jews, who thought it sinfull to do any thing on the Sabbath-dayes, but defend themselves. The greatest Tower being battered down, the Romans broke in (Cornelius Faustus the son of Sylla first entring the breach) and then made slaughter of 12000. the Priests even then (as they had done all the siege) not neglecting to offer sacrifices, and amongst the rest Abshalom the Uncle, and father-in-law of Aristobulus was taken, being the youngest son of Hyrcanus. Pompey with many followers entred into the Temple, and looked on those things, which it was unlawfull for any but the Priests to behold; yet touched nothing he saw, so great was his abstinency. The Temple was taken as Josephus tells us, in the third moneth, and the fast day, which was kept in memory of Jehoiakim's burning the Roll, in the 179 Olympiad, C. Antonius and *M. Alexander his son stirreth, but is defeated.

kept the Countrey-men from taking up Arms for Aristobulus. Then putting to death the Authors of the Sedition, he made the Jews Tributaries to the people of Rome, the Cities they held in Cælessyria he took away, and subjected them to a Governour of their own, and the whole Nation much elevated then with successe abroad, he contracted within its own bounds; Aristobulus & his brother being the cause of all these troubles, of the losing of the Countreys liberty to the Romans, who within a short time exacted above 10000 Talents of it. Pompey having left Syria to the Government of Scæurus, with two Legions hastied to Rome, leading Aristobulus bound thither with him, with two sons, and as many daughters. One of his sons escaped in the journey, and returned into Judea, where he got together a considerable power, and awed his Uncle Hyrcanus unable to resist him, and who, when now he was about to repair the Walls of Jerusalem, demolished by Pompey, was forbidden to do it by the Romans. But within a while Gabinus was sent from Rome to Govern Syria. He undertook the War against him, now having 10000 foot, and 1500 horse at his Command, but for all these he overthrew him not far from Jerusalem, killing and taking 6000 of them, and then besieged him in the Castle Alexandrium whither he had fled. Leaving here sufficient strength for carrying on the siege, he went and visited the Countrey, causing divers Cities to be re-edified, and then returning, and more powerfully inforcing the siege, Alexander yielded himself, and the Castles, which by his mothers advice to Gabinus were demolished, lest they should nourish another War. Gabinus then went to Jerusalem, and established Hyrcanus in the Priesthood, but cantonized the Countrey into five parts, which he ordered to be governed by an Aristocratical way. One division was to be governed by an Assembly at Jerusalem, another by one at Gadara, a third at Amathus, a fourth at Jericho, and a fifth by one sitting at Saphora a Town of Samaria. The Jews very gladly imbraced this Government. But Aristobulus not long after escaped from Rome, and coming into Judea ministred occasion of further trouble.

18. Coming into his own Countrey, he presently found some who out of desire of innovation sided with him, amongst the which was Pitholaus the Governour of Jerusalem, who revolted to him with 1000 men. He first seized upon Alexandrium, and went about to re-edifie the Walls thereof, but knowing that Gabinus had sent against him three of his Officers, he departed toward Macherus, dismissing the unarmed multitude, and making a choice of 8000 men. The Romans following he gave them battel, in which he fought stoutly, till his men being overpowered, 5000 of them were slain upon the place, almost 2000 fled to an Hill not far of, and a thousand with him, breaking through the Enemy to Macherus. There he thought to renew the War having fortified the place, but being besieged, and holding it out two dayes, he could no longer withstand, but was taken, and together with his son Aristobulus, (who it seems got away with him) sent back to Rome, where he was more narrowly looked to, but his sons, because Gabinus had so agreed with their mother, in consideration of the delivering up of the Castles formerly mentioned, were sent back by the Senate. Then prepared Gabinus an expedition against the Parthians, but passing over Euphrates, was hired by Ptolomy Auletes to reduce him into his Kingdom, as we said in the foregoing Chapter. In this voyage he used Hyrcanus, and especially Antipater, who furnished him with supplies, both of men and provisions, and prevailed with the Jews, inhabiting about Pelusium, to give him passage. But during his absence Alexander the son of Aristobulus made work enough for him after his return; for having gotten together a great multitude of Jews, he resolved to cut off all the Romans which inhabited those parts. Gabinus sent Antipater before to see if he could perswade the people to be quiet, and he effected it with many; but 20000 remaining still with Alexander, he came out and gave battel to the Romans, near the Mountain Isabyrius, wherein he lost 10000 men. Gabinus victoriously thence marched to Jerusalem, where serling things according to the pleasure of Antipater, he went against the Nabateans whom he overthrew in one battel, and dismissed Mithridates and Orsanes, two noble Parthians who had fled unto him, pretending an escape. Then returning to Rome, he left his Province to Crassus his Successor.

Crassus his sacrilege and punishment.

19. Crassus intending an expedition against the Parthians, came through that Countrey, and spoiled the Temple not onely of those 2000 Talents which Pompey had spared, but of all the Gold found there besides, which amounted to the sum of 8000 Talents more, though Eleazar the Treasurer had given him a beam of Gold weighing 900 pounds, and he had taken an Oath therewith to be satisfied, and abstain from the money. But going against the Parthians, he received the reward of his Sacrilege and Perjury, being slain. Cassius flying into Syria defended it from the incursions of the Enemy, and being come to Tyre visited also Judea, where at the first onset he took Taricheas, and therein 30000 Captives, which he laid away, and slew Pitholus the favourer of Aristobulus at the desire of Antipater, who now grew very considerable, having entred into Confederacy and Alliance with divers Princes, and especially with the Arabian, out of whose Countrey he had married a wife of noble extraction, by name Cypria, on whom he begot four sons, Phasaelus, Herod, Joseph, and Pheroras, and a daughter named Salome, which sons he also sent into Arabia, there to be kept whilest he was engaged in the War with Aristobulus. When Pompey was driven beyond the Ionian Sea, and Cesar had got Rome into his power, he set Aristobulus at liberty, and with two Legions sent him back into Syria, hoping that all that Countrey, and round about Judea, might be brought under by him; but he was prevented in his journey, being poisoned by those of Pompey's party, and lay in his own Countrey for some time unburied, being Embalmed, till by Antony he was sent to be buried in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors. This expedition proved fatal, not onely to himself, but his son Alexander also, who was beheaded by Scipio at Antioch by order from Pompey, being first arraigned before the judgement seat for his offences committed against the Romans. His brother Antigonus with his sisters were sent for by Ptolomy, the son of Mnæus (who held Chalcis under the Mountain Libanus) and courteously entertained. For Philippio his son being his Messenger, fell in Love with one of the sisters, named Alexandra, and married her, but his passion overcoming both reason and nature, he killed his son, and took the Lady to himself. By this time Pompey was slain; and then Antipater betook himself to Cesar, as his interest led him, and by his great industry purchased his favour.

20. Cesar vvarring with young Ptolomy in Egypt, after the death of Pompey, Antipater joyned with Mithridates of Pergamus, who went down thither with supplies; for whereas being hindred from coming to Pelusium, he was forced to stay about Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to help him, brought a supply of 3000 Jews himself, and procured divers Princes in Syria, as Ptolomy of Libanus, Jamblichus, and others, to send their men. Then at Pelusium did he special service, being the first that broke down the wall and entred; and whereas the Jews inhabiting the Countrey of Onias hindred them from going any further, he prevailed with them not to oppose, and more than that to furnish the Army with Provisions. At the battel at Delta he recovered the battel almost lost by Mithridates, and afterwards behaved himself very gallantly for Cesar, having received many wounds as the tokens of his valour. Some have delivered that Hyrcanus himself went down into Egypt, and there deserved well of Cesar, but whether it was so or not he endeavoured to requite them both. For, Antigonus the son of Aristobulus coming with a great complaint to him against them (whereas rather in policy he should have complained of the putting to death his father and brother through the procurement of Pompey and his faction) he declined his requests upon the reply of Antipater, confirmed Hyrcanus in the Priesthood, offered to Antipater what Government he would desire, and made him Procurator of Judea, gave him leave to rebuild the Walls of the Citie thrown down by Pompey, and caused these grants to be registered in the Capitol, and seconded them with divers decrees, both of himself and the Senate.

nate in favour of him and the Jews. Antipater then bringing Caesar on his journey as far as the borders of Syria, returned and built up the walls, and going about the Country, by threatenings and other policy, contained the People in obedience, otherwise ready to rebel. And whereas he saw Hyrcanus heavy and dull, and unfit to manage the affaires of Government, he made his son Phasaelus (who also commanded the Army) Captain of Jerusalem, and the Country adjacent, and committed Galilee to the custody of his second son Herod, being now extream young, as not exceeding fifteen years, as our Author telleth us, except, as is most probable, that number be mistaken for 25.

Herod the son of Antipater his notable forwardness.

21. Herod even at the very first gave testimony of what spirit and height of courage he would be, finding out presently occasion for the exercise of it. For at that time there being one Ezechias a notable Thief, who with a great company of followers used to infest the Country of Syria, he took and slew him with many others of that rout, which thing so endeared him to the Syrians, that his name was sung throughout the Towns and Villages, Peace being by his means restored as it were unto the Country, and the People unto their possessions; and thereby became he known to Sextus Caesar the President, and kinsman to the Dictator. Phasaelus his brother was hereby much stirred up to emulation, and most courteously behaved himself to those of Jerusalem, so that their Father was honoured by the People like a King, and yet notwithstanding preserved his fidelity intire to Hyrcanus. But divers of the chief of the Jewish Nation, understanding how he flourished both upon his own account and that of his sons, inwardly fretted thereat, and the rather, because he made use of Hyrcanus for his own ends, as they conceived, having contracted friendship with the great ones, and Rome, and perswaded him to send them money, yet getting to himself the credit and profit of the gift. But especially the forward and bold disposition of Herod affrighted them, whom they looked upon as a young and growing Tyrant, and therefore they grievously inveighed against Antipater to Hyrcanus, as one who caried away all the profit of the Kingdom, an empty name being onely left to himself, and laboured to bring him into suspicion, hinting, that ere long the vizard would be taken off, and he would dearly pay for the negligence of his own affaires. This they enforced by that bold act of Herod's killing Ezechias, and the rest, in contempt of the Laws, which suffer no man, how wicked soever, to be put to death, till he first be cast by the sentence of his Judges.

He is summoned to Jerusalem to answer for killing Ezechias a thief.

Hyrcanus though slow enough to believe any thing, yet having these things often sounding in his ears, together with the lamentations of the mothers of those that were slain, grew something moved, and summoned Herod up to Jerusalem, to give an account of his actions before the Judges.

He appeareth, but with a guard,

22. Herod having settled the affairs of Galilee, appeared, but with a guard, as his Father had writtent to him; yet with a moderate one, lest taking care for his own safety, he should affright Hyrcanus. Sextus Caesar hearing of it, threateningly wrote to Hyrcanus for to quit him, which he was inclinable enough unto, loving him as his own son; and when he appeared to answer, nobody durst accuse him, except one Sameas bolder than the rest, who inveighed against him for the manner of his appearance, not suitable at all to humility or guilt. The meeting being encouraged by his words, had certainly condemned him, had not Hyrcanus foreseen it, and sent him out of the way on purpose, having put off the determination to the next day. Herod retired therefore to Damascus, and afterwards visiting Sextus Caesar, and settling his affaires, plainly gave out, that he would no more appear thought he were cited, at which they at Jerusalem fretted, and sought to perswade Hyrcanus that all this tended to his ruine, and indeed he was convinced of it, yet could he do nothing, for that innate dulnesse which evermore accompanied him, though shortly after hearing that Herod having purchased of that Caesar the Government of Calesyria, he feared he would imploy his power against him. And indeed so it hapned; for disdaining now that he had been commanded to come and plead his cause, he marched towards Jerusalem with an Army, and if his Father and Brother had not met him, and shewed him the uncertainty of the event of War, and that he was rather beholding to Hyrcanus for discharging him, than had reason to be angry with him, for being as it were forced by others to summon him up, he had made mischief enough: But being prevailed with by them, he thought it was sufficient for him to have made a shew of his power, and so retreated. About this time Cecilius Bassus in favour of Pompey made away Sexius Caesar, and got his Army to submit to him; but divers of Caesar's party came to revenge his kinsman's death, and a War ensued about Apamea, whither Antipater, mindful of the benefits received from Caesar, sent his sons with aid unto his Captains. The Warre being drawn out in length, Marcus, (or rather L. Statius Marcus) was sent to succeed Sexius, and in the mean time Julius Caesar was slain in the Senate house, which as it bred disturbance and trouble to the whole Roman Empire, so neither did Judea escape without it's portion thereof.

22. A Civil War ensuing, the chief Captains on both sides runing up and down to provide themselves for it, Cassius one of the conspirators came into Syria, where raising the siege at Apamia, he drew both Mureus and Bassus to his own party, and then conquering the Country, levied men, and exacted grievous contributions: But especially he afflicted Judea, laying a taxe of above 700 Talents of silver upon it. Antipater committed the raising of the money to his two sons and others, whereof Herod first of all raised that which was imposed upon Galile, and brought it, thinking it good policy to purchase the favour of the Romans at the cost of others. Divers Cities with their Inhabitants were sold to make up the sum, amongst which were principal, Gophna, Emaus, Lydia, and Thamna; and Cassius having done this, was further so enraged, that he had slain Malichus also one of the Collectors, had not Hyrcanus by the means of Antipater, stopped his mouth with 100 Talents of his own money. But Antipater was badly rewarded by Malichus, for after the departure of Cassius he laid in wait for his life, thinking, that he being removed out of the way, the greater security would happen to the affairs of Hyrcanus. Antipater getting knowledge of his intention, passed over Jordan, to provide himself to revenge this treachery; but he being a most crafty dissembler, souldenied the matter with oaths to his two sons, that they reconciled him to their Father, who by his intercession then saved him, when Marcus the President of Syria upon the report of his attempting new matters, had resolved his death. But he preserved him to his own destruction. For, his son Herod for his good service being made Procurator of Syria by Cassius, with promise also of the Kingdom of Judea, if he got the better, Malichus then so feared him, that he resolved to make him away, which within a short time he effected, procuring him to be poisoned by Hyrcanus his brother, and getting a Company of Soldiers to him, invaded the Government of the City. This was the end of Antipater, a right good man, a great States-man, and one who had preserved his fidelity to his Prince, and his care to his Country, before his own private or ambitious purposes.

24. His sons having knowlege of his death, Herod would have revenged it out of hand, and by open force, but Phasaclus thought good rather to circumvent the murderer by some way of his own, lest a civil Warre should ensue, and therefore seemed to be satisfied with Malichus his flat denial of the thing, and set himself about building of a monument for his Father. Herod visiting Samaria, and seeing it much out of order, laboured what he might to cherish it, and sate in Judgement; deciding the controversies of the People, and then presently came up to Jerusalem to the Feast with a Company of Soldiers at his heels. Malichus being exceedingly afraid of his coming, perswaded Hyrcanus not to permit him to enter, and he accordingly forbad him to approach so holy a solemnity with a prophane rout of strangers; but he notwithstanding this, got in by night, and so affrighted Malichus that he betook him to his old trade of dissembling, weeping to him bitterly for the death of Antipater as his kind friend, yet in the mean time providing viding himself of a guard, so that for a time it was thought fit by Herod's friends, not to convince his deceit, but for the shunning of suspicion to treat him fairly; yet did he signify by letters his Father's death to Cassius, who willed him again to revenge it, and gave order to the Tribunes then lying at Tyre to assist him in his just endeavours. Cassius not long after having taken Laodicia, they went and carried him crowns and money, and then Herod thought to be even with him; but he suspecting something at Tyre, out of desperation cast higher matters than ever in his head. For his son being kept hostage in that City, he resolved to go in, and carry him out by stealth into Judea, and then, when Cassius should be engaged in the War against Antony, to solicit that Country to revolt, and get to himself the Principality, and cast out Hyrcaus. But the cunning of Herod prevented him, who being aware of his project, invited him and Hyrcaus to supper, and then sent to the Tribunes to come out to meet him, who remembering the commands of Cassius, encountering him on the shoar, slew him there. Hyrcaus was so astonished with fear at the fact, that he was not himself, and scarce recovering his sense, asked Herod who had slain Malichus; to whom one of the Tribunes answered, the command of Cassius, at which he replied, that Cassius had preserved both him and his Country, by cutting off him that plotted the destruction of both. Whether he spake this seriously, or approved the thing out of fear, is uncertain; but thus Herod revenged his Father's death upon Malichus.

25. Cassius being gone out of Syria, there hapned a great stir at Jerusalem by means of Falix, who being left there Commander, the Soldiers attempted violence upon Phasaelus, intending by his death to revenge that of Malichus upon his brother Herod. It hapned that at that time Herod living at Damascus with Fabius the Roman Captain, was sick, and unable to come and help his brother, but he by himself was too hard for Falix, and forced him into a Tower, whence he let him go with his life, and then expostulated much with Hyrcaus, objecting ingratitude to him for taking Falix his part, and suffering the brother of Malichus to seize upon divers Castles; for now he held many, and Massada amongst the rest, the strongest of all. But Herod after his recovery regained them all from him, suffering him to depart quietly out of Massada upon his desire. Antigonus the son of Aristobulus about this time so bribed Fabius, that he suffered him to get himself an Army, and Ptolomy Minneus because of the former affinity betwixt them, made him his son in Law, Marionallo, who by Cassius his means had subjected Tyre, and divers places of Syria, came in to his help, having seized upon three Castles in Galile, but Herod also going against them, had them all surrendered by the Tyrans, whom he dismissed very graciously, out of respect to their City, and then marched against Antigonus, whom being scarcely entred the Coasts of Judea he overthrew. Returning to Jerusalem he was received very honourably, not onely by the People, but Hyrcaus also, who had of late received him into his family, contracting him to Mariamne the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and his own niece by his daughter; by which wife he was made a father of three sons and two daughters, having on a former wife (and his own Country-woman) named Doris, begotten Antipater his eldest son. But now within a while Cassius and Brutus were overthrown at Philippi by Cesar and Antony, of whom the former returning into Italy, the other came over into Asia, which gave occasion to new stirs in Judea.

26. Antony being come into Bithynia, Ambassadors were sent to him thither from all Countries, and amongst the rest came some from the chief of the Jews, to complain of Phasaelus and Herod, who usurped, as they said, all the power, an empty title being onely left to Hyrcaus. Herod went to defend himself, and so prevailed with his money, that his accusers were never heard. Antony having reached Ephesus, an Ambassie was dispatched to him in the name of Hyrcaus, and the whole Nation, desiring that all Captives which Cassius had carried away out of Judea, might be set at liberty by

by his Letters published throughout the Province, which he readily granted out, and as he was travelling into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, to whose allurements wholly giving up himself, at the same time came 100 of the most considerable of the Jews to complain again of the two brothers, whom Messala defended, and Hyrcanus himself stood by to assist. Their cause being heard at Daphne, Antony demanded of Hyrcanus whether part was fitter to Govern, who answering in commendation of Herod, he, who formerly loved the young men for their fathers sake with whom he had contracted familiarity when he served in Egypt under Gabinus, constituted them both Tetrarchs, and committed to them the Government of the Jews. To this purpose he wrote Letters, and cast fifteen of their adversaries into prison, and had put them to death, had not Herods intercession prevailed for them; and yet were they not discouraged so as to desist. For instead of 100. a thousand returned in Ambassage, and stayed for him at Tyre, but his favour being further purchased by the two brothers, he commanded the Magistrate of that place to animadvert upon them, and assist Herod in obtaining the principality. Herod going to them as they stood before the Citie on the shore, advised them to withdraw themselves, and Hyrcanus also laid before them in how great danger they were if they should go on in their purpose: But they contemning their advice were presently fallen upon out of the Town by their own Countrey-men and the Inhabitants, and part of them being slain, and some taken, the rest returned. And the people clamoring exceedingly against Herod, Antony was so far incensed, as he caused those whom he had before committed to custody to be slain.

Which end in the promotion of Herod, and his brother Phasaelus.

27. A year or two after, Pacorus son to the King of Parthia, and Barzapharnes, one of his great Officers, seized upon Syria, at such time as Ptolemy Menneus dying, Lysanias his son succeeded him. Antigonus the son of Aristobulus bargained with the Parthians for 1000 Talents, and 500 women, to settle him in the Kingdom of Judea, and kill Herod with his friends; and though he could not perform the conditions, yet lead they down an Army to re-establish him. Pacorus came down to the Sea-Coasts, where he was excluded by the Tyrians; but they of Sidon and Ptolemais giving him entrance, he sent a party of horse under the conduct of one Pacorus the Kings Butler into Judea to make discoveries, and if it could be, to help Antigonus, with whom the Jews inhabiting Carmel joyning, he hoped by this force to seize upon a part of the Countrey called Dryma, and divers still coming in pierced to Jerusalem. The number still increasing, they attempted the Palace, but the two brothers with their friends opposing themselves, beat them back into the Temple, and then sent some Soldiers into certain houses near adjoyning to defend them, which the people taking notice of, set them on fire, and therein burnt them alive, being unable to shift for themselves; which injury Herod a little after revenged upon his adversaries, of whom he slew many upon a Sally. Daily skirmishes thence ensued, Antigonus his party staying for the feast of Pentecoste, expecting then a great multitude of people to come up from all parts, and accordingly at the day many thousands being assembled, what with Arms, and what without, they overran all, except the Palace which still Herod and his brother Phasaelus kept with a few Soldiers, with whom also issuing out into the Suburbs, having there fought most manfully, he put many thousands to flight. Shortly after, Antigonus procured Pacorus the Parthian with a few horse-men to enter Jerusalem, under pretence of composing the difference, but indeed to establish him in the power, who being kindly met by Phasaelus, and entertained, he perswaded him to go in ambassage to Barzapharnes, thereby intending to entrap him. He suspecting nothing, went contrary to the mind of his brother, who advised him rather to destroy the perfidious Barbarians, and with him went also Hyrcanus (an unheard-of employment for the Prince himself) under conduct of Pacorus.

Idem de bello ut prius cap. 11. Et Antiquit. cap. 24.

gave them gifts, but presently sought how he might entrap them. Phaselus was lodged with his Train near the Sea, where hearing that Antigonus had made such a bargain with the Parthians, as is above related, began to suspect them, and then he had also intelligence, that they would be laid in wait for by night, and be privately secured; and certainly they had been taken ere now, but that there was great expectation, that the Parthians which Pacorus had left at Jerusalem, should take Herod, and thereupon the thing was deferred, lest coming to his ears, he should have notice of their Treachery, and thereby escape it. Shortly after, his fears were confirmed when he saw a Guard coming to secure him, whereupon there were not wanting some that advised him to mount, and save himself by flight, especially one Osilus, who had the secret revealed to him by Saramalla the most wealthy amongst the Syrians, who now also voluntarily offered him ships to save himself. But he refused to forsake Hyrcanus and his brother, and going to Barzapharnes, blamed him for harbouring such designs, told him, if he wanted money, he might have more from him than Antigonus, and how base a thing it was to betray Ambassadors, innocent, and who had been drawn out upon the score of his own faith. The Parthian swore there was no such matter, and that he troubled himself with vain suspicions, and presently got him out to Pacorus; but he being gone, straightway hands were laid on Hyrcanus, and Phaselus, in vain upbraiding the Barbarians with perjury; an Eunuch also was dispatched to Jerusalem to get Herod by some means or other out of the Walls, and apprehend him. Phaselus had sent to make known his condition to him, but the Messengers were intercepted, which he having knowledge of, had a conference with the Chief of the Parthians then at Jerusalem, who by all means laboured to get him out of the Palace. But he suspecting them, and giving no credit at all to their words, presently heard for certain of his brother's Captivity, and seeing them in doubt what to do against him, resolved to shift for himself, and taking the opportunity of the evening, departed with his relations that night, unknown to the Enemy.

29. He travelled towards Idumaea, whither at length he came to Massada the Castle; but as his departure was sad, so his journey was as dangerous, being pursued by the Parthians, whom following behind his Train he kept off, and was opposed also more violently by the Jews, over whom yet he got a victory, and afterwards in memorial of it built a sumptuous Palace in the same place. Once his mothers litter was overturned in the way, with which she being brought into danger of death, and he fearing the Enemy might overtake them, he drew out his sword to kill himself, and had done it, but that the next to him interposing themselves hindred it, shewing him how it was not the part of a valiant man to forsake others, by setting himself at liberty, as they termed it. After he came to the Borders of Judaea, his brother Josaph met him, and perswaded him to dismiss the most of his followers, because the Castle could not harbour them, which he did to the number of 9000 and above, giving them money to bear their charges, and taking the ablest Soldiers, whom he had culled out from amongst the rest, with his relations, to the number of 800. he marched on to Massada, and there placed them, where no sort of Provisions was wanting; but he himself held on for Petra in Arabia, hoping of that King, who was such a friend of his father, to obtain help for the recovery of his brothers liberty. But the Parthians after his departure from Jerusalem plundered the Citie and Palace, and wasted the Countrey, in wick they destroyed Marisa a wealthy Town, and so reducing Antigonus into Judaea, delivered up Hyrcanus and Phaselus into his hands, who was grievously troubled that the women had escaped, which he intended together with the money to have given to the Parthians.

30. Then fearing that Hyrcanus by the favour of the people might again be restored to the Kingdom, he either cut or bit off his ears, making him thereby incapable of the Priesthood, which by the Law was not given, but to one of an entire body. But Phaselus knowing he was destined to death, for that he could not otherwise kill himself for his bonds dashed out his brains against a stone. It was reported, that being grievously wounded in his head, Antigonus caused poyson to be put into it instead of salve; and that he heiring before his death that his brother Herod had escaped, underwent it chearfully, as leaving behind him a revenger of it. And he certainly knowing nothing thereof, laboured exceedingly to prevent it, going to Malchus the Arabian, whom he knew to be obliged to his family, hoping of him to get money, either upon free gift or trust, and resolving to give 300 Talents for his brothers Ransom, whose son also a Child of seven years old he carried with him to leave as a pledge. But the Arabian being perswaded by his great ones to retain the money owing, with the goods which Antipater had deposited with him, sent some to meet him, and command him to depart from his borders, and after he was gone repented of what he had done, and sent after him, but too late. For he was now almost got into Egypt, hearing of his brothers death in the way, where Cleopatra kindly entertained him, intending to use him in her Wars; but nothing could hinder him from halting to Rome, though in the Winter season, and though great fairs were reported to be in Italy, whither also he came, though with great danger, for the difficulty of Navigation.

Being rejected by the Arabian, he goeth to Rome.

31. He came thither when not long before there had been an agreement made betwixt Antony and Cesar the Triumvirs (the former having married Octavia sister to the later) and another betwixt them two and young Pompey, who then held Sicily, which was a time convenient enough for his affairs. He made his application to Antony, of whose favour he had formerly tasted, recounting to him the whole story of the Parthians overrunning Judea, of his brothers death, and the misery of his family now besieged in a Castle, and how through these Tempests both at Sea and Land, he had ventured to come to him as his onely harbour and refuge; and withall was not sparing in the offering of money to him, in case he could procure him to be declared King of Judea. Pity wrought something with Antony (being backed with the memory of that friendship which had passed betwixt Antipater and himself) the money more, and to these being superadded an hatred of Antigonus, whom he accounted a turbulent man, and one that bore a mind full of hatred towards the Romans, he much inclined to favour him. Cesar also, partly for that Antipater had done good service for his adoptive father in Egypt, and because he was willing to gratifie Antony, was ready to do him all good Offices, being also inclined to favour him out of a particular phancy he had to the man for his courage. The Senate therefore being called, first Messala, and then Atratinus commended him to the fathers, relating his father's, and then his own merits towards the Commonwealth; and withall they accused Antigonus, and inveighed against him as an Enemy, for that he had not onely born himself as such heretofore, but now of late in the calling in of the Parthians. Herewith the Senate being offended, Antony then declared to them that it would much conduce to the carrying on of the Parthian War, which was now depending, if Herod should be King; so that without any more to do, he was so declared by the unanimous consent of all, and then being accompanied into the Capitol by Cesar and Antony on each hand, the Consuls going before, there sacrificed, and according to the custom, laying up the decree of the Senate, was feasted by Antony. Thus obtained he the Kingdom with the wonder of himself as well as others, through the especial friendship of Antony, having ever feared that the Romans would never consent he should have that honour which was not wont to be bestowed, but upon a royal race, and therefore he intended to have sued for it, not for himself but for Alexander, brother to Marianne his wife; and this increased the wonder, that within seven dayes he should be dispatched and dismissed out of Italy. But thus obtained he the Sovereignty of Judea, A. M. 3965. in the first of the 185 Olympiad, Domitius Calvinus the second time, and C. Asinius Pollio being Consuls, some 37 years before the birth of Christ.

Cap. 26.

A. M. 3965.

32. During his absence, Antigonus laid close siege to the Castle of Massada, where he left his relations, abounding with all sorts of provisions; only water was wanting; so that Joseph had thoughts of flying with 200 men into Arabia, the King whereof he had now heard to have repented of the rejecting of his brother. But this was prevented by a shower which fell by night, as if sent on purpose from Heaven for their relief, whereupon they were so heartened, as to sally out upon the besiegers, whereof they cut off many. In the mean while Ventidius the Roman General being sent into Syria to expel the Parthians thence, after their retreat, came into Judea, pretending to help Joseph, but indeed with intentions to fleece Antigonus of a round sum of money, which he did, pitching his tents nigh to Jerusalem, which being done, he drew off the greater part of his forces, and left Silo with a party behind him, lest the fraud should be understood, whom Antigonus was also to pacifie till such time as the Parthians could come and help him. But in the mean time Herod landed at Ptolemais, and having got together no mean company, hastened through Galilee against him. To Silo and Ventidius Antony had sent expresse order by Gellius, to place him in the Kingdom. Ventidius was then busie in composing differences amongst the Cities, which the incursion of the Parthians had made: Silo was in Judea, but corrupted by Antigonus. Yet Herod's Forces increasing, he marched towards Massada to relieve his friends, which he accomplished, having first taken Joppe in his way, notwithstanding the lying in wait against him by Antigonus, after which having taken in also the Castle Ressa, he went up to Jerusalem, accompanied by Silo's Soldiers, and many Citizens affrighted at his power. Laying siege to the City, both he and Antigonus laboured to draw over the contrary parties to themselves, and though Herod could not at all move the Townsmen, yet it appeared that Silo was corrupted; for he suborned some of his Soldiers to begin a mutiny, requiring to be led into a place more plentiful of provisions, which Antigonus had all cut off; but Herod took such care for the bringing in of new, that his plot was frustrated, and taking out a party of ten Companies (half Jews and half Romans) went and took Jericho, forsaken of its Inhabitants, which he left to be rifled to the Romans. Then returning, he sent down the rest of their Army into their Winter quarters, which he appointed in Idumaea, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also obtained of Silo to have part of his men received into Lydda, thereby endeavouring to curry favour with Antony; so that the Romans lay idle all this season in places abounding with all necessaries.

33. Herod was not idle, but sending his brother Joseph into Idumaea with 1000 Foot and 400 Horse, went down into Galilee to reduce some places there held by Antigonus; and within a short while brought all the Country into obedience, except those men that lurked in caves, and then dividing to his Soldiers 150 drachmes a man, placed them also in their Winter quarters. Silo a little after came to him, being cast off by Antigonus, who had ordered the Inhabitants to take all necessaries with them, and flee into the mountains, that so the Romans might be starved. Ventidius being now engaged in Syria against the Parthians, sent to Silo to come to him when he had with Herod finished the War. But Herod having no confidence in him, dismissed him beforehand, and went himself against the Thieves, who dwelling in caves with their families in craggy and inaccessible rocks, he was fain to invent certain cages, which being let down to the sides of the rocks full of armed men, either slew them or tumbled them down headlong out of their holes, or else burnt them within, and by this means he subdued them all. Then setting Ptolomy over that Country, he marched into Samaria, but was presently forced to return, for Ptolomy being set upon by those who formerly had disturbed Galilee, was slain, and then they betook themselves into the fens and inaccessible places, and thence making excursions, robbed all the Coasts thereabouts; but he returning punished them, pulled down their places of strength, and fined the Cities 100 Talents. In the mean while Ventidius having slain Pacorus, and put the Parthians to flight, by Antonius his command sent Macharus to help Herod, with two Legions, and 1000 Horse; but he being corrupted also by Antigonus, would needs go to him as a spie against Herod's will; Yet when he went could not be received, but was laid at with darts, so that repenting he had not followed Herod's advice, he went and secured himself in Emmaus, killing all the Jews that came in his way, without any difference of friend or enemy, out of madnesse for what had happened unto him. Herod being hereat enraged, resolved to go and complain to Antony, but he entreated him to stay, or if he went, however to leave Joseph with him to carry on the War against Antigonus, which later he granted, yet charging his brother not to venture all, nor contend with Macharus. Then hasted he to Samosata upon the river Euphrates, before which Antony then lay, leading Auxiliaries with him both Horse and Foot. At Antioch he met with many, that having a design to go thither, durst not for the Barbarians, who lying in the wayes, made great slaughters of travellers, but he taking the conduct of them upon him, stoutly defended them against the violence of the robbers, and with great credit for his valour safely arrived at the Camp of Antony.

Goeth to Antioch.

24. Antony to do him honour, sent out an Army to meet him, with great praises and embraces received him at the Camp, and gave him great respect, as a King of his own setting up. Shortly after his arrival Antiochus yielded up the place, and then Antony committing the Province to Sosius, and commending to him the affairs of Herod, went away back into Egypt. In the mean while Joseph neglecting his brothers counsel, was slain in Judea, and great innovations followed in that place and in Galile; which Herod understanding, being sent before by Sosius with two Legions, lying at Daphne the Suburbs of Antioch, marched into Galile, where he worsted the Enemy, and took the Castle they fled into, whence hasting to Jerieho, he there feasted the chief Inhabitanres in a room, which upon his departure to his chamber presently fell down, whereupon he was accounted to be especially owned by God, who had so wonderfully preserved him. Not long after he got five Towns into his hands, wherein he put to the sword 2000 of the Garrison Soldiers, and then went against Pappus, whom Antigonus had sent into Samaria in a vain ostentation, as able to wage War in both places. Pappus gave him batrel very boldly, but he overthrew him, and in revenge of his brothers death did great execution, whereby Antigonus his interest was clearly broken, and he thought of quitting the City, had the weather suffered the King to improve the Victory, and make an end of the War. At night Herod being weiry, he went to wash in a chamber, where one boy onely was with him, and therein chanced to be divers armed men of the Enemy, who though they might have easily dispatched him then naked, yet were they so affrighted, as they gladly got out and saved themselves by flight. The extremity of the weather being over, he went up to Jerusalem and laid siege to it in the third year after he had been declared King at Rome, intending to use the same manner of opposition as Pompey had made formerly against the Temple. But during the siege he went to Samaria, and there married Mariamne daughter to Alexander and niece of Aristobolus, formerly contracted to him. The marriage being over he returned, and Sosius came also through Phenicia up to Jerusalem, so that both carryed on the siege with an Army consisting of eleven Legions, and 6000 Horse. The defendants with great earnestnesse and courage made resistance, contermining, and sometimes fighting with the Enemy in the ground, though much straitned for provissions, it being the Sabatical year.

35. Force at length prevailed, joyned with skil, in both which the Romans excelled, so that after five moneths twenty of the stoutest Soldiers, and then Sosius his Centurion got over, and the outward part of the Temple with the lower side of the City were taken, and at length the other also, where all were full of slaughters, the Romans being enraged by the rediousefneffe of the War, and the Jews out of malice and particular grudges seeking to destroy all of the contrary Faction. Antigonus came and fell on his knees before fore Sofius, who received him with reviling speeches, calling him Antigona. Herod had much adoe to keep the Soldiers from entering the secret places of the Temple, and to restrain them from slaughters, demanding of Sofius if the Romans intended to make him King of a desert, and adding, that he should think the price of all that blood which was spilt to be very little, though the Dominion of all the World should come into the bargain, and at length was fain to redeem the City from further trouble by his own money, where-with he dismissed the Romans sufficiently enriched. This disaster befel Jerusalem in the Consulship of M. Agrippa, and Canidius Gallius, and the last of the 185 Olympiad, the third moneth, in the fast, and on the same day it had been taken by Pompey 27 years before. Sofius consecrating a crown of gold to God, went away with Antigonus unto Antony. But Herod fearing that Antony carrying him to Rome, he should there obtain favour with the Senate, as being of the Royal race, and procure the Kingdom at their hands, if not for himself, yet for his children, who never had ill deserved of the People of Rome, he procured Antony to dispatch him out of the way, who pretending at least the unquienesse of the Jews for his sake, caused him to be beheaded at Antioch. And so the Principality of the Asmonaeans ceased, after it had endured free from the yolk of Syria 98 years; and Herod a man of forein and obscure birth was confirmed in the Sovereignty over Judea by the Romans, in the Empire of whom we shall hear further of him.

The affaires of Sicilie Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

From the death of Timoleon to the Sicilian or first Punick War, containing the space of 73 years.

1. THe constitutions of Timoleon being Popular, and tending to the loose liberty of the Vulgar, which was destitute of lawfully successive Princes, Sicilie continued not in Peace many years, being of all other places, through want of lawful Monarchs, most subject to the ambition and tyranny of those, who, though private Citizens, through flattery and deceit enslaved their neighbours. Amongst the rest Agathocles is most eminent; none that ever in any time went before him, coming up to him, or, reaching him by far in cunning and cruelty. He was the son of one Carcinus a Potter, and brought up by his father in that trade of life, who being banished from Rhegium in Italy his native soil, came into Sicilie, and placed himself at Therme at that time subject to the Carthaginians. Before he was born, and when his mother was yet great with him, the Delpick Oracle foretold, that he should be the author of great calamities to the Carthaginians, and also to all Sicilie, and for that cause he was exposed by his father, but preserved by his mother, and reserved to such a time unknown to him, as he repenting of what he had done, gladly understood from her of his safety. Being then again received by his father, he was brought up in the trade of a Potter, and was but young when Timoleon overthrew the Carthaginians at the River Cremissus, and made all free of Syracuse that would come thither. He was then with his father admitted into that City, and not long after his father died, but one Damas a chief Citizen being extraordinarily affected towards him for his comeliness, gave him whereon sufficiently to live, and afterwards being created the Captain of the Agrigentines, bestowed on him the place of a Colonel in the Army, for that he was wont formerly in musters to wear those arms which none else could bear for their bignesse. But now being advanced to this degree, he rendered himself more popular by his bold adventures, and his making speeches often to the people, and Damas dying, he married his Widow, whereby he got abundance of wealth. Afterwards it happening that Crotone being beleagued by the Bruttii, they of Syracuse sent relief thither, which amongst other Captains was conducted by his brother Aurander, and he himself by decree of the people had also the Office of a Colonel. But the Chief command was committed to Heracles and Sosistratus, the later of which out of envy defrauded him of the rewards of his valour, which he now abundantly shewed, whereat he was so enraged, as to accuse him and his Companions to the people of affecting the Tyranny, but they giving no credit to his words, Sosistratus after his return seized on the Principality. Agathocles then for some time continued in Italy, and endeavouring to get Crotone into his power, failed of his Enterprize, and withdrew himself to Tarentum.

2. He was received into pay amongst the Mercenaries, but being suspected to attempt new matters, was not long after again cashiered, after which getting together a Company of Italian Fugitives, he relieved Rhegium, then set upon by Sosistratus and Heracles, and then Sosistratus being banished Syracuse, together with his Authority, returned thither, where sometimes a private person, otherwiles an Officer, he valiantly behaved himself against the Tyrant's faction, in which the Carthaginians, and a great number of the chiefest Citizens were engaged. Having once broke into the Citie Gela, and there being overmatched by Sosistratus and the Towns-men, so that he and his party were all of them in danger to be cut off, he sent his Trumpeters round about to the Walls, commanding them to sound an Allarm, whereby it came to passe (as he intended) that the Enemy thinking the besiegers had broken in from all quarters, retired from him to repulse them, and so he safely retreated this Sconce. This businesse of Sosistratus being over, and Acessorides the Corinthian Created General of the Syracusians, Agathocles was suspected because of his politic head, to affect the Tyranny; yet Acessorides would not take him of publicly, for raising new stirs, but commanding him to depart the Citie, sent some to ly in wait, & kill him in the way; which he suspecting, sent out a young man very like himself, with his Cloths, Horse, and Armour, and in a disguised habit travelled through by-ways, so that he devolved the danger upon the head of another, and escaped. Afterwards the Exiles of Sosistratus his faction being received, and a peace made with the Carthaginians, he lived as an outlaw within the Country, but gathering together considerable forces, proved so formidable to his own Citizens, and their new Allies, that they sought to him themselves to return, and having brought him into the Temple of Ceres, there took an Oath of him not to be against the popular Government. Making a shew then of Patronizing Democracie, he so inveigled the people by his fair speeches and cunning pretences, that he was constituted General, and keeper of the Peace, till such time as the differences then on foot, through the restitution of the Exiles, should be composed; and then having obtained his wished for opportunity, the Army being at his beck, and under pretence of opposing some, who at Erbia had lately revolted, sufficient occasion being taken to increase his strength, he marched out as against the Rebels, and unired unto him 3000 men, some whereof had formerly served him against the Carthaginians, and were most addicted to himself, and adverse both to the people in general, and the 600 who now had the power in their hands, after the Aristocracie was taken away. With these, and certain Syracusians, who being poor themselves envied the wealth of others, he strengthened himself, and accusing the 600 to the Soldiers as having plotted against him, procured them easily to be taken for Enemies, and causing an Allarm to be sounded, commanded the Army to march to the Citie, and there to kill the Malignants, and take the spoyl of them and all their party.

iny, but according to the riches or poverty of the persons, and many running out into the streets to know what the matter was, were slain as they asked the question: all the Gates were shut that none might escape, so that 4000 by this means in one day perished. Many leaped down the Walls, of which some perished in the fall, but others to the number of 6000 escaped, of which most fled to Agrigentum, where they were courteously received, but sufficiently tormented in this respect, that their Wives and Daughters at home were abused by the Soldiers in revenge for their escape. Agathocles being glurred with a two dayes slaughter, gathered together the multitude of his Captives, of which he onely dismissed Dinocrates for his former friendship, but the rest he presently put to death or banished, and then calling the people together, grievously inveighed against the 600. and at the Aristocratical Government, and then mentioning what he had done to purchase the liberty of his Countrey, very formally laid down his Office, knowing certainly he should be solicited to take it up again. For, his Soldiers now made rich by other mens goods, would not endure that he, or his authority, should forsake them, but cried out he must take care of them, so that with much ado, as it seemed, he took upon him the Office of Chief Captain, but without a Colleague, being unwilling, as he said, to be called to an account for others breaking the Laws, when as he acted according to them; to which the people consenting, he was Created Captain General with full Authority by their suffrages.

A. M. 3688.

4. He carried it with all sweetnesse and moderation towards all them at the first, took great care for the Revenues, making of Arms, and increasing of the Fleet, and got several of the Inland Towns into his power. Having seized upon a Castle of the Messenians, he promised to restore it for 30 Talents; but after the receipt of the money, not onely refused to surrender it, but also endeavoured to take Messene it self, part of the Wall being fallen down, and though he failed herein of his Enterprize, yet besieged he Myla, and had the place surrendered to him, but the Carthaginians sending their Ambassadors, expostulated with him his breaking the League, and constrained him to give the Castle up again into the hands of the Messenians. The year after, the Exiles that lived at Agrigentum exhorting their entertainers not to suffer him thus to go on in his Conquests, and make a prey of their Towns; for that it was better now to set upon him before he had confirmed his Tyranny, than when he should be grown too strong for them, and to be forced to War with him against their Wills. This appearing to be but reason, the people decreed the War, and having entred into a strict Alliance with them of Gela and Messena, sent some of the Exiles to Lacedamon, thence to procure a General, suspecting the fidelity and moderation of their own Citizens, and calling to mind the worth of Timoleon. At that time was there in that Citie one Acrotatus son to Cleomenes the King, labouring under the envy of most of the youth, because the Lacedamonians having been overthrown by Antipater, who then Governed Macedonia (after the death of Alexander the Great) when such as returned from the defeat were acquitted by the people, he alone had opposed the decree. Being intraged hereat, they beat him, and laid in wait for his life, whereupon now desirous of some forein command, he easily accepted of this imployment, and without consent of the Ephori, with a few ships sayled to Agrigentum, yet did he nothing worthy, either of his family or Countrey, but proving more bloody and cruel than the Tyrants themselves, incurred the displeasure of the people. Giving himself up to all luxury, and therewith spending the publick renew, he murdered Sosistratus the Chief of the Exiles having invited him to supper, for nothing but out of emulation, whereupon he was deprived of his command, and had been stoned, but that he withdrew himself into his own Countrey. After his departure a composure was made by the interposition of Amilcar the Carthaginian, upon these terms, that of the Greek Cities Heraclea, Solinus; and Himera should continue under the power of the Carthaginians; but the rest, over which the Syracusanians had the Dominion, should be left to their own Laws.

5. The Island being hereby cleared of the Enemy's Forces, he securely laid divers Towns to his Dominions, and with the accession of many places to his former strength, sufficiently confirmed himself, having over and above his Syracusians, and Confederates, 10000 foot, and 3500 horse of Mercenaries in constant pay, and making Provision of all sorts of Ammunition, for that he foresaw, that the Carthaginians disapproving of the peace made by Amilcar, would within a short while renew the War: The year after seeing himself sufficiently furnished, he resolved then not to expect them, but begin himself; yet desiring first to clear his way, by removing whatever might hinder him from the neighbouring Cities, he first attempted Messene whither the Exiles of Syracuse had fled; and he first prevailed with them to expel these, and then to admit him into the Town, where he killed 600 of the chiefest of them, and most adverse to his power. Thence he went to Agigentum, thinking to make also a prey of it; but sixty ships of the Carthaginians with Forces having lately come thither, he forbore to attempt any thing, and drew his forces into the Territories of the Carthaginians, where he took in divers Castles. In the mean while Dinocrates the principal man amongst the Exiles sent to Carthage, desiring aid before Agathocles should reduce all Sicily into his power, and having gathered his Companions together, and raised a pretty Force, sent Nymphodorus to the Town of the Centorippini held then by Agathocles, but being promised to have it betrayed into his hands, under condition they should be left to their own liberty, He got by the night into the Town, but the Garrison having timely knowledge of it, cut him off, and all his followers which had entred, and Agathocles punished the Conspirators. But Dinocrates being called by the Inhabitants of Galaria, with 3000 foot, and 2000 horse marched thither, where Agathocles his faction being cast out, he pitched his Tents without the Town; but he sent two of his Captains against him with 5000 men, who at length put him, and his whole Army to flight, and recovering the place, animadverted upon the Revolters. Agathocles being elevated with this success, hearing the Carthaginians were seized on an Hill, marched thither, intending to fight them with all the power he could make, but they declining an engagement, in a Triumphant manner he returned unto Syracuse.

6. The year following, the Carthaginians shipped a great Army for Sicily under Conduct of Amilcar, a man of high Nobility; but such a Tempest seized on the Fleet, that 260 Vessels loaded with men and Provisions miscarried, which made them cover their Walls with black, as it was the custom upon some great and publick disaster. But Amilcar being an industrious man, gathering together the Relicks of the shipwrack, lifted more men after his arrival, and made up a compleat Army of 40000 foot, and well nigh 5000 horse. Agathocles perceiving himself too weak to encounter the Enemy at present, took care how to secure his Towns and Castles from revolting, and especially Gela, near to which the Enemy then lay. To send in a great party at once, he thought might awaken the Towns-men too much, and put them upon some attempt disadvantageous to himself, so that he got some Soldiers in at several times, till they amounted to a number too strong for the other, and then going thither, accused the Inhabitants of Treachery, and took occasion to make a Massacre of 4000 of them, the goods of whom he seized, with all the silver and Gold of those that remained. Then pitched he his Tents against the Carthaginians, encamped on an Hill where the Castle of Phalaris the Tyrant of old time was reported to be, whence it got the name of Ecnomos, i.e. wicked or unlawfull. A River ran betwixt the two Camps, concerning which a rumour having been of old time spread, that a great multitude of men should perish near unto it, this hindred both the Armies from ingaging, till such time as excursions being made on both sides, the Africans broke out of their Trenches to rescue the prey; which Agathocles foreseeing, had placed many men in ambush upon the River, who falling upon the Carthaginians, as they pursued their friends, drove them back, and with great slaughter gave the chase unto their Camps. Agathocles judging this a fit season for an engagement, arose with his whole Army, and fell upon them in their trenches, into which he brake, and there maintained for some time a hot dispute, till the Enemy repulsed him at that place, by help especially of Slingers, natives of the Islands Baleares, who being exercised after the fashion of that Country in slinging of stones, forced back the Syracusians, by throwing at them those of a pound weight. Yet he broke in in other places, and had almost done his work, when fresh supplies to the Enemy arrived out of Africk, which falling on him in his rear, turned the fate of the day clear against him, and put his men to flight, of which great execution was done by 5000 Africans that gave the chase, many also killing themselves by drinking over hastily, out of extremity of the heat which then raged through the influence of the Dog Star. So that he lost no fewer than 7000 men, 600 onely of the Carthaginians being slain.

Overthrew
Agathocles.

7. Agathocles getting together his straglers betook himself to Gela, having given out, that he determined for Syracuse with all speed, so that 300 Africans entering Gela, and fearing nothing, were all cut off by him. Then shut he himself up there, that the Carthaginians laying siege to the place, the Syracusians might have time enough to victual their City, and indeed Amilcar thought first of all to besiege it, but afterwards understanding what force was in it, changed his purpose, and took in several Towns and Castles, and behaved himself so lovingly, as many within a short time revolted to him. Agathocles then withdrew to Syracuse, which he furnished with all sorts of provisions for the enduring of a siege, intending to leave a party for defence thereof, and remove the War into Africk, by passing all his Army over thither. For, considering that the Carthaginians had almost got all Sicilie, and his confederates generally revolted to them (who were most potent now both at Sea and Land) he judged it (though the most venturous, yet) the safest way to invade the Enemy in his own Territories, which being a sudden and most unusual thing, he should daunt him therewith, and drive his Subjects into an open revolt, and force him to call back the Army out of Sicilie. Communicating therefore this purpose to no man living, he left Syracuse to the Government of his brother Antander, and severing all the relations of the City one from another, that no mutiny or sedition might arise in his absence (taking part of them along with him as hostages) he raised money by seizing the estates of Orphans into his hands (which he promised to restore when they should come to age) by borrowing money of Merchants, robbing of Temples; but especially by calling the People together, and acquainting them, how he was most ready to endure any hardship, but it pined him for the People: therefore he advised all that feared themselves and estates to depart, which when the richest and most out of favour had done, he procured them to be cut off, and confiscated all their goods. Then manumitting all slaves that were fit for the Wars, he shipped his men in sixty Vessels, and getting out into the Main whilst the Carthaginians knew not his design, escaped them by the darknesse of the night, and though they chased him all the way, yet arrived he in Africk with his Army in safety.

daunted,

8. Once arrived he burnt his ships, as well to take away from his Soldiers all hope of escape (thereby to heighten their valour) as also having no great Army, left for the defence of the Navy, it should be divided. Then fell he upon two Cities immediately, which he took (the Soldiers being encouraged at the sight of so pleasant and rich a Country) but suffered none of his Army to lye there, but destroyed the places, lest his men should relie upon them as a refuge. The Carthaginians were wonderfully daunted at the first report of his landing, concluding he durst not venture over, except he had first, by destroying their Army, made all sure in Sicilie, but understanding the whole affaires from some messengers sent from the Fleet, they gathered courage, blamed their Sea-officers, who having the Sea in their power, had suffered the Enemy to land, and made choice of two Captains, Hanno and Bomilcar, thinking that their enmity towards each other which had been in-tailed upon them, would prove the commodity of the Commonwealth; though indeed therein they were mistaken. These two Generals thought not fit to stay for their associates, but muster as many of their own Citizens as would make a shift, and so raising 40000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, with 2000 Chariots, they encounter the Enemy. Agathocles his men, many of them, wanting Arms, he made them counterfeit ones, to be so esteemed a far off, and perceiving them to be discouraged at the number of the Carthaginian Horse, he procured many Owls to be let go in the Camp, which birds being taken to bring alwaies good luck with them, the Soldiers were therewith so cheered, that they resolutely set upon the Enemy, and brake presently the body of Horse. The Chariots they drove for the most part back amongst the Foot, which they charged also with such resolution, that the wing where Hanno commanded was discomfited, and he himself slain. Romilcar his Colleague understanding this, having formerly wished for some good opportunity to invade the Tyranny (which the most eminent men of Carthage were many times forced to do, for the avoiding of those censures and punishments constantly inflicted upon them for the least miscarriage of fortune, by the heady rable) thinking now an occasion to be presented to him, as it were from Heaven, he resolved to take hold of it. And for that he thought it most convenient for him, that the Enemy should not be overthrown, but an awe continued upon his Citizens, he retreated by little and little, suffering the Sicilians to prevail, and at length drew off his men to an hill, whence they all fled as fast as they could to Carthage, having lost of their number 1000 men, and killed of the Greeks but 200.

9. The Carthaginians now shut up in their City, and besieged by Agathocles (though they had caried with them above 20000 pair of manicles in their Chariots to bind the Greeks, over whom they promised themselves an easie victory) very much discouraged, and laying the blame of the misfortune upon the neglect of their superstition, sent great gifts to Hercules the god of the Tyrrians, from whom they were issued, and for that they had redeemed their own children of late (by others gotten elsewhere) from being sacrificed to Saturn, they presently offered up to him 200 boyes of the chiefest amongst them for Nobility, being put into the hand of the Statue, and thence falling down into the hollow of it full of fire. They sent also to Amilcar into Sicilie for aid, who receiving the news, caused it to be given out, that all the Sicilian Army was cut off, and earnestly thereupon urged the besieged to a surrender of Syracuse, shewing them (to inforce the matter) the iron-work of the ships wherein the Army had passed over, which indeed the Carthaginians had taken up into their Vessels after the burning of the Fleet. But the chief men amongst the besieged stayed the rest from yielding, though Antander the brother of Agathocles was so faint-hearted, as to be for the delivering up the City, and cast 8000 of the contrary faction, and the friends of the exiles, out of the Town: But within a few dayes arrived a Gally from Agathocles, to give them knowledge of his successe, which being pursued by the Carthaginians, and the People flocking to the Haven to gaze, the walls were so forsaken, that Amilcar taking his opportunity, got some of his men over, but an Alarm being given, they were either slain, or forced headlong down the fortifications. Amilcar hereat discouraged, raised his siege, and sent a supply of 5000 men over to Carthage.

10. Agathocles in this mean while took divers places in Africk, and fortifying his Camp before Tunis (wherein he also left a strong Garrison) marched further and besieged Adrymis, and drew into society with him Elymus the King of the Africans. The Carthaginians having notice of this, turned all their forces upon Tunis, which they besieged, having first become Masters of his Camp; but he hereupon leaving a great part of his Army still before the Town, went with the rest to an high hill, whence he might easily be seen by both the Carthaginians that lay before Tunis, and also by the Inhabitants of Adrymis, and there making abundance of fires, deceived them by this stratagem at both places. For the besiegers thought he was coming with a great great Army to relieve Tunis, and therefore raised their siege out of hand, and departed to Carthage, the besieged of Adrymis out of a strong apprehension that new supplies were coming to the Enemy, yielded the Town. Then took hee Thapsus by storm, and divers other places, and having now got into his hands about 200 Towns, went higher up into Libya. The Carthaginians took another occasion at his absence to besiege Tunis, but he thereupon returned as before, but overcame them by a stratagem of a clean contrary Nature with the former; for he commanded that no fires now should be made, and marching very fast fell upon them at unawares, and cutting off 2000, took very many prisoners, and forced the other to betake them to their heels, whereby he exceedingly advanced his affaires, giving the Carthaginians such a blow (who now by reason of their supplies arrived out of Sicilie, were thought superior to him) that improving the Victory he went against Elymas, who had revolted from him, and killed him with a great number of his Subjects.

Whereupon his Army is divided into two factions,

11. The year following, Amilcar in Sicilie once more besieged Syracuse, Ad ann. c. and presently made great haste for storming of it after his arrival, because the Soothsayers had foretold him, that that day he should dine in the City. A great number joyning themselves to him out of hope of plunder, they so stopped up the way with carriages, that they hindered one another, and such a tumult arose, that the Syracusians having notice of it, sallied out upon them, and putting them to flight made great slaughter of them, and taking Amilcar alive, delivered him to the friends of those that had been slain, who most cruelly tortured him to death, having been formerly it's probable, condemned by his ingrateful Citizens themselves, though as then, he having the Army in his power, they durst not let it be known, but casting all their votes (written as the manner was) into a vessel, they ordered it to be covered, and the thing not to be looked into, until his return, and the giving up of his command. But his Army which consisted of 120000 Foot, and 5000 Horse, being thus strangely defeated, was divided then into two factions. The Exiles and Greeks chose them Dinocrates for their Captain, and the Carthaginians, him that had held the next place to Amilcar. The affaires of Sicilie being thus in confusion, the Inhabitants of Agri-genum thinking a fit opportunity for gaining the Principality of the whole Island to be put into their hands, made Xenodocus their Captain, who went and took in divers Towns, many revolting to him (all which with the former he restored to their liberty) and restrained the excursions of the Syracusians, who were in great distresse for want of provisions which had been cut off by the Carthaginians, the constant Murders at Sea. By this time Amilcar's head was sent over to Agathocles, who receiving it with joy, raised the contrary affection in the Enemy, to whose Camp he brought it, together with the message, that their forces were utterly cut off, whereupon they dispaired forthwith of better fortune, adoring the head of their nominal King. Justin, l. 22.

Agathocles being puffed up his fortune changer by a grievous mutiny of his Soldiers,

12. Agathocles was much puffed up at his prosperity, though he was not far from the waining of his fortune, a prelude unto which was made by Lyciscus one of his Officers, who in a drunken fit exceedingly jeered him. He took it patiently, and made a jest of it, because the man was very serviceable to him in his Wars, but Archagathus his son taking it heinously, returned it to him in his own language with threats, which further so enraged him, that he threw in his teeth (which was generally reported) his incestuous having to do with his step-mother. The young man hereat was so transported, as he ran him thorow and slew him outright, which was followed by a mutiny of the whole Army, demanding justice against him, which flew to that height, that the Soldiers chose themselves Captains, seized on Tunis, and besieged Agathocles and his son, many of the Officers upon promise of larger pay, revolted to the Carthaginians, who had not been wanting to add fuel to this flame. Agathocles seeing the danger he was in, laid aside his Purple, and made a pitiful Oration to the Soldiers, wherein he told them hee was willing to lay down his life if so they pleased, rather than end his dayes by some ignominious death, and drew out his Sword as intending to kill himself; but the Army hindered it, and compelling him to resume his Robes, were thoroughly reconciled unto him, except some 200 which went over to the Enemy. He taking this opportunity marched presently against the Carthaginians, who full little thought of a battle, but expected presently a general revolt; so that taking them thus at unawares, he easily overthrew them with great slaughter.

against the

13. About this time the Numidians revolted from those of Carthage, who sent out an Army the next Spring to reduce them to obedience. Agathocles understanding that, left his son at Tunis, and marching after them with all expedition, at length overtakes them, then overthrows them, though with great difficulty, and losse to himself. The Numidians, whilst he was employed in the battle, having been intent upon the event of the fight, fell in, and plundred his Carriages, and getting away with the greatest part of the goods, by reason of the darknesse of the night, he was glad to divide the plunder of the field equally amongst his Soldiers, in way of recompence for the damage sustained by them. Such Greeks as he took prisoners, which had assisted the Carthaginians, he put into a Castle, where they fearing to be put to death set upon the Garrison by night, but being too weak, betook themselves thence to a certain fortified place, which Agathocles hearing marched thither with his Army, and drawing them out under promise of impunity, contrary to his faith given, killed them all to the number of 1000. of which half were Syracusians. At this time there was one Ophellus, who having been an Officer under Alexander the Great, had seized upon Cyrene, and gaped still after larger Dominions. To him now sent Agathocles, inviting him to come and joyn with him against the Carthaginians, offering him all Africk for a reward, to which he pretended he was constrained to passe over, assuring him he would content himself with Sicily, or else, if he thought good, invade Italy more commodious for him than Africk by far.

Greece,

The man puffed up with great expectations, sent to Athens (whence he had married a wife of the stock of famous Miltiades) to joyn with him in the expedition, which not onely divers of that Citie readily imbraced, but others of Greece now much shattered by Wars within it self, which were raised by Alexander his Successors. Ophellus then began his journey (with above 10000 foot, 600 horse, 100 Chariots, besides 10000 others, extraordinary, as they called them) of two moneths long, through a desert infested with wild beasts and venomous Serpents, wherewith his Army was sore distressed, as also by want of necessaries, till at length they arrived at Agathocles his Camp. There they were received with all manner of Provisions, but as the greatest part of them were gone out to gather forrage, he set upon the rest with their Captain, who though he resisted, yet being overborn, was slain most treacherously, and Agathocles then forcing them to lay down their Arms, got into his power the whole Army, having aforehand stirred up his Soldiers against Ophellus, by feigning that he lay in wait for his life.

14. Whilst Agathocles was in hand with this treacherous design, Bomilcar having long intended, but still out of fear deferred, the invasion of the Tyranny, communicating his intencion to 500 Citizens, and 1000 Mercenaries, broke out into open Rebellion against his Countrey. Having seized on the new Citie, he thence invaded the old, which cauted great consternation at first, whilst every one feared they had been betrayed into the Enemies hands; but understanding the matter, they presently made head against him, who going on in his way made slaughters of all he met; but what with opposing him in the streets, and throwing down stones from the houses, they drove him back again into the new Citie through the narrow wayes, and there besieged him. At length upon promise of pardon for what had passed, an agreement was made, and his followers by reason of the danger the Citie stood in, were all dismissed without any punishment; but he, notwithstanding the faith given to him, was most ignominiously, and with great Tortures put to death.

Agathocles taketh the title of King.

Returning in to Sicily, his affairs go down the wind, both there and in Africk.

15. The year after Agathocles hearing that the Captains of Alexander had taken the Titles of Kings upon them: for that he thought himself neither inferior to them in power, Territories, or for valiant acts, he called himself King in like manner: yet took he not the Diadem, being accustomed constantly to wear a Crown of Myrtles heretofore, either for the Ceremony of some Priesthood, or as * others have conceived, by reason of baldness, which rendred him exceedingly uncomely about the head. Then to attempt something worthy of so great a Title, he fell upon Utica, near which taking 300 of the Inhabitants, which upon his coming had been shut out, when he could not perswade them to yield, he framed an Engine, to which he tied many of them, and drawing it along to that place where he intended to break into the Town, exposed them either to be shot to death by their friends, or else if they within out of affection to them should forbear, then could he easily enter. The Defendants yet preferring their Countreys safety before that of a few private men, when they could do no less, repulsed the Enemy with all possible endeavour; but for all this, Agathocles broke in at another place, and filled the Citie with slaughter, no regard being had to any condition; and after he had overcome them also in a Sea-fight, placed a Garrison there, and subdued all the Maritime Towns under his power. Though he prospered thus in Africk, yet was he solicitous for Sicily, where the Agrigentines had made some progresse in freeing the Citie; but now of late had received so great a blow from his Captains, that broke in pieces their design. Just after the fight was over he arrived, and making a progresse about the Island, recovered most of the Towns, onely he was repulsed with great losse from Centorippa, and upon the same terms gained Appollonia. Henceforth his affairs began universally to decline. In Sicily, Dinocrates got so great an Army of Exiles together, that he durst not fight him, though continually dared, and dogged at the heels. In Africk his son Archagathus prospered very much at the first through the good fortune of Eumachus, who subdued many places. But the Senate at Carthage dividing their Army into three parties, whereof one was to march for the Maritime parts, another for the Inland, and the last for the upper Countreys, they thereby attained their ends, viz. to lessen their number in the Citie (which made all Provisions scarce, by sending out 20000 men) to contain their Allies in fidelity, by giving them hopes of relief, and (which was the chiefest) to force the Enemy also to divide his Army, and so draw him down from Carthage it self.

16. For Archagathus dividing his Army to oppose the Carthaginians in the several quarters, lost almost the two parts thereof, which he sent out under Conduct of two several Caprains, to the number of about 19000 men; so that the Carthaginians reduced almost all places back to obedience, all the Confederates revolted except a few, and Archagathus being distressed for Want of all things, and the remainder of his Army in great terrour, he sent to his father into Sicily to acquaint him in what posture matters stood, and to desire speedy relief. He seeing his affairs go down the wind in that Island was solicitous how to leave it, and 300 Vessels of the Carthaginians blocked up the mouth of the Haven, so that he could not stir out. But 18 Vessels coming in from Hetruria, he perswaded the Masters thereof being friends to put out, and then when the Carthaginians (as he expected) gave them the chace, he fell in upon their Rear, and beyond all hope got a victory over them, boarding five of their Fleet, which he took together with the Defenders. Hereat encouraged, he sent Leptines against Agrigentum, knowing Xenodocus their General then to be out of favour with a great part of the Town, and he seeing himself unable to grapple with him stirred not out, but provoked by the Citizens, so that being worsted, for fear of condemnation he fled to Gela. Agathocles now feasted the people for joy, making himself common with all, and giving them wine to excess, so that their vvits being out, when that once was in, they might speak their minds, and he thereby know their inclinations; for he feared that after his departure they might call in Dinocrates and the Exiles, and restore again the popular Government. Having by this means got out who they were that distasteth his power, he feasted them again by themselves, with other 500 who bore the most noble minds, and compassing them in with his Mercenaries, slew them every man.

17. Then sayled he over into Africk, vvhether he found his Army in a low and desolate condition for want of necessaries. Therefore resolved he to fight, though far inferiour to the Carthaginians, vvho sought rather to draw out the time in length, knowing the condition of the Enemy; but he leading down his men to their Trenches, forced them to come out and give battel, in vvvhich he fighting valiantly, yet vvvas vvorsted vvith the losse of 3000 men. After this a sudden calamity seized upon both the Armies by reason of mistakes. For the Carthaginians offering the most beautifull of their Captives, as a sacrificize to their gods, it hapned that the fire thence vvvas driven to their Tents, vvvhich being covered vvith Reed and Straw easily carched it, and as easily vvvere consumed, vvwhence it came to passe that all things vvvere in great confusion. But the vvvorst of it vvvas, that the Africans vvvhich had fought vvith Agathocles coming now over to them, the Scouts seeing them, gave an Alarm, as if all the Greeks taking their advantage of the fire vvvere coming against them, so that flying in great confusion, they killed, and trode down one another, mistaking one another for Enemies, and having thus dispatched 5000 of their Company, all run away to Carthage, vvwhere they vvvere received vvith great trembling by their friends, lest that vvwith them the Enemy should enter. The Africans vvvhich vvvere coming over, being affrighted at the burning of the Camp, retreated, vvvhich being seen also by the Greeks, they gave notice to Agathocles that the Carthaginians vvvere coming against him, so that he drew out his men in great fear and terrour, vvwho meeting the Africans, and they taking one another for Enemies, they killed, and slew all they could during the night season, till such time as 4000 being slain, the rest retreated to the Camp. Agathocles after this, seeing himself too weak now to grapple vvith the Carthaginians, and thereby his affairs to be desperate in Africk, resolved to return into Sicily, and considering that the Enemy having the command at Sea, would nor suffer the Army to passe away quietly, he resolved vvith his younger son Heraclides, and a few more, to passe over secretly, and leave Archagathus behind him, vvwhom he was jealous of, because of the report raised of him that he had to do vvith his Step-mother.

A strange accident vvvhich maketh great disorder in both the Camps.

Agathocles despairing of his affairs in Africk, intendeth to fly away vvwith his youngest son.

The eldest hearing of it raiseth a mutiny, vvwherein Agathocles is bound in Fetters, but being loosed escapeth away, and both his sons are killed by his Army, vvvhich maketh his own terms

18. But Archagathus having notice of his intention (vvvhich he took in marvellous evil part) communicated it to several of the Officers, vvwho raising a mutiny presently in the Army, Agathocles vvvas seized on, and made sure in Fetters. A little after it hapned that an Alarm vvvas made in the Camp, as if the Enemy approached, vvvhich made all Arm themselves and run out, and amongst the rest the Keepers of Agathocles, vvwhom then the multitude seeing in such a condition, cried out presently that he should be loosed; vvvhich being done, he forthvvith took Boat vvwith a few attendants, leaving both his sons behind him. The Army understanding this killed them both, and then agreed vvwith the Carthaginians for 300 Talents to restore the Towns yet in their hands, and that such as vvould should receive pay in their service. And such as did so had the terms performed; but those that out of hope of succour from Agathocles held out the places, being all forced to yield, their Captains vvvere Crucified, and the common Soldiers being bound in Fetters, vvvere forced vvwith their hard labour to repair that Countrey, vvvhich formerly they had helped to depopulate.

19. Thus the Carthaginians obtained peace after four years; Divine vengeance hurrying Agathocles to punishment, after that perfidious murder of Ophellus, his two sons being slain on the same day, and by the hands of his Soldiers. After his arrival in Sicily he went presently to Agesta, a Town confederate vvwith him, vvwhence wanting money he exacted much Treasure, but they grumbling, and complaining thereof, all the poorer sort he brought forth, and slew at the River Seamander, and then tortured the rest vvwith all sorts sorts of torments to make them confesse what they had. Some he broke upon the wheel, others he shot of from Engines as stones. Some had their ankles cut off, and endured other cruel torments. He invented a kind of punishment also, something resembling Phalaris his Bull, being a bed of iron, wherein one being put, was burnt or fried to death by fire put underneath.

Rich women had their ankles broken with iron tongs, others their breasts cut off. Some out of terror burnt themselves in their houses, and others hanged themselves, so that the whole flower of the People being absolutely destroyed, he sold the children to the Brutii in Italy, and utterly to destroy the name of the City, called it Dicaopolis, and Peopled it with fugitives. Hearing then that his sons were slain in Africk, to be revenged on the Soldiers, he sent commands to Amander his brother, to kill all their friends and kinsfolks at Syracuse, which he readily performing, no sex nor age was spared, but so horrid a massacre committed, that as well old and decrepit men as young infants were included in the slaughter. Such as were thus murdered lying on the Sea shore, none durst bury them, though never so nearly related, so that the Sea washing them away was coloured with the blood, carrying along with it a note of this cruelty to other parts at a good distance. Agathocles continued his progresse up and down the Island, strengthening Towns, and raising money; but Pasiphilus his Captain despising him now for the lownesse of his fortune, fled over to Dinocrates, and withdrew the Army also from him. This cast him into such despair, that contrary to his former boldnesse, he sent to Dinocrates, offering to quit the Tyranny, and restore the Government to the People, so he might have but two Castles to maintain himself on, and earnestly pressed him to admit of the conditions. But he gaping after the chief power himself, and unwilling to be reduced again to the estate of a private Citizen (being now (though but accounted Captain of the Ex-ciles) as a King indeed, in regard of the great extent of his power and command) put him off with one pretence or other still, till Agathocles smelling out his device, sent some to accuse him to the Army, and sending to Carthage made Peace with them on these terms; to restore all the places to them they formerly had in Sicilie, and for this in way of requital, to receive 500 Talents of Gold, and a great quantity of Corn.

20. Furnishing then himself with a small Army, he went against Dinocrates and his Exiles, who seeing the little number he brought with him (being but about 5000 Foot, and 800 Horse) in comparison of themselves, amounting to 25000 Foot, and 3000 Horse, gave him battel. The dispute at first was very sharp; but shortly some 2000 of the Exiles revolting to the Tyrant, so encouraged his men, and discouraged those they had forsaken (who thought them to be more than indeed they were) that they were easily put to flight, though so far exceeding in number. All the Horse got clean away, and some of the Foot; but the greatest part settling upon an Hill, made Peace with Agathocles, who had sent to them, inviting them now at length to lay down their enmity, and return home; but after he had got them into his power, contrary to his faith given (which he never observed) he slew some 7000 of them. The reliques of the Army being gathered up he received, and Dinocrates himself, to whose command he committed part of his Soldiers, and contrary to his own disposition, trusted him to the last. He betraying his companions, slew Pasiphilus at Gela, and going about in subduing the Towns and Castles (in which work he spent two years) delivered them all up to Agathocles.

21. Not long after, Cassander the King of Macedonia besieging Corcyra, Agathocles went and raised the siege, burning all his ships in the Havens.
Returning to his Army, and understanding that certain Ligurians and Tyrrhenians had joyned with those that slew his son Archagathus, he got them into his power to the number of 2000, and put them all to the sword. The Brutii (a People which issuing from the Lucanians, were grown mighty high, and at the very first fought against those from whom they had their original, and forced them to a Peace, on equal terms) being offended with him, he failed over into Italy against them, and determined to besiege a Town belonging to them, but they setting upon him at unawares, forced him with the losse of 4000 men to return to Syracuse. Yet was he not discouraged from making another Expedition against Crotone, which intending to besiege, he pretended he was about to send his daughter to the King of Epirus with a Royal Fleet, and beguiling them herewith, laid close siege both by Sea and Land to the Town, when they full little thought it. Having undermined a great house, they being terrified thereat, opened their gates and let him in, after which he plundered the Town, and committed great slaughters. Then entred he into society with the Japyges and Pacetii notable Pyrates; whom furnishing with Vessels, he was to have part of the booty; and leaving a Garrison in Crotone, he returned to Syracuse.

22. Once more having prepared an Army of 30000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, he passed over into Italy, where being arrived, committing the Navy to the care of Stulpo, he commanded him to make excursions into the Territories of the Brutii, but he coasting along and walling the maritime parts, lost almost all his ships by a tempest. He himself took by storm the City of the Hipponiata, at the report whereof the Brutii were so affrighted, that they sent to him to treat, and delivered up 600 Hostages. Yet after his departure they broke their oath, and expelling his Garrison, returned again to their own freedom. Agathocles being returned home, sent his son of his own name to Demetrius Poliorcetes now King of Macedonia, to enter into society with him, who taking the message in good part, rewarded the Ambassador with royal gifts, and sent one back with him, who under colour of ratifying the League, might espie out the condition of Sicilie. Having now been a long time, as he thought, at Peace with the Carthaginians, he made all provision possible again for shipping, intending to make another Expedition into Africk, and hinder the exportation of Corn from Sicilie and Sardinia.

23. But whilst he busied himself with such thoughts, he was prevented by one Menon, who being born at Egesta, had been taken captive there, and for his beauty was preferred to his service. For a time he dissembled the displeasure he conceived from the calamity of his Country, and his own ignominious and filthy condition, till he might have an opportunity to be revenged upon the Tyrant. But now it hapning, that Agathocles commending Agathocles his son to the Syracusians as his Successor; and sending him to succeed Archagathus (his nephew by Archagathus his son, and a man of great courage) in the command of the Army then quartering about Aetna; Archagathus seeing how things were likely to go, plotted the ruine of them both, and sending to Menon, desired him to make the old man away with poyson, whilst he in the mean time inviting the young one to a feast, made him drunk, and then killed him. Menon mindful of the message, whereas the King after meat called for a tooth-pick to cleanse his teeth, dipped one in poyson and gave him it, which he using, began by little and little to wax ill, and then his teeth putrifying in a horrid manner, this was succeeded by tormenting pains. Seeing therefore himself near his end, he called the People together, and inveighing bitterly against Archagathus, stirred them up to revenge him on him, and restored the Democracy to the People. Afterwards his voice failing him, he was put upon the funeral fire yet breathing, by Oxythenius, who had been sent to him by Demetrius, and burnt. Justin from Trogus (who in the whole story of this Prince dissenteth from Diodorus) reporteth, that before his end, he sent back his wife Theogene an Aegyptian by birth, with her two young children, and great wealth, into her own Country, to be out of that danger which he foresaw must needs ensue. The story of his life is almost beyond parallel; but he died after he had lived 72 years, and thereof reigned 23, as amongst other Historians cited by our Author, Antander his own brother left recorded; A. M. 3718, and the second of the 123 Olympiad.

Stures. Menon in the mean while who had poisoned him being in the Camp with Archagathus, and elevated with the thought of what he had done, made away also Archagathus by treachery, and with good words drawing the Army to himself, resolved to make War upon the Syracusians, and seize on the Principality. The Syracusians therefore having made Hicetas their Praior, sent him out against him, but the Carthaginians joyning with Menon, they were constrained to deliver them 400 Hostages to let fall the War with them, and receive the Exiles. Afterwards the mercenary Soldiers being denied the right of Suffrage in the election of Magistrates, a great sedition arose thereupon, and both they and the People took arms, but the better sort interposed themselves, and prevailed with both parties to agree, the Soldiers consenting to depart the Island with their goods. These Mercenaries marching away, came to Messene, a Sea-town standing over against Italy, where being kindly entertained by the Inhabitants, they so well requited them, that in the night they massacred them all, and marring their wives, seized upon the Town, which they called in their own Campanian language Mamertina; Mars in that tongue being named Mamers. Over against this Town stood Rhegium upon the promontory of Italy, which being in danger now in the War betwixt the Romans and the Tarentines, the Inhabitants desired of the Romans to have a Party sent them for their defence, which being also Campanians, in imitation of what their Countrymen had done at Messene, and by their help, they also killed or expelled the Inhabitants, and seized upon their Town and territories. Decius their chief Commander they banished for the unequal division of the prey, who going thence to Messene, fell ill afterwards of his eyes, and sent to Rhegium for an expert Physician in this kind, who coming to him, in revenge of what he had done to his Country, applied Cantharides to his eyes instead of salve, and utterly blinded him. And when the Romans were once disentangled from the War, having grievously resented the treachery of their Soldiers, they besieged them in the Town, which taking, they brought 300 of them to Rome, and in the market-place first whipped and then beheaded them, after the custom of their Ancestors, to vindicate their credit with their confederates.

25. In Sicilie were now many petty Tyrants: Hicetas at Syracuse, Phinias at Agrigentum, and several others at other places. These two fell out and warred with each other, insomuch that by reason of their mutual excursions and depredations their ground lay untilled. Hicetas having still the upper hand of the other, was so elevated, that he ventured to fight with the Carthaginians at the River Teria, but it proved to the great losse of his men. Ever since the death of Agathocles, had the Syracusians laboured with all their might to reduce that whole Island into their power, and now at this time rather doubling their diligence than at all slackening their endeavours, sent over into Italy to Pyrrhus King of Epirus (who now was busie in War against the Romans, being called thither by the Tarentines) desiring aid of him for the expelling of the Africans, and to take upon him the protection of Sicilie. Hicetas having held the Dominion of Syracuse nine years, was then ejected by Thynio, who together with Sostratus were so vexed with the Carthaginian War, that they again called Pyrrhus into Sicilie. The Mamertines entered into League with the Carthaginians, and resolved if possible to hinder his landing, the Romans were also by reason of their enmity with him easily drawn into the confederacy, so that the Straights of Sicily were narrowly watched. He delaying his coming till the next year, the Carthaginians sent back thirty of their ships upon other occasions, and besieged Syracuse. But then he (having been in Italy now two years and four moneths, without success) passed over without control, and came directly to Syracuse; where the Carthaginians lying incamped with no lesse than 30000 men, having also 100 ships at anchor in the Haven, yet upon his approach raised their siege, not daring to try the hazard of a battel.

26. Pyrrhus coming to the City, reconciled the Inhabitants to their Governours, for which getting great favour, and receiving messages from diverse Cities

Cities, which gave up themselves into his hands, he not onely thought now of gūning Sicily (which he intended to give to his son, begotten ou Lanassa Justin lib. 23. the daughter of Agathocles, as Italy to another) but of laying Africk it self also to his Dominions. Making a journey through the Island, he received the Cities to protection, and within a short space subdued all the places held by the Carthaginians, except Lilybæum, a Town built upon the Sea by their Ancestors, after that Dionysius had taken Moræa. After he had been some time before it, though a great supply had arrived, yet sent they also to him, offering him money to raise his siege; and he was inclined to accept of the offer; but his friends in Council perswaded him by all means to refuse it, and utterly expel the Africans out of Sicily. Then did he with all his might attempt the taking of the place by force, but it being strongly defended, he every time came off with losse, and finally after he had continued the siege for two moneths, rose up and departed. After this he had thoughts of becoming master at Sea, and transporting his Army into Africk; but behaving himself too Magisterially in the preparation for this attempt he lost himself exceedingly, and then suspecting the fidelity of Themo and Sostratus, the one he compelled by fear to revolt from him, and the later he slew as guilty of the same intention. This so provoked the Cities, that some revolted back to the Carthaginians, and others to the Mamertines, so that perceiving a great defection, and a conspiracy also hatched against him, being now solicited also by the Samuites and Tarentines for more aid, he departed again into Italy, being opposed so in his passage by the Carthaginians on the Sea, and that he lost most of his ships, and so much after he had landed by the Mamertines (who had before waited over 1000 men) that with much ado he got safe to Tarentum. 27. After the departure of Pyrrhus, the Soldiers which quartered in the Towns near to Syracuse, beyond all example, created two Magistrates out of their own body, Artemidorus & Hiero, to the great indignation of the people, which took it in disdain that their privilege should be thus usurped by the Army. Yet afterwards did they confirm the honour unto Hiero for his great moderation and high abilities, who being the son of Hierocles, had strange prestiges whilst yet a Child concerning his future Dignity. He perceiving how in the absence of the Prator, the Syracusians were apt to be seditious, and attempt new matters, entred into affinity with Leptines (by marrying his daughter) whom he knew to be the most considerable man, and of great Authority amongst the vulgar, that he might supply his place as it were in his absence, and contain the people in obedience. After this marriage was over, taking notice of the loose Carriage of the old Mercenary Soldiers, and how they were ever inclining to mutinies, he drew them out against the Mamertines, who being Barbarians (as the Greeks alwayes termed all besides themselves) had seized upon Messene, and dividing them from the rest, which he kept with himself, exposed them against the Enemy, and suffered them every man to be cut off, so that being rid of them, he thenceforth Governed without any fear or trouble. Three or four years after he set upon the Mamertines in good earnest, who though they bare themselves high so long as their friends and associates continued Masters of Rhegium (created much trouble to the Carthaginians, and compelled divers Towns to pay Tribute) yet now since the defeat of them, and especially after that Hiero had got into his power two places near unto them, they were exceedingly straitned. 28. Yet sent they out against him 8000 foot, and 1000 horse under the Conduct of one Cior, who calling the Soothsayers to divine what the issue should be, they answered, that he was to spend the next night in the Enemies Camp, at which being much elevated, he set his men in order, and passed over the River. Hiero sent 2000 choice Messinians, and 500 others, to get about the Hill Thorax, and come upon their backs, he in the mean time charging their front. Here was maintained a sharp dispute, till the 700 fresh men coming upon the backs of the Mamertines, did great execution upon them, so that being now compassed about, they betook them-themselves to flight. Cio the General fighting most valiantly, received so many and great wounds that he swooned with too great expence of blood, and being taken alive, was brought into the Camp of the Syracusians, where all means possible were used for his recovery. But it hapning that divers horses being brought out of the field, he espied that on which his son rode amongst them; whereat taking an apprehension of the young mans death, in great trouble of mind he untied his wounds, and thereby caused his own end, as unwilling to outlive his son.

29. The Mamertines upon the news of this defeat were minded to give up themselves, and their Citie, into the hands of Hiero. But it hapning that Hannibal the Carthaginian General, being at that time in the Island Lipara, heard of the overthrow, and came over presently to congratulate Hiero, as he pretended, but indeed to circumvent him with his General craft in which he was well skilled; and Hiero was so wrought upon as to give credit to him, and ly still. Then went he to the Mamertines, and finding them ready to surrender, turned them clearly from it, and drew them to his own interest, by bringing them relief into the Citie. Hiero returning to Syracuse, was for a reward of his great service saluted King by the consent of all men, which Title he held to his last, the space of 54 years. Hannibal cunningly placed his Garrison in the Castle, and thereby awed the whole Town, so that the Mamertines then suspected him as much as Hiero, and they hindring thus each other from gaining the place, at length made an accord to carry on the War against it in common. This Combination causing the other to berhink themselves of some forein aid, they sent to the Romans, desiring them to take the patronage of them, their own Countrey-men, as being Originally Campanians.

30. The Messige found no good entertainment with the Senate, for that the fathers accounted it an absurd thing for them, who had punished the perfidiousnesse of those that had seized upon Rhegium so sharply, now to take upon them to protect those that were guilty, and patterns of the same Crime; and they could by no means be brought to consent unto it. But the people (who alone could do it) being perswaded by the Prator that it was high time to stop the proceedings of the Carthaginians, who had almost swallowed up all Sicily, and would use that Island as a bridge to passe over into Italy, and being also made to believe how profitable it would be to their particular interests to undertake the War, having suffered much by that late one with Pyrrhus, and the Tarentines, they decreed that aid should be sent them. The next year was Appius Claudius accordingly sent over with an Army, with which he put to the worst, both Hiero and Hannibal, and thereupon constrained the other to joyn himself to him against the Carthaginians. This is called the Sicilian, or the first Punick War, which for that it falls into the History of the Romans more especially, under whom thenceforth Sicilia was ever subject, it must necessarily be referred thither, as to its proper place. It began A. M. 3741. the first of the 129 Olympiad, in the 19th of the reign of Antiochus Soter, the second King of Syria, and the 21th of Ptolomy Philadelphus, the second also of Egypt, after the division of the Empire of Alexander the Great; 22 years after the death of Agathocles, in the 490th year after the building of Rome, Appius Claudius Caudex, and *M. # The affaires of the Romans Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

SECT. I.

From the War of Privernum to the first Punick War, wherein the Romans first set foot out of Italy, the space of 66 years.

War decreed
Paleopolitans.

1. IN the year after the taking of Privernum was War decreed against the Paleopolitans. Paleopolis stood not far off from the place where Neapolis (now Nap-li or Naples) is seated, and, as some think, there where at this day, is seen il borgo de Chiara. The same people inhabited two Cities, being descended from Cuma, which was also a Colony of Ch. Iels in Enbora, now called Negropont. For the Cumani having a good fleet first passed to the Islands Menaria and Pitheculsa, and afterward ventured upon the Continent. The Paleopolitans trusting to their own strength, and counting of the treachery of the Samnites, and the plague which now had seized upon Rome, committed many Hostile actions against the Romans that inhabited the Countreys about Cuma and Falernus. When L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publius Philo were both Consuls the second time, the Faciales were sent to demand restitution, who bringing from those Greeks (more valiant in tongue, saith Livy, than in deeds) a fiery and resolute answer, it was resolved that War should be made upon them.

2. Whilest this War depended, the year following was Alexandria in Egypt built, as Livy writeth, whereas the foundation of this Citie was laid, while Alexander was in Africk, the year before the death of Darius, and the fifth before this, wherein C. Patilius and L. Papyrius Mugilanus were Consuls. This same year he maketh Alexander the King of Epirus to have been slain, who being Uncle by the mothers side to Alexander the Great, is thought to have undertaken an expedition into Italy, out of emulation towards his Nephew, that as the one was now Conquering the East, so the other might endeavour to subdue the West, having no lesse matter to work upon in Italy, Africk, and Sicily, than the other found in Asia and Persia. He was deceived by the Oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, which bidding him beware of Pandosia and Acheron, he knowing there was a Citie of the former name in Epirus, and a River of the later, thought himself so much the safer, as he could get farthest off from these. Being therefore sent for by the Tarentines, he came into Italy, and made War with the Brutii and Lucani, from whom he took many Towns, and 300 families, which he sent as Hostages into Epirus. He entred into a League with the Metapontini and Romans. But the Brutii and Lucani recruiting themselves by the supplies of their neighbours, re-inforced the War, and set upon him near Pandosia (a Town situate a little above Consentia, the Metropolis of the Brutii) near to which ran a River called Acheron. Taking this River with his horse, he was therein slain by a Lucanian, and his dead body being carried down the stream into the Enemies quarters was mangled into pieces. A certain woman whose husband and Children were taken prisoners by the Epirots, got the pieces together, and in exchange for her relations sent his bones to Metapontus, whence they were conveyed into Epirus unto Cleopatra his wife, and Olympias his sister, whereof the one was sister, and the other mother to Alexander the Great.

2. The Palæopolitans though assisted by the Samnites and Tarentines, were overmatched so, as glad they were to yield up their City, and the Samnites lost three of their own Towns. The Tarentines yet proceeded, and drew both the Samnites and Neapolitans (the other part of this Greek Colony) afresh into the War, wherein also the Inhabitants of Vesuntia, together with their allies engaged themselves. Whilst this War was but beginning, great stirrings happened in the City. There, one L. Papyrius had given up himself to C. Publius as a slave, to work out his father's debt. Being a young man of a beautiful body, Publius attempted filthily to abuse him, and when he would in no wise suffer this, most grievously beat and tore his body with rods. In this plight Papyrius got away, and running to the People, by declaring his condition, so affected them, that they procured the Fathers to decree, that the Consuls should propose to them in the Comitia these two Laws: the first, That no man should be detained in bonds, except for some misdemeanor, till the time of his punishment: the second, that the money and goods, not the body of the debtor should be responsible. Whereupon all prisoners for debt were forthwith set at liberty. The year following the Vesuntians were overthrown by Junius Brutus Scavia the Consul, who also took from them two Towns. His Colleague L. Furius Camillus being sick in Samnium (or the Country of the Samnites) pronounced Dictator L. Papyrius Cursor, the most famous Captain by far of those times, who named Q. Fabius Rutilianus for his Master of Horse-men. Papyrius being in Campaign against the Samnites, was forced to return to Rome, for the renewing of his auspices, and at his departure commanded his Master of Horse-men not to stir out of the trenches to fight one stroke till he came back; but Fabius understanding that a notable advantage of doing something of consequence was presented from the Enemy, fell upon the Samnites, and made great slaughter of them. The Dictator hearing of this, in a great rage returned to the Camp, and had put him to death, but that he was rescued by the Army, from which flying to the City, Papyrius followed him, and pressing sore to the Senate the necessity of discipline and authority, would not at all give way to the intreaties of the Fathers. This forced M. Fabius the father of the party to appeal to the People and their Tribunes, by which he hardly was drawn to pardon him, though his authority was saved together with the life of Fabius, through the intreaties of those who might justly have Commanded it, as was confessed by himself.

3. This severity of the Dictator so alienated the hearts of the Soldiers from him, that it had well nigh cost him the loss of a battle, which constrained him to be more Popular: then afterward he overthrew the Samnites, and harried their Country. This made them desire Peace, but returning quickly again to their former enmity, in the second year after, they received another great defeat from A. Cornelius Aruina the Dictator. Herewith they were so struck, that they sent all the prisoners they had home to Rome, with such plunder as they had taken, and the dead body with the goods of him who had been the author of the revolt, and who fearing to be given up had killed himself. The Senate onely received the men, with such goods as any Citizen could challenge for his own, and denied them Peace. At this C. Pontius a leading man amongst them took occasion grievously to envenom against the injustice of the Romans, and causing them to take arms, led them presently near to a place called Caudum, whence having apparelled ten Soldiers in the habit of Shepherds, he sent them to Calatia (where he heard the Consuls lay at present) with a charge, that when they should be asked where the Army of the Samnites was, they should answer in Apulia, besieging Luceria, which it had already well nigh taken. A rumour being already spread abroad of such a thing, now obtained greater credit, and the Romans accounted themselves by all means bound to succour Luceria, and the rather, for fear lest all Apulia should revolt. Two ways there were which led to Luceria: One by the Sea side open and secure, another through the Straights of Caudinum called Furca Chudina (at this day Caudino, and Forche Caudine, ten miles distant from Benevento) a place incompassed about with high mountains, & into which one could not enter, nor depart out of it, but through very difficult and straight passages. The Consuls leading their Army through this, as the nearest way, were quickly stopped up, so as they could neither proceed nor retire, because on all sides Pontius had blocked up the passage.

4. The Samnites having the Roman Armies at this advantage, sent to Herennius the father of Pontius their General, and a very wise man, for his advice what was to be done. He sent word, they should dismiss the Romans without any injury at all, which answer not pleasing, they sent back for another, and then he counselled them to cut them off, and not leave a man alive. These two extremes being ascribed to dotage, he came to the Camp, and offered his reasons. He said, he gave the first advice as such, which if followed, would by a great courtesie have for ever obliged a most powerful People, and the second, as tending so far to the weakning of their power, as they could not for a long time either recruit themselves or renew the War, having lost two so considerable Armies; as for any third expedient he found none. Being asked concerning a middle way of dismissing the Romans in safety, but under the obligation of some conditions, he answered, that this course would not procure them friends, nor diminish their enemies; for such was the Roman Nation, that being disgraced or defeated, it could not rest, but would still retain the memory of what present necessity urged it to submit to; neither, saith he, will they suffer you to rest till punished abundantly. But this wise counsel would not be heard; so that the Romans had these conditions set them: The Army was to march away onely with their clothes, having first in token of slavery passed under the jugum: the Romans should quit wholly the Country of the Samnites, and thence remove their Colonies: and both Roman and Samnite live under the same terms of confederacy and alliance. The Armies were constrained to submit, and in great shame and consternation marched away disarmed. This disaster hapned in the 433 year of the City, and the third after the death of Alexander the Great, when T. Veturius Calvinus the first, and Sp. Posthumius the second time were Consuls.

Make it disgracefully passe under the jugum and march away disarmed.

The conditions are renounced at Rome, and the Samnites often again defeated.

5. The City was most grievously afflicted with shame and anger at so disgraceful and unusual a thing. Posthumius perswaded the Senate to deliver himself and his Colleague into the hands of the Samnites, as being onely obliged to the conditions, and not the State, which was unacquainted therewith. This being accordingly done, Pontius refused to receive them, exclaiming against the perfidioussesse of the Romans. The Army then marching down again sufficiently revenged themselves, under conduct of Papirius. Several Towns which had revolted were recovered, and scarce could the Samnites obtain a Truce for two years. They brake this Truce ere the time was out, and thereby drew the War again upon them, which enduring for eleven years, they lost many thousands of men, with many Towns, which humbled them so, that upon their submission the usual confederacy was granted to them. Then were the Aequi chastized, who had helped them, and thereby were other Nations affrighted into subjection. In the second year after, began another War with the Hetruscans, wherein were fought divers bloody battels; but still the Romans had the better, who stormed divers Towns, and wasted the Country. Two years after, the Samnites rebelled again, and joyned with the Hetruscans, but with the same successe as formerly, being grievously slaughtered, especially under the conduct of Q. Fabius Maximus, and Decius Mus; the later of whom, seeing his wing give ground, in a great and bloody battel fought with the Samnites and Galls (for those now had joyned with them) solemnly devoted himself and the Enemy to the Dii Manes, and rushing into the midst was killed, as his father had been 44 years before. Still continued the miseries of the Samnites, and two years after their last Army (for this time it must be understood) was cut in pieces by L. Papirius son to the former, who also took many Towns, and for his service obtained a most splendid Triumph. It is observed, that over the Samnites the Romans triumphed thirty times: viz. Consuls 26 times, times, L. Papirius the Dictator twice, Publius Philo once, who first of all others triumphed with Proconsular power, and once Q. Fabius another Proconsul. The family of the Fabii obtained, of these thirty, four Triumphs, and that of the Papirii five, as may be seen in the Capitoline Tables. This War having begun in the 410 year of the City, ended in the 481, and therefore continued 71 years, not fifty onely, as Florus, according to his custome, falsely computeth; neither 81 as Appian, nor 49 onely, as Eutropius; nor yet onely seventy, which number Livie assigneth with tolerable difference. All Writers agree, that the Romans had no Enemy in Italy, who longer, or more pertinaciouly, managed the grand quarrel with them, than the Samnites.

Decius Mus as his father before him, devoteth himself to the Dii Manes.

Appeal re-
third time.

6. During these successes abroad, the People having got of late so many privileges, were reasonably quiet; yet their Tribunes having one occasion left to create trouble to the Fathers, stomached much that all the Priests and Augurs should be created out of the Nobility, and laboured to make the Commons partakers of those Offices. The Senate made no great resistance, as being now accustomed to yield, and that in things of far greater moment, as the Consulship, Censorship, Dictatorship, and Triumphs. So, whereas as yet there were but four chief Priests and as many Augurs, to them were added four, and to those five out of the body of the Commons. And this same year did M. Valerius the Consul prefer a Law of Appeal more diligently enacted. Now was it the third time preferred since the banishment of the Kings, alwaies by the same family. The cause of renewing it, saith Livie, I suppose was no other, than that the power of a few prevailed above the liberty of the Commons. Which cannot be, if we consider, how for a long time the will of the multitude had got ground, and before this overturned the prerogative of the Patricians. The Lex Porcia, saith he, seemeth alone to be enacted for the backs of the Citizens, because it inflicted an heavy punishment upon him that should beat with rods or kill a Roman Citizen. The Lex Valeria having prohibited any to be killed or bearen who had appealed, if any did contrary, added no more than it was naughtily done, which (such was then the modesty of men) was I believe, a sufficient obligation for the Law. Now scarcely can any one threaten a Slave in that manner. Fabius Gurges after this, being Consul, fought unprosperously with the Samnites, whereupon the Senate consulted about removing him from the Army. Fabius Maximus his father deprecating this ignominy, prevented it, by promising he would go to the War as Legatus or Lieutenant to his son. He performed it, and so assisted the young man, that he procured him Victory, and a Triumph, wherein C. Pontius the Samnite being led was put to death. After this, L. Posthumius a man of Consular dignity, being set over the Army, used the help of the Soldiers in his own field, and for that was punished. The Samnites desiring Peace, the League was renewed with them the fourth time. But presently again, as it seemeth, they rebelled; for P. Cornelius Rufinus, and Manius Curius (surnamed Dentatus, because born with teeth, according to Plinie) overthrew them in several bloody battels, and took divers of their Towns. Livie in his eleventh Book (as appeareth from it's Epitome) wrote, that Curius Dentatus the Consul, having overthrown the Samnites and Sabines, who had rebelled, triumphed twice the same year. After this were Colonies sent to Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The Triumviri for Capital matters were now also first made. The Census being perfected, the Lustrum was made, and 273000 polls of Roman Citizens were celled.

7. Presently after happened the third separation of the Commons from the Patricians. The cause was the great debts which the poorer sort had contracted. As a remedy for this the Tribunes of the Commons, those incendiaries, proposed new tables in way of defalcation, which the Consuls in favour of the creditors opposed. The contest came to that height, that the Plbeians departed into the Janiculum, for the reconciliation and reducement of whom, Q. Hortensius was made Dictator. He appeased them with good good words, and perswaded them to return, by promising that for the time to come their Plébiscita should have the force of Laws, and bind the whole politick body. This accordingly, by a Law called Lex Hortensia, he enacted; though it appeareth out of Livy, that the same in effect had been granted twice before, v. z. in the 305 year of the Citie, by L. Valerius, and M. Horatius the Censurs, and again in the 416. by Q. Publus Philo the Dictator, 50 years before this present, which having not been observed, might give the Commons as great distaste as the matter of debts, if we may judge from that which pacified them. * Florus telleth a story, that the businesse of Matrimony betwixt the Patricians and Plébeians caused this third separation of the Commons into the Janiculum, the tumult being raised by Canuleius the Tribune. But Students are to take notice, that none but he speak any thing of this Sedition in this place, and by the instigation of this person, for this cause of marriage. That great Contentions were raised betwixt the two orders about the taking away the Law made by the Decemviri, which forbade marriage betwixt them, is others attested by Livy. But that the Commons departed into the Janiculum for the burthen of their debts, after great and long contentions in the 468th year of the Citie, is by several Authors affirmed, and that thence they were reduced by Hortensius the Dictator, who preferred a Law in the Esculeium, that what the Commons commanded should bind all Patricies: neither do Writers mention any other cause of the third Separation.

8. Hortensius died in the time of his Magistracy. After this there was action with the Volsinenses and Lucani, against whom assistance was given to the Thurini. Then the Roman Ambassadors being killed by the Galls Senones, War was decreed against them, and L. Caelius the Prætor was cut off by them with the Legions. The Tarentines being jealous of the growth of the Roman power, had hitherto privily favoured the Samnites, though openly they maintained a confederacy with the Romans. This people, being the offspring of the Parthensæ, who were banished Lacedæmon, for that being promiscuously begotten, they could not have any inheritance, and therefore plotted against the State as was shown before, inhabited a Citie called Tarentum, from Taras a certain Heroe, the Metropolis once of Calabria, Apulia, and all Lucania. It was situate in a Peninsula on the Bay of the Adriatick Sea, famous for its height, Walls, and Haven especially, which lay so convenient for sayling into the Roman Coasts, Istria, Illyricum, Epirus, Achaia, Africa, and Sicily, that Florus accounteth the situation admirable. The Tarentines affecting, took Democratical Government, obtained great power in those parts, having a more considerable Fleet than any of their neighbours, 30000 foot, 3000 horse, and 1000 persons fit to command them. They imbraced the Philosophy of Pythagoras, especially one Archytas, who governed the Citie a long time. In after times luxury was produced by prosperity to such excess, that if credit may be given to Strabo, the Tarentines had more publick Festivals yearly, than the year hath dayes; by reason whereof, the State of the Commonwealth under such a Government was rendred much worse. One of their bad customs was (as he judgeth it) to use the Conduct of foreigners in their Wars; for against the Messapii and Lucani they employed Alexander the Molossian, and before that Archidamus the son of Agæsilæus, as afterward Cleonymus and Agathocles; and afterwards Pyrrhus against the Romans. They contended with the Messapii about Heraclæa, and employed also against them the two Kings of the Daurii and Peucezii. Neither would they obey the forein Captains for whom they had sent, but fell to odds with them, which procured no small inconvenience.

the Romans were) or as others think, having both knowledge and malice sufficient, set upon the Fleet, and either sunk, or at least riddled it, and slew the Admiral. The Senate sent L. Posthumius to complain of the injury, who delivering his message boldly was dismissed with a very dissatisfactory answer, at his coming in, having had * Urine thrown upon him, or one of his companions. War therefore was decreed against the Tarentines, and committed to the management of L. Aemilius the Consul, who first indeavoured by fair means to reclaim them, and when that could not do it, wasted their Territories with fire and sword, revenging their insolence with cruelty as Orosius writeth, for which service he triumphed the year after his Consulship, as appeareth out of an old inscription. The Tarentines finding themselves too weak for the encounter, sent to Pyrrhus King of Epirus for aid, whom they had formerly assisted against the Corcyreans. The multitude were of themselves rather inclined to peace; but a certain company of men, by Greek Authors called Demagogi (from their leading of the people) would not let them rest, till they had resolved upon the War; whereupon they sent Ambassadors to Pyrrhus, who not onely in their name, but of other Italians also Presented him with gifts, and signified that they stood in need of a General, Eminent both for abilities and reputation; Italy it self being able to furnish them with forces out of the Countreys of the Lucanians, Messapians, and Sannites. The King being of a restless spirit, encouraging himself in vain hopes (whereby he grasped as it were the Empire of all the West) promised them to come over with an Army, and dispatched before him with 3000 men One Cineas a Thessalian, an excellent Orator and Scholar of Demosthenes. He afterwards took the Sea himself with twenty Elephants, 3000 horse, and 22 foot, besides 500 Archers and Slingers; but upon the Main was seized with such a Tempest, that his Fleet being severed, many Vessels were lost, he was forced to leap out into the water, and with great hazard got to Land, and onely at present two Elephants, a very few horse-men, and about 2000 foot could be recovered from the shipwrack by the Messapians, upon the Coasts of whom they were cast.

10. Pyrrhus did nothing without the consent of the Tarentines, till his ships, and the greater part of his Army arrived; then taking notice how they minded nothing but bathing and feasting, he shut up the publick meeting places, restrained them from walking (in which exercise they were wont to discourse idly concerning War) and forbidding drinking, and Games, called them to Arms, making Levies of the youth with some rigour and severity. Valerius Maximus the Consul hastning to give him battel ere the assistance of the Confederates came, he drew out his Army to him; but before they should joyn, sent to him, offering himself an Umpire betwixt the Romans, and their adversaries, to which Valerius answered, that they neither cared for him as an Umpire, nor feared him as an Enemy, and taking his Spies, he caused them to be led throughout the Camp, and then bade them return, and tell him what they had seen. Pyrrhus pitched his Tents betwixt Pandosia and Heraclea, a Town situate betwixt Tarentum and Metapontus, built by the Tarentines. The Romans beyond the River Siris nor Liris, a River of Campania, as Florus and Orosius write, who also draw Heraclea out of that part of Magna Græcia, lying upon Siris & Metapontus, into Campania. In the fight Pyrrhus had his horse killed under him, by one Obfidius a Ferentane, who was slain in the place by his followers. This made him change Armour with one near to him, who being made at for him and struck down, his Armour was taken from off him, and being carried about by the Romans in token of his death, struck such a terrour into his Soldiers that it had cost him the victory, but that he seasonably with some labour made himself known. Whilest the victory seemed yet to be doubtfull, or rather to incline toward the Romans, the Elephants being brought into the battel decided the controversy. Till the passing of Alexander into the East, this beast had been talked of, but never seen by the Europeans nor them of Asia, except the Indians and their neighbours, as also the Southern Africans. Homer describeth the houses of rich rich men to have been adorned with Ivory, but as * Pausanias noteth, never mentioneth the beast. The Romans themselves were amazed, not knowing what they were; but the fault is laid upon their horses, which not enduring the smell nor bignesse of the Elephants broke their Ranks, which opportunity the King took, and sending his horse in amongst the Romans thus disordered, put them to the rout. He got but a bloody victory, he himself being wounded, and a great part of his men slain, though of the numbers on either side Writers do not agree.

11. Having taken prisoners 1800 of the Romans, he used them with great civility, and buried their dead, whom observing to be wounded all before, and to be with stern countenances, he lifted up his eyes, and said: He could have been Master of all the world if he had had but such Soldiers. After this having received the Auxiliaries of the Samnites, Lucans and Brutii, he marched towards Rome as far as Prænestæ, a Town 18 miles distant from the Citie, waiting all with fire and sword in his passage. Hearing that the Romans were busied in recruiting their Army, he considered it was most creditable for him to make peace with them, being he had no hopes to subdue them, and for that purpose sent Cineas to feel their minds, a man so powerfull in the art of Rhetoric, that the King acknowledged him to have stormed more Cities by his tongue, than he had ever done by force of Arms. Cineas presented the principal Citizens and their Wives with gifts from Pyrrhus; but they refused them. When he had something wrought upon the Senate to make a peace, and admit Pyrrhus into the Citie, Appius Claudius now blind came in, and by an Oration, recorded by Plutarch, procured the contrary. The Ambassadour at his return being asked what he thought of Rome, answered, that the Senate seemed to him as a Council of so many Kings. After Cineas his return the Roman sent to Pyrrhus about redeeming of prisoners, amongst others C. Fabricius, a man of great note for virtue and poverty. The King being informed by Cineas concerning his disposition, offered him Gold, which when he refused with great resolution, to try his gravity, the next day as they were talking together, he commanded the greatest Elephant he had to be set behind the hanging, and then on a sudden the Tapestry being removed, the beast held his proboscis over Fabricius his head, and roared exceedingly. But he not at all terrified, though he had never before seen this kind of Creature, smiled, and told the King, that neither his Gold the day before, nor his Elephant now did at all move him. Pyrrhus amazed at his greatnesse of mind, released to him the prisoners, on this condition, that if the Senate accepted not of peace they should return to him, which accordingly they did, having saluted their friends, and solemnized the Saturnalia, being commanded to do it by the Fathers upon pain of death.

12. P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, being Consuls for the following year, were sent against Pyrrhus. The Romans by this time had learnt not to fear Elephants with such astonishment as formerly; so that these beasts now were overcome and killed, Pyrrhus himself was wounded, 20000 of his men slain, and 5000 of the Romans, according to Eutropius, but from Livies Epirome, it should appear that the issue of this battel was doubtful, and Cicero writeth that Decius was slain. Florus relateth, that first in Apulia, and then at Asculum the Romans had better success, Curius and Fabricius being Consuls; for now the terrour of the Elephants was worn off, and C. Minutius by cutting off the proboscis from one, shewed that the beasts could die. Darts were thrown so thick upon them, and fire upon the Towers on their backs, that the Army was sorely distressed, in which condition it remained till night relieved it, and the King being the last that fled, having received a wound in his shoulder, was carried out by his Guard in his Armour. But as Florus is to be read with great caution in every place, so especially in this; for Curius and Fabricius were never Consuls together, as the Tables show. This therefore is to be referred to the ensuing year wherein C. Fabricius Luscinius, and Q. Amylius Papus (both of them the second time) were Consuls. Plutarch writeth that two dayes together Pyrrhus and the Consuls fought at Asculum; whereof, on the former, his Elephants could do him no service, but on the later, chusing a more even ground, by the means of the Elephants especially, he drove the Romans back into their Camp, having slain of them 6000; and lost 3505 of his own men, as Hieronymus relateth out of the King's Records. But he addeth, that Dionysius neither wrote any thing of two battels fought at Asculum, neither, for certain, of Pyrrhus his Victory: one fight he mentioned fought till Sun-set, at the conclusion whereof Pyrrhus was wounded in the Arm, which wound, with the Samnites rifling his baggage, put an end to it; either party having lost above 15000 men. That this battel (or those battels) fell out in the year aforesaid is clear from that which moved Pyrrhus this way to attempt the ending of the controversie. For the Consuls, Fabricius and Emilius, receiving a letter from the King's * Physician, wherein he offered to poison him, upon condition to be well requited, they wrote back to Pyrrhus to acquaint him with the treason, and in theirs included the Physicians letter. To requite the Romans for this courtesie, he sent back their prisoners gratis, and dispatched away Cineas again to treat of Peace. The Romans would neither receive their Captives in way of free gift, nor reward; but sent him so many of the Samnites and Tarentines: as for Peace, they refused to admit of any, except he would return with his forces into Epirus. He perceiving (saith Plutarch) that he must try with them another battel, marched unto Asculum. Moreover the Triumphal tables show, that in the Consulship of Fabricius and Emilius, the Romans fought with the Lucani, Brutii, Tarentines, and Samnites, at Asculum, which as * Strabo writeth, was a Town of the Piceni in the midland Country, most fortified by nature, being encompassed, besides a wall, with mountains, over which no Army could passe.

13. Pyrrhus after this action at Asculum, is reported to have answered one who congratulated with him about his successe, in this manner: If we overcome the Romans another time we are utterly lost. For he had by this time lost a great part of the Soldiers he had brought over, and almost all his friends and Captains: he had no more to send for: he perceived his Italian Allies to loiter, and the Romans to have a constant supply, whereby they presently recruited their Army, and filled up their Legions, and he saw clearly that their courage was nothing daunted by the losse of one battel, but rather their strength and resolution to be the more increased. Being pressed with these difficulties, he had presently a recourse to vain hopes, occasioned by such affaires as cast him necessarily into an anxious deliberation. For at the same time, the Agrigentines, Syracusians, and Leontines, out of Sicily, gave up themselves to him, desiring his help in casting out the Carthaginians, and clearing the Island of Tyrants: and out of Greece came intelligence, that Ptolomæus Ceraunus was slain in battel by the Galls, and therefore it was most convenient for him to come into Macedonia, now without a King. Blaming Fortune much that had conjoyned two such great opportunities, whereof the one must necessarily be omitted, after a long debate he resolved to apply himself to the matters of Sicily, as more considerable than the other of Greece, because of Africk. Having sent over Cineas beforehand to deal with the Cities about the state of affaires, he put a Garrison upon the Tarentines, who took it in ill part, requiring him either to prosecute the Warre against the Romans, for which he had been called, or clearly quitting the Country of Tarentum, to leave the City in that condition wherein he found it: But returning them no pleasant answer, he bade them stay his time, and so departed, after he had carried on the War in Italy two years and four months. For the following year, P. Cornelius Rufinus, and C. Julius Brutus, both the second time, were Consuls. Rufinus was a man very expert in War, but extraordinarily covetous and scraping, insomuch that upon this account he was much hated by Fabricius, formerly mentioned. Yet, when this year he stood for the Consulship, for that it was a very dangerous time, and his competitors were persons of no value, Fabricius laboured earnestly to have him elected, and when every one wondered at it; either to his friends, or, as

14. Pyrhus having found things in Sicily according to his mind, proceeded in his enterprize with as much satisfaction, till growing tyrannical, he incurred the hatred of those that imployed him, part of whom revolted to the Carthaginians, and others betook themselves to the aid of the Mamertines. Perceiving at length that he was involved in the deep hatred of all, and nothing throughout the Island but revolts, new councils and a strong conspiracy against him, he received letters from the Samnites and Tarentines, who being shut up in their Towns, which they hardly maintained, desired his assistance. He was glad of so specious a preence, that he might not seem to be driven by desperation out of Sicily, which indeed as a perishing Vessel in so great a Tempest he was not able to govern, and so returned into Italy, after he had been absent near as long as formerly he had there continued. The Barbarians set upon him in his passage, and the Carthaginians so distressed him the Straights, that he lost many of his ships. The Mamertines having landed, to the number of 10000 men before him, would not adventure to fight with him, but distressed his Army much in narrow and difficult places, killing two Elephants and many Men in the rear. He himself fighting in the front with a valiant and skilful Enemy, received a hurt in his head, whereupon he withdrew himself a little. This so animated the Mamertines, that one of them, great in bulck, and glittering with armour, came out far before the rest, and in a threatening manner bade Pyrhus come forth if he were alive. Pyrhus enraged with his guard, bloody as he was, and with a terrible countenance rushed through the midst, and coming up to the Barbarian, struck him with such fury upon the head, that the stroak through the swords mettal and the strength of the arm, pierced to the lower part of the body, so that in a moment it was chined down in the middle, and the two parts fell down on either side. The Barbarians astonished hereat, left off their attempts, and so without further interruption he marched with 20000 Foot, and 3000 Horse to Tarentum, where increasing his forces by new levies, he proceeded into Samnium against the Romans, who there lay incamped.

He is defeated by Curius Dentatus the Consul.

15. Few of the Samnites joyned now with him, because being so often overthrown by the Romans, their courage was wholly broken, and for that they were displeased with him for his going into Sicily. He divided his forces into two parts, whereof one he sent against L. Cornelius Lentulus into Lucania to hinder him from joyning with his Colleague M. Curius Dentatus the other Consul, against whom he marched, then lying in a fortified place near Beneventum. Hastling to set upon him ere the other could come to his relief, with the most valiant of his men, and fiercest of his Elephants picked out, he marched by night towards his Camp, but passing through Woods his lights failed him, and going out of his way he lost his time so much, that at break of day the Romans discovered him upon the hills. Curius then in haste, as he could, drew out his forces, and falling upon the vanguard of Pyrhus put it to flight, killing many men, and taking some Elephants. Animated by this successe, he descended into the Plain, and there joyned battel with the whole Army. In one wing he beat back the Enemy, in the other by the violence of the beasts was born back to his Camp, whence calling forth those who kept the guard, they from high places so plied the Elephants with darts, that they forced them back upon their own friends, whom bearing down, and breaking their ranks, they thereby procured Victory to the Romans. Florus and Orosius, contrary to what Plutarch reporteth of Beneventum (concerning which place Learned men do much doubt) make the battel to have been fought in Lucania in the Arusian Plains. Florus writeth, that the cause of the Victory was a young Elephants being wounded in the head, which turning back and roaring for the pain, the Dam hearing him, ran as to his relief, and so both of them disordered the battel, she overturning as Enemies all she met. Orosius saith, that the beasts were thus disordered by bundles of hemp besmeared with pitch, which having hooks in them and set on fire, the the Romans cast upon their backs, and the towers set thereon. Frontinus maketh the battel fought about Faventum, in the Arusinian Plains. Eutropius is silent concerning the place; but writeth, that Curius Dentatus beat Pyrrhus back to Tarentum, slew 23000 of his men, and led, the first of all others, Elephants (four in number) in triumph to Rome; which beasts the Romans called Luca boves, because they were first brought out of Lucania, where Pyrrhus was overthrown: This maketh much against that place which Plutarch assigneth for the battel, the original of whose error seemeth a mistaking of Beneventum for Faventum, or Staventum, a City of Lucania.

16. This Victory, saith Plutarch, made way for the establishment of the Roman Empire: for the Romans got such courage and reputation by this successe, that being counted invincible, they presently obtained all Italy, and not long after, Sicily also. As for Pyrrhus, he having spent six years, and fallen from his hopes both in Italy and Sicily, returned into Epirus, yet with a mind nothing daunted. He was thought the ablest Captain of all the Kings of that time, both for military skill, and personal valour; but what he had already obtained, he lost still by striving to grasp more. Therefore Antigonus compared him to a Gamester, who having lucky hits, knew not how to use them. (a) Having sent to the Kings of Asia, and Antigonus especially, for men and money, after he had received bare letters, he called the Epirots and Tarentines together, and told them, that presently assistance would come, which report being caried unto the Roman Camp, the Consuls durst not stir, and so taking this advantage, the night following, he passed over unmolested into Epirus. (b) Curius the Consul having taken his Camp, touched nothing of the plunder; and whereas the Senate gave seven Akers of ground apiece to the People, and 500 to him, he would not exceed the common proportion. This year, C. Fabricius Luscinus and Q. Aemilius Papus, much (c) commended for their poverty, being Censors, (d) removed P. Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice Consul and once Dictator, from the Senate, because they had found in his house of plate for the service of his table ten pounds; this being against a Law, as (e) Plutarch hinteth. At this Lustrum were cessed 271224 polls of Roman Citizens, as appeareth from the Epitome of the 14 Book of Livie's History.

17. The Roman name had begun to be famous before, but was terrible after the overthrow of Pyrrhus. In the second year after his flight, (a) Ptolemy Philadelphus sent Ambassadors to congratulate with the Romans about their successe, and to enter into confederacy with them. They sent, to do him honour, Ambassadors also to Alexandria, where he received them most courteously, and sent them back loaded with gifts. At their return they brought the gifts, though given to themselves in particular, into the Treasury; but the Senate commanded them to be restored. In the third year after the depature of Pyrrhus, the (b) Tarentines, being neither able to drive out the Garrison he had there left under Milo, nor procure Peace of the Romans, desired aid of the Carthaginians, wherewith giving the Romans battel, they were overthrown. Milo sensible how badly he was able to resist, by leave from the Consul Papirius, departed with his men, and left the Castle, which the Romans having got into their hands, easily mastered the City, the walls whereof they demolished. Peace and liberty was granted to the Citizens, and the two Consuls L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Cornelius Maximus (both Consuls the second time) triumphed, having finished both the Tarentine War and that of the Samnites in the 481 (or 482) year of the City, as the Capitoline tables do shew. The greatest part of Italy was now conquered, an accession being made not onely of the Tarentines and Samnites, but the Lucanians also, and a little before of the Etruscans. After this, the (c) Campanian Legion, which without command had seized upon Rhegium was besieged, and upon surrender was put to death. The inhabitants of Apollonia in Illyricum sending Ambassadors to Rome, the two Ediles Q. Fabius and Cn. Apronius beat them, and for that were delivered up to the Apollonians.

War.

1. THe Umbri and Sallentini being newly subdued, and the number of Quaestors being increased to eight, the Romans took occasion to transfer their Armies over the Sea into Sicily, and begun that, which from the Island (that gave both occasion to, and was the seat of, it) is by Greek Writers called the Sicilian War. There had the Mamertines most perfidiously seized on Messana, as is already related, and thereupon were become Enemies to Hiero King of Syracuse, who besieged them justly as thieves and murderers, and had taken the City, but that Annibal the Carthaginian cunningly diverted him, with an intention to get it into his own hands, as it came to passe; for pretending fair things to the Mamertines, as before to Hiero, and sending them in provisions, he possessed himself of the Castle. They being thus cheated by him, and now straightened by both, who had joyned together against them, betook themselves to the Romans for relief. The Senate began to be very sensible of the power of the Carthaginians, who had now almost the whole Island in their hands, and was jealous of their approach so near to Italy; so that a just quarrel with them seemed very acceptable. But so bad was the cause of the Mamertines, as they could not in conscience undertake the patronage of it, and gave them a denial. From the Senate the thing was brought to the People, which besides it's antient use to debate matters concerning War, had by the Hortensian Law obtained power by it's Plebiscita to bind the whole State. The Prators shewed what great profit would redound to the Commonwealth in general, and particularly to private Citizens (who having suffered much by the late Italian Wars, were desirous by a new one to recruit their fortunes) and therefore by a Plebiscitum they decreed aid to be sent to the Mamertines, in the 489 year of the City, Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgus the third time, and L. Mamilius Vitulus being Consuls.

2. In the year following, and the Consulship of Appius Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, Appius was sent over with an Army to Messana, to execute the commands of the People. He first defeated Hiero, then the Carthaginians, and so raised the siege. The succeeding Consuls Manius Octavius and M. Valerius Maximus, were ordered both, and with all the Legions, to passe into Sicily, wherewith Hiero was affrighted into obedience, receiving that the Romans were most likely to remain Victors, and made his Peace upon these terms, To restore all their prisoners without ransom, and pay 100 Talents of Silver. The Romans imbraced his friendship the more readily, for that the Carthaginians being masters at Sea, they could not well send over provisions, which they hoped might be supplied by him in good measure. They also by this alliance thought themselves eased of the burthen of War, and therefore the next year they sent over but two Legions. Valerius the Consul from Messana had the surname of Messala, who also having taken Catana,

Catana, carried thence a new Sundial to Rome, Papirius Cursor having thirty years before set up the first that ever was in that City. This though not perfect, the People used 99 years, till M. Philippus their Censor set up a perfect one by it, and about the same time Scipio Nasica being Censor, first divided the equal division of the day into hours, by water dropping out of one vessel into another. This Pliny relateth out of Varro, who also reported, that out of Sicily the first Barbers were brought to Rome by P. Licinius Mena, about the 454 year of the City, before which time the Romans never cut their hair. The first that was shaven every day was Strep. Africanus, whom Augustus imitated therein, none more using the Razor than he.

3. the next year was Agigentum taken after a long siege; Hannibal who came to raise it being overthrown by L. Posthumus and Q. Mamilius the Consuls. The news whereof filled Rome with excessive joy, and the Citizens now elevated in mind, would not acquiesce in former Councils. It seemed not sufficient to them, that they had saved the Mamertines, nor enriched themselves with great booty: but conceiving good hope that they might be able to cast the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and much thereby promote their affairs, they thitherto directed their thoughts and consultations. On Land indeed they seemed sufficiently to prosper, for L. Valerius and T. Ostacilius the succeeding Consul, managed the War very well; but the Carthaginians without controversie being Masters at Sea, thereby procured the Maritime Towns to revolt to them, so that the War was poised betwixt the two interests, now inclining to one side, and then presently to the other. Moreover Italy was often molested by the Carthaginian Fleet; but Africa out of all danger. Wherefore they concluded, there was necessity of betaking themselves also to Sea matters. Having never as much as thought of the Sea before, they now set upon building of 100 Quinqueremes and 20 Triremes, a thing most difficult, because the Carpenters were utterly to seek how to make the former sort of Gallies, their use being utterly unknown to the Italians. But before they had made trial, when they first transported their forces to Messana, they ventured to fight with the Carthaginians, who had received the Dominion of the Sea, without any competition from their Ancestors; which boldness and confidence Polybius esteemeth no lesse than miraculous. First of all Cn. Cornelius the Consul and Admiral, going with seven Vessels to reduce a Town of the Lipareans, was taken in the Haven by one sent from Hannibal. But Dulius his Collegue presently after gave the Carthaginians a great overthrow, the Soldiers having provided iron hooks, by the help of which they could board them and fight as on Land. The Romans hereby extraordinarily animated, relieved the Acraeans, and took Macella a certain Town by storm. But Amilcar Captain of the Carthaginian Land-forces then lying at Panormus, understanding that in the Roman Camp there was a mutiny, for that the Auxiliaries and Legions contended who should have the first place in battel; and that the former had separated themselves, he suddenly fell upon them in their removal, and killed almost 4000 men. Hannibal after his losse at Sea departed to Carthage, where recruiting his Naval forces he went into Sardinia, and being blocked up in a port by the Romans, lost many ships, and for that was crucified by the Soldiers, who overlived the defeat. The punishment which he feared for the former overthrow he craftily evaded; for, before the thing was heard at Carthage, he sent one of his friends thither, who coming to the Court, told the Senate that the Roman Admiral was come with a great Fleet, and therefore he was come to ask their advice whether he should fight him. All the Senate answered, there was no doubt but he ought, to which the messenger replied, he hath fought and is overthrown. By this means he hindered them from condemning that fact, which before they had judged that it ought to be done.

4. Now had the Romans passed both into Sardinia and Corfica; Divine Providence as Cassaubon noteth upon Polybius, so ordering it, that present successe should dispose their minds for such future undertakings, as made way for

SECT. 2. for their decreed Empire. (a) Hanno, the year following, being in Sardinia was slain, and his Army cut off by L. Cornelius Scipio the Consul. The next, many Towns were lost and taken in Sicilie on both sides. But (b) Calpurnius Flamma a Roman Tribune (or Leader of a Legion) gave a great demonstration of his valour. For A. Attilius Calatinus the Consul, having rashly brought the Army into such straights, out of which there was no possibility to extricate himself, he with 300 men took an hill near adjoining, and drew thereby the Carthaginians to himself, till the Army could passe through without opposition. All the 300 were slain, yet he sorely wounded and covered with dead bodies survived, being by Roman Writes compared, for this act, to Leonidas the Spartan. This story is twice told by Julius Frontinus, who acquainteth us with the uncertainty of the man's name, some calling him Laberius, others Q. Caditius, but most Calpurnius Flamma. The following year, C. Attilius Regulus the Consul subdued the Islands Lipara and Melita, whereof the later is ennobled by the ship-wrack of St. Paul, lying betwixt Sicily and Africk. Polybius writeth, that first Regulus was worsted at Sea, and then he defeated the Carthaginians. Now the Romans resolved to change the seat of the War into Africk, and the next year sent a Fleet under command of the Consuls M. Attilius Regulus (who was substituted in the place of Caditius) and L. Manlius, containing 330 long and covered ships. The Carthaginians sensible enough how concerned they were to keep the War from their own dores, opposed them with 350 Vessels, and a threefold battel was fought on the same day, in which the Romans remained Victors, having taken 64 ships with the defendants, and sunk 30, and of their own lost 24, but not with the men; for the Carthaginians fearing their Corvi or iron hooks, were afraid to come near them. Repairing then the ships they had taken, they passed over into Africk, and had surrendered to them Clupea a City seated upon the Promontory Hermæa. This done, they sent to the Senate for further orders, employing themselves, till the return of the messengers, in wasting the Country, which they did without interruption. At length they received the resolution of the Senate, which was, that one of them should continue in Africk with a convenient Army, and the other return to Rome with the remaining forces.

5. (a) M. Attilius Regulus remained in Africk with 40 ships, 15000 Foot, and 500 Horse. Pitching his Camp upon the River Bragada, or Bagrada, he was forced to make (b) War with a Serpent of a miraculous bignesse, which with the great trouble of his whole Army, and use of Engines for battery, at length he slew, and sent it's skin, 120 foot long, to Rome. The history hereof was curiously and elegantly related by Livius, as (c) Valerius telleth us. After this, (d) the Consul gave the Carthaginians a defeat, fighting in such a place where their Horse and Elephants could do them no service, and then took Tunctum or Tunis. But not long after he was overthrown himself, taken prisoner, and almost his whole Army lost; this Victory being got for the Carthaginians by Xantippus, the Lacedemonian, whom afterwards sending honourably home as they pretended, they commanded those that carried him to drown him and his in the Sea, lest so great a Victory should be ascribed to the Lacedemonians, as Appian writeth. Of 30000 but a few escaped into the City Aspis (called also Clupea) where they were besieged, till their Enemies perceiving they profited nothing, rose up and made provision for resisting the succours which the Senate sent the following year, under command of M. Aemilius Paulus and Ser. Fabius Nobilior, the Consuls. They taking the Sea with 350 ships were opposed by the Carthaginians, whom they defeated, and took 114 of their Vessels with the men in them, as Polybius writeth, or took 30 and sank 104, as Eusebius and Orosius, the later whereof adderth, that of the Carthaginians were slain 35000, and that the Romans lost nine Gallies and 1100 men. The Consuls then went to Clupea, but, taking in the reliques of the Army, presently set sail again for Sicily. The Pilots told them they must take heed of the outward part of that Island, which was full of shelves and very dangerous, especially at that time betwixt betwixt the rising of Orion and the Dog. But they gave no heed to the Seamen, out of a desire, by shewing of their fresh Victory and Piunder, to procure certain Towns upon the Coasts to yield. They had safely passed the middle of the sea, and drew near to the Coasts of Camarina, when such a tempest and so great calamities fell upon them, as cannot be expressed, saith Polybius, for the greatnesse therereof. For, of 464 ships, 80 scarcely were saved, and the rest were swallowed up, or cast upon rocks, so that the shoar was filled with dead bodies, and broken pieces of ships. Both the Consuls perished. Those few that escaped Hiero kindly received, and furnishing them with clothes and other necessaries, coveyed them safe to Messana. Karibalo the Carthaginian taking advantage of this disaster, besieged, conquered, and burnt Agigentum, the walls whereof he also demolished.

6. The Romans nothing at all discouraged by the greatest losse that ever a tempest procured, gave order for the making of 220 Gallies, which was prosecuted with such alacrity, that in three moneths time they were both made and lanch'd. Asdrubal the Carthaginian with all the old Army, new levies, and 140 Elephants, came into Sicily, and of old and new Vessels made up a Fleet of 200 sail. The Consuls A. Attilius and Cn. Cornelius being commanded to passe into Sicily, therein, this year, took several Towns, and returned. Their successors C. Servilius Capio and C. Sempronius Blaso, in the beginning of the next Spring with all the Fleet passed into Sicily, and thence into Africk, where coasting about they landed in many places, but did nothing memorable. At length they came to the Island of the Lotophagi called Meninx, not far distant from the lesser Syria. Here they fell upon some quicks in the low water, and were in great danger, being utterly ignorant of the Coasts, but the tide returning, when they had lightned the ships, cleared them off the shelves, and they returned in a kind of flight to Panormus in Sicily. Then passing hence towards Rome through the Straights very unadvisedly, such a tempest fell upon them, as above 150 ships were lost. Though the Senate and People were marvailously pricked forward to all attempts by desire of glory, yet so many and great were their losses at Sea, that they were constrained to omit naval preparations, and place all their hope in the land forces. They sent L. Caelius Metellus and Cn. Furius Pacilus the Consuls into Sicily with the Legions, and 60 ships onely, for the conveying of necessaries to the Army. And not onely did they plainly yield the Dominion of the Sea to the Carthaginians, but feared them also on Land, because of their Elephants, which had often times done them great damage. Asdrubal the Punic General understanding their fears, and how one of the Consuls was returned back into Italy with half of the Army, in great confidence wasted the grounds about Panormus, and the more carelessly, because Metellus kept himself within the walls. But the Consul taking an opportunity, so placed his men in respect of the Elephants, that when the Carthaginians came against the Town, he overthrew them, slew 20000, and took 26 Elephants, according to Eutropius. But Orosius writeth, that 26 were slain, and 104 taken: and Livie related, as appeareth by the Epitome of his nineteenth Book, that 120 Elephants were led in triumph, with thirteen Captains of the Enemy. Diodorus Siculus maketh the occasion of the overthrow to have been given by the Celtae, in Asdrubals Army, who meeting with wine brought thither by Merchants, so ingurgitated themselves therein, that being not themselves, they broke the ranks and turned all into disorder, which opportunity Metellus instantly improved.

7. This defeat caused the Carthaginians to desire Peace, and offered to send to the Senate about it. Amongst the Messengers was Attilius Regulus whom they had overthrowen, and taken prisoner, five years before, and now bound with an oath to return to Carthage, in case neither Peace nor exchange of prisoners could be procured. He when he came to Rome, according to what he thought of the interest of the Commonwealth, dissuaded the Senate from Peace; and yet to keep his oath returned to Carthage, where he was cruelly tormented to death; and as * Cicero writeth, by hunger and watching, having his eye-lids cut off. The year following, because the Land-forces were very fearful of the Carthaginian Elephants, and very uncheerfully went about their work, the Romans provided another Fleet, and besieged Lilybaeum, a Town standing upon the southern Promontory of Sicily, over-against Africk, but without successe; within a while the Navy was brought to nothing, and Amilcar Barcas being sent from Carthage troubled Italy with his inroads and depredations. For seven years then did they abstain from the Sea; but being sorely disturbed by Amilcar, they resolved once more to try their fortune that way, and a Fleet was provided, and furnished out of their private purses, the Treasury being now exhausted. With this they gave such a blow to the Carthaginians near the Islands Agates, under conduct of C. Lutatius Catulus the Consul, as made them give commission to Amilcar to conclude a Peace, if he found it requisite. Though he was, as to his own disposition, much averse to it, yet seeing it necessary for his Countrey's welfare, he made an agreement with Lutatius upon these terms, if the Romans would approve them; viz. That the Carthaginians should wholly quit Sicily; make no War upon the Syracusians or their allies; release without ransom all prisoners, and pay within the space of twenty years 2200 Talents of Silver. This pleased not the People, and therefore ten men were sent into Sicily, with full authority to conclude the Peace, who shortened the time of payment, added 1000 talents to the former sum, and further cautioned that the Carthaginians should not onely quit Sicily, but all the Islands also betwixt it and Italy. Thus ended the first Punick War, after it had continued 24 years, and Lilybaeum had been besieged ten; in the 513 year of the City, the fourth of the 134 Olympiad, the sixth of Seleucus Callinicus, and the sixth of Ptolomy Evergetes, A. M. 3764, 239 before the birth of Christ, A. Manlius Torquatus the second time, and Q. Lutatius Cerco being Consuls.

8. The Carthaginians submitted to the terms of this Peace, that they might recruit themselves by a cessation; but the Peace procured them greater danger than the War could well have done. For, Amilcar Barcas, after the ratification, drew down the forces to Lilybaeum, and giving them up into the hands of Gesco to be transported, laid down his Office. Gesco wisely considering what danger there was of such a multitude of Mercenaries it's falling into sedition (especially because they wanted their pay, which the publick Treasury already exhausted could not afford them) conveyed them into Africk by small companies together. But his Superiours, either through inadvertency, or for want of money, dismissed them not as they arrived; but stayed them till all should come together, with intention to prevail for an abatement of their wages. The City growing full, many outrages were committed by the Soldiers, which caused the Townsmen to procure their Captains to lead them out to Sicca a Town not far off, and when they left their baggage behind them, as intending shortly to return to Carthage, they fearing their unwillingnesse to depart, or their speedy return, because of their wives and children, in the carriages, forced them to take all away. When they were come to Sicca, they fell into greater licentiousnesse through want of employment, and demanded larger pay than formerly they had pretended to, expecting also great rewards promised them by their Captains in dangerous adventures. As soon as they were all come thither, Hanno the Carthaginian Prator was sent to them, who was so far from curing, that he heightened the distemper.

9. He not onely brought none of those things with him which they expected, but complaining of the emptinesse of the Treasury, talked of abating something of their constant wages. This put the multitude into a rage, into which having once fallen, it was hard to be appeased, as upon other accounts, so through the diversity of their speech, things being either misrepresented by unskilful interpreters, or misunderstood by them who were willing enough to be mistaken. Breathing nothing but fury and violence, they took Arms, and in despite of Hanno and the other Officers marched toward Carthage, and and encamped at Tunis, fifteen miles from the City, to the number of 20000. The Carthaginians affrighted at the multitude resolved to satisfy them; but then the Mercenaries perceiving how they were feared, every day invented what to add to their demands, requiring besides their pay the price of their horses lost in the War; and, after this was granted, Provision for several years, which they said was behind. Their late Masters not daring to deny them any thing, prevailed that some one who had commanded them in Sicily should be chosen as Moderator, and the whole matter left to him.

10. The Soldiers made choice of Gesco, as one who had best deserved of them. And he laboured to pacify them all he might, and was about to pay them their Arrears. But there being in the Army one Spendius, a Campanian of Italy by birth, but by condition a Roman slave, who having ran away from his Master, wanted neither strength nor courage; and one Mathos an African; the former fearing to be tortured to death if his Master caught him, as the Roman manner was, and the later though free, fearing to be called to account for his too great forwardness in the late fits, sought how to drive all things into extremity, that they might procure a War, inveighing grievously against Gesco and the Carthaginians, as having a design as soon as the rest were dispersed and gone home, to spend their rage against the Africans. The multitude herewith were strangely incensed, so that who ever attempted to speak, before they could be heard what they would say, were all stoned to death except these two. Gesco yet would not cease to do his duty, but went from one Nation to another, labouring to pacify them; but when the Africans demanded allowance for their Provisions, he bade them ask it of Mathos their Captain. This so transported them, that they plundered the goods of the Carthaginians, with all the money he had brought for the discharging of the Army, and binding him and his followers in a contumelious manner cast them into prison.

11. By the advice of Mathos they rebelled against the Carthagians, and so began the War called Libycum and Africum, as also Σειμὸν. Their numbers being increased to 70000. Matho and Spendius now created Generals, divided their forces, and besieged Ulica and Hippacra. Hanno was sent from Carthage to the relief of the Ulicans, and at the first onset drove away the besiegers; but entering the Town, and loitering there, they set upon his Camp without, and killing many, took all his Engines, and other things prepared for the War. His Superiours troubled hereat, created Captain Amilcar Barca, and sent him into the field with 70 Elephants, and 10000 men. There he was encompassed by the Africans on his Front, the Numidians on his Rear, and Spendius on his Flank, where Naravasus a Numidian with 2000 of his followers revolted to him. Encouraged by this addition he engaged with his Enemies, causing his men so to face about as the Front became the Rear, whereby seeming to be in confusion, the Mercenaries thought they ran, and breaking their Ranks to pursue them, he took this opportunity, and setting on them out of order obtained the victory, having slain 10000, and taken 4000 prisoners.

12. He gave Arms to all such prisoners as would serve under him, and having exhorted the rest to fight no more against the Carthaginians, dismissed them freely. Spendius and Matho, together with Antaricus Captain of the Galls, hearing this, doubted how far his clemency, especially the offer of indemnity, might prevail with the Africans and others, and consulted how to obviate this his design by setting the multitude at irreconcilable enmity with the Carthaginians. To this purpose they feigned Letters to be sent out of Sardinia from their friends, giving them to understand, that certain amongst them held intelligence with the Enemy, and advising them to keep close Gesco, and the other with him. Spendius taking hereat occasion, earnestly advised them not to trust to the pretended clemency of Amilcar, and by no means to permit Gesco to escape; for thereby they should incur the contempt of their Enemies, and by strengthening them through the assistance of so great a Captain, not a little damnify their own affairs. Whilst he yet spake

SECT. 2. another Carrier brought Letters as from Tunis of the same Contents with the former; and then Amilcar openly protested, that whosoever had any regard to the kindnesse of the Carthaginians could not be faithfull, and therefore such were to be heard as perswaded the most bitter things against Carthage; all others being Traitors and Enemies. Then did he perswade them to Torture Gesco to death, with such as were now with him, and all that hereafter should be taken. There were many which spoke against this cruelty, especially as Gesco was concerned in it; but for some time they were not understood, speaking in their own languages, and when what they aimed at was fully known, some one cried out Strike them, which so provoked the multitude, that they forthwith stoned them. After this, bringing forth Gesco, and the other Carthaginians to the number of 700, they cruelly tormented them to death; and made a decree, that whomsoever of them for the time to come they should take, he should be used in the same manner, and if any of their Allies were taken, his hands being cut off, he should be sent back to Carthage. This they very carefully afterwards observed, having also refused to deliver the dead bodies to the Messengers that came for them, and threatned, if any more came, to deal with them as they had used Gesco.

Amilcar United the Carthaginian forces.

Mathos and Spendius elevated by their success in besieging Carthage.

Amilcar forced them to break up.

13. Amilcar seeing into what Straights he was cast by this boldnesse of the Mercenaries, sent for Hanno, judging that an end might sooner be put to the War if the forces of the State were all United. Such of the Enemies as he took in the heat of the fight he killed, as he might by the Law of War, or taking them alive, cast them to wild beasts. When he thought that he had brought matters into a fair way of recovery, they presently relapsed into a far worse condition than ever. For, the ships that brought Provisions miscarried by force of Tempest; Sardinia at the same time revolted from them, which was wont to supply them with large Provisions; and Hippacrita and Ulica which hitherto had remained faithfull, now revolted without any manifest cause. Mathos and Spendius herewith elevated, resolved to lay siege to Carthage it self, and shortly after performed it. The Carthaginians in this their distresse betook themselves to their neighbours, whereof the Romans, and Hiero King of Syracuse in Sicily, being sensible of the sawcinesse of their Enemies, were ready to do them all good Offices. Herewith better enabled, they held out, and Amilcar lying abroad, so cut off all Provisions from the Mercenaries, that being no other than besieged themselves, they were forced at length to rise up and depart, resolving to observe Amilcar's motions, and ly in wait for him on the sides of the Mountains; for they would not venture to take the plain, being afraid of his Elephants, and the horse of Naravasens; and otherwise they were much inferiour to the Carthaginians, who far surpassed them in Military skill, though but equal to them in valour.

14. But Amilcar singling them out by parties, killed many of them, and when they engaged with their whole force cut them off by stratagems: sometimes by day, otherwhiles by night he would fall upon them on a sudden with great terrour; and such of them as he took he cast them to the beasts. At length he compassed them about in such a place, as, though they were afraid to fight, they could not escape, and being shut up within a Ditch and Rampire, they were forced to devour one another. Though they now could expect no mercy, yet they sent to desire a Parley, and having obtained leave, Auravelus, Zarxas, Spendius, and other Captains were ordered to manage it. It was agreed that the Carthaginians should pick out ten men whom they pleased, and the other be dismissed in their Coats. The Covenants being finished, Amilcar declared that he made choice of those who were present, and so got the most eminent Leaders into his power. The Africans understanding that their Officers were seized, took Arms in great haste, but Amilcar with his Elephants and his Army compassing them in on every side, put them to the sword. For the improvement of this success, he and Annibal went and besieged Mathos in Tunis, before the Walls whereof he nailed Spendius to a Crosse

Crosse with the rest of the Captives. Annibal pitching his Camp on that side of the Town towards Carthage, carelessly demeaned himself, which Mathos considering, made a Sally, and killing many, took much plunder, and amongst other prisoners Annibal himself, whom bringing to Spendius his Cross, after he had taken down his Collegue's body, he nailed him to it, and killed 30 more of the most noble Carthaginians.

15. It was long ere Amilcar knew of this disaster, and when he did, for the distance of place, and difficulty of passage, he could give no relief. Marching therefore from Tunis, he ste down by the mouth of the River Macarus, and his Superiours at Carthage making new Levies joyned Hanno in Commission with him. These two, after several passages, at length agreed to fight one set battel with the Enemy, who consenting, a bloody contest ensued, wherein at length the Carthaginians had the better. A great part of the Africans were slain, and the rest fled to a neighbouring Citie, where not long after they yielded themselves, and Mathos was taken alive. The subjects of Carthage now turned to obedience all, except they of Hippacrita and Huca, who being past hope of mercy from their intraged Lords, seemed resolved to stand out; but Hanno and Amilcar bringing their forces, constrained them to submit to such conditions as the Carthaginians would lay upon them. Mathos, and those that were with him being carried to the Citie, was used with all sorts of contumely and torment, and so this Libyan War ended, having lasted three years, and almost four moneths, being, saith Polybius, the most cruel and wicked that ever we heard of. But it gave the Carthaginians occasion to repent of two great errors, viz. Trusting so great a multitude of Mercenaries together when they were idle; and the cruel, and tyrannical usage of their subjects.

16. The Romans, (that we may return to them the History of whom is our proper subject) though they observed the League during these troubles, and at length, as was said, gave the Carthaginians also reason to like well of their friendship, yet thought they had some cause to be angry with them. For such of their subjects as sayled from Italy into Africa, they seized on, lest they should carry Provisions to their Enemies, and had at Carthage almost 500 of such kind of men in prison. Yet when Ambassadors were sent to complain hereof, they kindly dismissed all those in custody, which so affected the Romans, that they also sent them all their prisoners, gave them all they asked, and permitted their Merchants to carry them necessaries, forbidding them to Traffick with their Enemies: they also refused to hearken to such of the Carthaginian Mercenaries as having betrayed their trust invited them into Sardinia. But though Polybius telleth us that this they did; yet it appeareth from him also that this modesty continued but for a time. For, allured, as it seemeth, by this invitation, they sayled thither, which much offended the Carthaginians, who thought that the place by far more right belonged to them; so that they prepared to send forces into the Island. The Romans took occasion hereat to decree War against them, complaining that these forces were not designed so much against the Sardinians as themselves, which forced the other, who found themselves in no good case to manage the War with them, to give way to the time, and quit not onely Sardinia, but pay further to the Romans 1200 Talents. This, though submitted to at present, bred such grudges and malice, as at length brake out into another War, a more dangerous and bloody than the former, as will appear.

SECT. 2. But whereas he is said by Gellius first to have made or taught playes as Rome, it is to be understood of these two sorts of Poetry now mentioned, (c) Va- (c) Lib. 2, 6, 4. lerius Maximus telling us, that he drew the minds of the spectators to those shews from the use of Satires, which by little and little succeeded that most antient and plain Roman sport of the Histriones brought out of Etruria, (as we shewed before) for the stopping of the Pestilence, through the command of the Oracle. These Ludi Scenici were first managed with rude gestures, and incompounded Songs, called Versus Fescennini from Fescennium a City of Hebruria. From these jocular speeches, which at random were wont to be uttered at the Roman solemnities, came the Satire, as later in time so more elaborate, and as for metre a perfect Poeme containing ridiculous things digested into Verse, which they were wont to utter amongst themselves, after the antient custom. It differed as much from that of the Greeks, as from the rest differeth Dramatick Poetry, whereof the Romans at this time knew not so much as the name. A Satire being afterwards variously handled by the Romans, at length was reduced to two sorts, which Fabius onely acknowledged. The former was found out by Lucilius, and the later ennobled by Varro. Horace mentioneth two kinds of most antient Poetry; one whereof they used in the praise of their gods, as when they appeased Tellus with a sow-pig, and Sylvanus with milk: the other, when in jest and sport they jeered one another, being the same with the Fescennine Verses, whence came the Satires, to which Livius Andronicus added the playes of Comedies and Tragedies, as was observed.

Games.

18. Four years after, were celebrated at Rome the third time the Secular Games, concerning which it is convenient to speak in this place, that beginners may know the differences of Roman exercises. These were called Ludi Magni, as others were, (in opposition to the Scenici, and games made by private men) and Ludi Terentini (not Tarentini, whereof Students are to beware) from Terentius a place in the Campus Martius where they were celebrated. But there were other games called also Terentini Ludi (which some not considering have run into confusion) and that more properly than these Secular ones were, and therefore the rise of them all is to be related. There was one Valesius a man of prime note, amongst the Sabines, who living near Eretus, and not far from Tiber, in a great Plague, had two sons and a daughter which fell dangerously sick. Amongst his prayers for them, he heard a voice that they should recover, if carrying them to Terentius, he would fetch them some warm water of Tiber from the altar of Pluto and Proserpina. He thought the City Tarentum was meant; and doubted how he should come by any Tiberine water in that remote part of Italy; but resolving to be obedient, he sailed down the River towards Ostia, and late at night arrived at the Campus Martius, where he understood there was a place called Terentius. Landing here, he gave his children some warm water, wherewith refreshed they fully recovered, and told their father, how in a dream they had seen a certain god, who commanded, that at the altar of Pluto and Proserpina black coloured sacrifices (fuma hostia) should be offered, as also that Lectisternes (beds made for the cause of sacrifice, as whereon to lye down after the Roman fashion at a solemn feast) and night games should be made. Valesius seeing no altar in the place, thought of making one, when, as his slaves were digging for that purpose, they found one in the earth dedicated to Pluto and Proserpina. Here then he sacrificed, and three nights together, because of the number of his children, made Lectisternes and Games, being afterwards from this thing named Manius Valesius Terentinus. Zoximus writeth, that the Romans 100 years before being to fight with the Albans, were admonished to build this altar in the earth, and that having sacrificed they covered it. But this passage concerning Valesius hapned about the twelfth year of Servius Tullius, wherein he founded the Lustrum; in the 188 of the City, and the same wherein the Panathenea were instituted (or rather reduced to the course of five years, being formerly instituted by Thefens) at Athens, this being the third year of the 53 Olympiad.

The Terentine and Sæcular Games confounded,

Which much perplexed Censorinus.

The difficulty resolved by Jacobus Cappellus.

Observations concerning the Centenaries.

19. This was the Original of Terentine Games, which some have confounded with the Sæcular. For, the next that were celebrated were made by Valerius Poplicola in the year following the banishment of Tarquinius, which Zozimus calleth Games of Pluto and Proserpina, and * Censorinus, from Antias the Historian, giveth them the name of Sæcular. This confusion cast Censorinus into such a perplexity about the Sæcular Games, that he thus expresseth the uncertainty of the Roman intervals of times and ages, 'Some think the Roman ages to be distinguished by the Sæcular Games; which, if it be so, the manner of the Roman age is uncertain. For, concerning the intervals of times, wherein these Games ought to be celebrated, we are not onely ignorant how great they were formerly, but what they ought to be for the time to come. For, Antias and other Historians, with Varro and Livy, have written, that they ought to be made every hundred year. But on the contrary, both the Commentaries of the Quindecimviri (or 15 men) and the edicts of Augustus testifie, that they ought to be reiterated every hundred and tenth, as * Horatius Flaccus also saith. Further, if we search the annals of ancient times, we shall yet be in greater uncertainty by far. For, Valerius Antias saith, that the first Sæcular Games were made after the banishment of the Kings, 245 years after the building of Rome by Valerius Publicola: But the commentaries of the 15 Men say, that 298 years M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius being Consuls. The second Games Antias will have made in the 305 year of the City, but its written in the Commentaries of the 15 Men, in the 408, M. Valerius Corvinus the second time, and C. Patillius being Consul: and so he proceedeth.

20. * Jacobus Cappellus dissolveth the difficulty in this manner. The cause of this perplexity which troubles Censorinus is this. All Sæcular Games are Terentine, but all Terentine Games are not Sæcular. For some were made upon some occasion, as those which Valerius Publicola made this 245 year of the City, and Valesius about the year 188. These were Terentine Games but not Sæcular. Now, the Sæcular are of two sorts. The greater, which perhaps thou mayst not call amisse * Quindecimvirales, were celebrated at the distance of 110 years. Of this kind the first were made by the command of the Quindecimviri, in the 298 year of the City, 110 years, as it seemeth, after the first Terentine Games made by Valesius. So, the Valesian shall fall in the 188 of the City. The first of the Quindecimviri were made in the 298 year of the City, the Second in the 408, the Third in the 518, and the Fourth in the 628. The lesser Sæculum, or Age, consisted but of 100 years, instituted as it seemeth, by L. Valerius, after the banishment of the Decemviri, that year being according to some the 300 of the City. So the First Centenarie Games agree with the 305 Varronian year of the City, the Second with the 405, the Third with the 505, the Fourth with the 605.

21. Though the Second of the Centenaries should have been celebrated in the 405 year, yet (whether it happened through the Gallick War or otherwise) they were not till that following, wherein M. Popilius Lanus the fourth time, and L. Cornelius Scipio were Consuls, as Zozimus writeth. These Censorinus hath omitted and four more, if credit be given to the inscription of a certain stone mentioned by George Herwart, from which it should appear, that before this year were celebrated three Sæcular Games, viz. in the 100, 200, and 300 years, according to the account of Pistor, and the 105, 205, and 305, according to that of Varro. Two Solemnities also at the distance of 110 years, as in the 188 and 298, after the account of Varro, to which may be added those made by Poplicola extraordinarily in the 245 year. So that the Games celebrated this year (viz. in the 406) may rightly be called the seventh Games. The Quindecimvirals (or those of 100 years) continued till Constantine's time, who forbade them to be celebrated in the 1067 year of the City. His son Constantius also prohibited the Centenaries, which in his time fell in the 1100 year of the City. Fifty seven years after, the Heathen got leave of Honorius to celebrate the SECT. 2. Terentine Games again in his sixth Consulship (for which Claudian thanks him) 200 years after they had been kept by Severus. But to return, these Third Sacular Games which gave occasion to this discourse, and were celebrated in the 518 year of the City, and the fifth after the first Punick Warre, P. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Licinius Varus being Consuls, were those of the Quindecimviri, or of the interval of 110 years; that we may note thus much for the information of Students.

The Temple of Janus shut the second time.
The first divorce.

Cn. Nevius the Poet.

22. In the sixth year after the first Punick War (a) the Temple of Janus was shut at Rome now the second time, all things being in quiet, and the Romans having no Wars any where after the reducement of Sardinia by T. Manlius Torquatus the Consul. In the following year, being the 520 of the City, the first (b) divorce was made by Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who, though he did it under a specious pretence of his wives barrenness, was ever ill-willed for it by the People. This same year was M. Porcius (c) born in the precincts of Tusculum, who had the name of (d) Cato for his wisdom; Catus in the Roman language (whence the diminutive Catulus) signifying sagacious, acute, or ingenious. And this year did Cn. Nevius the Poet (e) publish plays to the People, who wrote also the first Punick war, (wherein he served) in the most ancient kind of Verse called Saturnii Versus, which were succeeded by the Fescennini, some being with metre, and some without. He died in the 30 year after this, and left a proud (f) Epitaph of his own making, which he commanded should be ingraven on his Tomb, and Gellius hath recorded together with those of Plautus and Pacuvius.

The Illyrians infest the Italians at sea.

23. Five years the Temple of Janus continued shut, and in the sixth was opened by a War with the Illyrians. For, Tenta Queen of that Nation, the widow of Agron (who for joy that he had prospered in his enterprises against the Aeolians, drank so hard, that he fell into a Pleurisie, and thereof died) elevated by her prosperity in Peace, gave out commissions to her Subjects to rob all at Sea whomsoever they met with. The Illyrians then having taken Phanice a strong City of Epirus, struck a great terror into all the maritime parts of Greece, and setting upon the Italian Merchants, some they robbed, others they killed, and not a few they carried away prisoners. The Romans having hitherto neglected all complaints against them, when now many came together, sent unto Illyricum Caius and Lucius Coruncani, to inform themselves concerning these matters. Tenta answered, she would take care that no publick injury should be offered to the Romans, but it was not the custom to hinder any from making what private commodity they could out of the Sea. But saith Lucius, the Romans have a good custom publickly to prosecute private injuries, and to relieve the injured: therefore we will shortly endeavour, God willing, to constrain thee to amend these customs. The Queen took this liberty of speech so hainously, that her womanish impotency and anger prevailed against the Law of Nations, to have some sent after the Ambassadors, who killed Lucius. For this, War was decreed against her, and both the Consuls of the 525 year of the City, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and L. Posthumus Albinus Consul the second-time, were sent into Illyricum; Fulvius with the Navy, and his Colleague with the Land-Army.

Whence a War ensueth.

Peace is granted to Tenta the Queen.

24. Fulvius received Corcyra, given up into his hands by Demetrius Phari; then took he Apollonia, and the Armies joyning, the Consuls freed Dyrrhachium besieged by the Illyrians. Then most of the Illyrick Cities were either taken or delivered up, whereupon the Queen retired with a few followers to Rhizon a strong Town, situate upon a River of the same name, and the Spring following sent to Rome to desire Peace. It was granted to her on these terms: To pay a yearly tribute; to quit all Illyricum, except a very few places: and Not to sail beyond the River Quissus with more than two Barks, and these unarmed. For nine years the Illyrians continued in obedience, till the 535 year of the City, wherein rebelling, they were again reduced by Emilius Paulus and M. Livius the Consuls. For, Demetrius Phari then their King, forgetting the great favours received from the People

People of Rome, wasted the Towns of Illyricum subject to the Romans, and passed the bounds set by the League. Emilius within seven dayes took Dimalium, and followed him to Pharus, a Town of the Island Phario, which he also took. Demetrius being fled to Philip King of Macedonia, he seized on the rest of Illyricum, which he ordered to pay a stipend to Pincus, the son of Agron. But thus was begun, and finished the War with Tenta, which Florus (according to his custom, breaking the order and series of time) falsely placeth after the Gallicum Cisalpinum, or that with the Galls inhabiting within the Alps.

25. For, the same year wherein the Peace was made with Tenta, the promulgating of the Agrarian Law by C. Flaminius, Tribune of the people, brought this great, and dangerous War upon the Commonwealth. There being a good quantity of ground Conquered within the Countrey of these Galls, he preferred a Law for the dividing of it to the people, man by man. Q. Fabius Maximus being now Consul the second time stiffly opposed it, Sp. Carbilus his Colleague not stirring as (a) Cicero telleth us; the Senate also laboured to crosse it, but when in the Rostra Flaminius read the Law, his father laying hands on him he obeyed, and went down, though he neither valued the Consul nor Senate, nor yet was affrighted with the levying of an Army. Nay, the people about him was so overawed by paternal right, that, as Valerius Maximus writeth, though the Assembly was thus disappointed, not the least muttering was heard. Whether the Law for division fully passed or not (by reason of the interruption by old Flaminius) yet this thing gave occasion to a new and great War, as Polybius writeth, who mistaketh the time by four years, for as much as these stirs about the Agrarian fell not out in the 522. but the 526 of the Citie, wherewithall the second Consulship of Fabius Maximus, and that of Sp. Carnilius Maximus is joyned. Indeed the first of Fabius fell in with the 521 year of the Citie, two years before Tenta killed the Ambassador, and two more at least before the finishing of the Illyrian War, whence may be conjectured, that as the mistake of Polybius might arise from want of distinction, betwixt the first and second Consulships of Fabius; so the error of Florus (or him, who ever wrote that System) in placing the Gallick War before the Illyrian, might proceed from an (inconsiderate) trust to the Authority of that excellent Author.

26. The report concerning this Law awakened the Galls, especially the Boii, who were nearest neighbours. Concluding now that the Romans fought not so much for glory and dominion, as out of a covetous design of enriching themselves, they sent to the Insubres for aid, exhorting them to remember what their Ancestors once did at Rome, and to tread in their steps. These joyning together sent over the Alps for other Galls, living near Rhodanus, and called Gessate, from their wages, saith Polybius, or as others write, from Gessa a kind of weapon they used. Their Kings, Congolitanus and Aneroestus being assured by great promises, with a vast force passed over the Alpes, and joyning with the Insubres and Boii, to the number of 50000 foot, and 20000 horse brake into Etruria. When first the Romans heard of their passing the Alps, they commanded Emilius the Consul to go to Ariminum, to give them trouble in case they came that way. They ordered one of the Prators into Etruria; for, C. Auillius the other of the Consuls was already sent into Sardinia. The whole Citie was sad and grievously afflicted, fearing the Galls as fatal to it. All the Registers of the Military age were inquired int, too see what forces they, and what their Associates, were able to set forth. The Italians prepared to fight, not as for the Roman Empire, but their own safety; so that an Army was in a readinesse, consisting of 700000 foot, and 70000 horse, according to Polybius. But Fabius Pictor wrote, as Entropius relateth, that 800000 men were prepared for this War, wherein he himself was employed.

27. The Tables of the Military age, as they were brought to the Senate, contained of the Latines 80000 foot, and 5000 horse; of the Samnites 70000 foot, and 7000 horse; of the Inpyges and Messapians 50000 foot, and 16000 horse; horse; of the Lucanians 30000 foot, and 3000 horse; of the Marfi, Marucini, Erentani & Vestini 20000 foot, and 4000 horse. And of the Roman people gave their names, together with those of Campania, 250000 foot, and 230000 horse. The total sum 558000. There went out with the Consuls four Legions, whereof each contained 5200 foot, and 300 horse, together with 30000 foot, and 3000 horse of the Associates: in all 50800 foot, and 3200 horse. There were in readinesse for necessary occasions, of the Etruscans and Sabines 50000 foot, and 4000 horse, which the Prætor led into Etruria to oppose the Enemy on the Borders. Of the Veneti and Cenomani were assembled 20000. and as many of the Umbri and Sarsinates inhabiting the Appennine Mountains, who were placed on the Borders of Gall, by invading the Territories of the Boii to draw them back, and divide them from the rest. These were the forces placed on the Borders. At Rome were in 2 readinesse for the uncertain chances of War, as a supply 30000 foot, and 1500 horse of Citizens, besides of the Associates 30000 foot, and 2000 horse. In Sicily, and about Taronium were placed two Legions, whereof each contained 4200 foot, and 200 horse. The sum of all these amounts to 210300 men. So, saith Polybius, the sum of the forces which guarded the Citie were 150000 foot, and about 6000 horse, but the whole number of the multitude fit for War was 700000 foot, 70000 horse, which yet Hannibal durst oppose, and invade Italy with scarce 20000. But this will appear further in what shall be hereafter said.

28. The Galls descending into Etruria wasted all with fire and sword, till they came to Clusium, a place three dayes journey distant from Rome. There were they beset, the Prætor on their back, and the two Consuls before blocking up all the passages, so that they were forced to fight two contrary wayes in two fronts, and that very disadvantageously, both by reason of their nakednesse, and the unfitnesse of their Arms. But the vanity of the Gesate was most hurtfull to them, who casting off their Cloths would needs fight naked and charge first; for, being easily discomfited, they discouraged their fellows. Forty thousand were slain, and ten thousand taken, amongst whom was Concolitanus; the other King Aneroestus having killed himself. This battel was fought in the 529 year of the Citie, L. Æmilius Dapud, and C. Atilius Regulus (who was therein slain) being Consuls. Afterwards inroads being made into the Territories of the Galls, they were several times overthrown, and so harrassed, that they sent Ambassadors to Rome to beg peace on any terms. The people being inclining enough to it, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio the Consuls of the 532 year stopped the thing.

29. The former especially, having a disposition suitable to his name (Marcellus and Mamercus being thought to be derived of Mars, and therefore also the diminutives Marculus and Marcellus) inflamed the multitude to the War; whereupon the Galls now desperate resolved to make the last tryal, and using all indeavours, sent, and hired 20000 of the Gesate. The Consuls invading the Countrey of the Insubres besieged Acerra, which to relieve the Galls laid siege to Clastidium, a Town associate with the Romans. Here was fought a bloody battel, wherein the Galls were overthrown, Marcellus with his own hand killed Virdomarus King of the Gesate, and dedicated the third * Opima Spolia to Jupiter Feretrius, though Numa had commanded they should be consecrated to Quirinus. Those that escaped fled to Mediolanum (now Milane) the chief seat of the Insubres, which being shortly taken, the War was thereby ended after six years, and Marcellus returned in Triumph. The title of the Triumph in the Capitoline stories mentioned with the Galls Insubres, Germani also to have been subdued, which Germani seem no other then the Gesate, thus called by some mistake. As for the name of Casatia, though Polybius thinketh it derived from their wages, and others from a kind of vveapon; yet * another rendreth a more probable derivation, which the condition of these people being Mercenaries prompteth to. The Teutonick language (a dialect whereof Joseph Scaliger and others prove the ancient Gallick to have been) calleth him Gæst, whom the English Saxon (a branch

(a branch also of the Teutonick) nameth Guest at this time, betokening a stranger. The word Gesata might well therefore be thence derived, being changed something by those that were ignorant of the Language, from that whereby the Galls signified strangers, such as these Mercenaries were.

The Acts of Amilcar Barcas, after the ending of the first Punic War. Of Asdrubal his son-in-law.

Annibal the son of Amilcar Barcas created General by the Carthaginians.

30. The third year after the ending of the Gallick, began the second Punic, or Carthaginian War. Amilcar the Carthaginian Captain had a great itching desire to renew the quarrel with the Romans, as soon as the State could recover its strength, and had done it betimes, but that the War with the Mercenaries hapned, which much distressing the Commonwealth, he passed over into Spain, where having to do with such an Enemy as he could grow upon, he there enlarged far and wide the Carthaginian Dominion, and died in great honour, though he was drowned in a River, being put also to flight by Orisson King of the Iberi, who pretending to come to his assistance in the siege of Helice unexpectedly fell upon him. As he had governed the Army in Spain nine years, so his son-in-law Asdrubal succeeding him, commanded it almost as many, with a mind as averse from the Romans as he; but he dissembled his hatred and designs, that he might gain all Spain to the Carthaginian interest. After 8 years he was slain by a Gall (saith Polybius) or a slave to a certain Spaniard (saith Justin) who killed him in revenge for his Masters death. He also much bettered the affairs of Carthage, not so much by Arms, as his winning carriage upon the petty Princes. After his death Annibal the son of Amilcar Barcas was chosen Captain by the Army, and presently confirmed at Carthage by the people, whom his father taking along with him into Spain, being then nine years old, compelled to swear at the Altar, his hand touching the sacrifice, that as soon as he could he would be an Enemy to the people of Rome.

He taketh Saguntus a Town in Spain, confederate with Rome.

31. Annibal presently after his Creation fell upon the Olcades whom he subdued, and besides them, within a years space, the Vaccae and Carpentani, and nothing remained beyond the River Iberus that was considerable, and unsubdued, besides the Saguntines. They being confederate with Rome gave them there intelligence how things went, who sent some into Spain to see how matters stood, and what was intended by the Carthaginians. These Commissioners having audience of Hannibal, religiously admonished him not to meddle with the Saguntines, and (according to the League made with Asdrubal) not to passe over the River Iberus. His answers did not conceal his inward hatred, which caused the Romans to expect no better than a War; but they hoped to have Saguntus the seat thereof, and endeavoured to clear themselves of Illyricum ere it hapned. Annibal was not ignorant of what they designed, and therefore resolved by taking that Town to cut off all hope of vvarring in Spain. He doubted not by that example to terrifie others, so as to reduce to obedience those that yet stood out, and confirm therein such as he had already brought under; and this especially he aimed at, by reducing this place, to leave no Enemy at his back, by the plunder of which also he intended to gratifie his Soldiers. With all his force then he set upon it, and provoking his men by his own example to all manner of diligence, took it in the eighth moneth. The Inhabitants retained their fidelity unto the Romans to the last, and when almost spent with hunger, Fire, Sword, and Engines, they that remained, in a fire made in the Forum consumed themselves with all their riches, as Florus writeth, though Polybius speaketh of much money found in the Town, besides rich stuff, which Hannibal sent to Carthage.

Satisfaction is demanded by the Romans.

32. When first the Romans heard that Saguntus was taken, they sent Ambassadors to Carthage to require that Hannibal should be delivered up as the breaker of the League, or else to denounce War. Upon their arrival the Carthaginians deputed Hanno to treat with them, who sleighted the matter of the League made with Asdrubal, pretending there was none; and if there was, it was made by his meer pleasure without consent of the Senate. Besides, therein, he said, was no mention made of the River Iberus; that a regard was to be had of the Allies of both the States he confessed, but this nothing concerned the Saguntines, who at the time of the ratification were not confederates with Rome. The Ambassadors perceiving the Carthaginians backward to what they propounded, said no more; but the Senior of them holding out the lap of his Gown to the Senate. Here, saith he, we bring you both War and Peace; whether you will have I shall bring forth. The Carthaginian King bade them bring forth which they pleased; then the Roman, saying, he would take on War, many of the Senators answered, that they accepted of it. This fell out in the Consulship of M. Livius, afterward called Salinator (from his bringing up the Impost upon Salt) and L. Aemilius Paulus. In their time forein Ceremonies begun to be brought into Rome, which displeasing the more sober sort of men, the Senate thought fit that the Chapels of Isis and Serapis should be pulled down. When no Artificers would venture to touch them, Aemilius the Consul put off his prætexta, or long Rob edged with purple silk, and taking an Hatchet struck it into the door.

The second Part of Carthaginian War beginneth.

Annibal having conquered all Spain as far as the Pyrenean hills,

33. In the year following, being the 536 of the City, the sixth of Antiochus the Great, and the fifth of Ptolomy Philopator, in the Consulship of Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and Tib. Sempronius Longus, three and twenty years after the ending of the first Punick War, the Second began, which we have described by Polybius, and after him by T. Livius, who hath transcribed the 21 Book of his History almost word for word. Annibal now 26 years of age, in the Spring moved from his winter quarters with 90000 Foot, and 12000 Horse, and passing over the River Iberus, subdued all the Towns as far as the Pyrenean hills. Then leaving Hanno with a sufficient force to keep the Country, and sending as many of the Spanish Soldiers home, he marched with the rest in number 50000 Foot, and nine 9000 Horse, over the Pyrenean hills; and so through Gall unto the Alpes. Having marched 100 miles in ten days from the River Rhodanus, he came to the foot of these mountains, which when he ascended, he encountered with great difficulties, being opposed by the Allobroges (inhabiting the Country now called Savoy) who possessed themselves of the places through which he must necessarily passe. On the ninth day he came to the top, whence his Soldiers had a prospect of Italy. Proceeding after a little rest, he lost as many men here in the depth of the Snow, as formerly by the incursions of Enemies, and at length came to a place which would afford no passage for Horse, or Elephants. The place of it self was precipitious, but lately by a falling of earth it was become so, to the depth of 1000 foot. He laboured then to bring his men through other wayes never before trodden, but at length the Snow making them impassible, he was forced to betake himself to the levelling of the Rock. They made a great fire, wherewith the Rock being heated, they putrified it with Vinegar, then did they cleave it, and so diminished the descent by moderate turnings, that not onely the beasts of burthen, but the Elephants also might safely passe. Four dayes were spent about the Rock: and by this time almost all the heists were wasted; for on the top was little grasse, and that covered with Snow. Coming lower, certaing valleys afforded pasture, where the cattel were refreshed, and rest was given to the weary Soldiers. Thence descended Annibal into the Plain, in the fifth moneth after he had parted from new Carthage (built by Asdrubal, and now called Carragena) in Spain, having passed over the Alpes in fourteen dayes. In the passage he lost a great part of his Army, bringing into the Country of the Insabres, but 10200 African Foot, 8000 of the Spanish, and 6000 Horse.

Passeth over the Alps into Italy.

Descendeth Scipio the Consul.

34. Scipio the Consul having Spain for his Province, was by Sea going thither, when he understood that Hannibal was near the River Rhodanus. There he intended to have given him a stop; but missing of him, he returned on shipboard and hasted to Italy, there to meet him, before his men had yet refreshed themselves. They met and joyned battel, wherein the Consul had the worst, being wounded, and preserved alive by the valour of his young son afterwards named Africanus. The Roman Senate, when first they received ceived intelligence that Hannibal had passed the Alpes, sent for the other Consul Sempronius out of Sicily to the aid of his Collegue. According to order he brought over his Army, and united it with Scipio's at the River Trebia. Having had the better in some skirmishes with certain parties of Annibal, he desired to make trial of a battel, that his Collegue being sick, he might have all the glory of Victory, and though Scipio alleged, that by delaying to fight the Galls might be farther drawn in, and their own Soldiers better exercised, yet lest the battel should be deferred till the coming of the next Consuls, he resolved to fight alone. Annibal feared nothing more, thin that they should refuse to fight, because as yet the Galls continued his, and he knew the best of the Roman Captains to be unable to act, and his own Army fresh and chearful. In the battel, which shortly followed, the Romans were overthrown, being drawn out by a party that Hannibal sent to provoke them, ere they had armed their bodies against the extremity of the mid-winter season, either by meat or other provision; so that ingiging with cold and hunger, and beset with their enemies (whereof as in the former battel, the Nu- midians, to their great terror fell upon their rear) they were defeated, though with great slaughter of the Enemy, through whose ranks 10000 broke and escaped to Placentia, the rest being either slain, taken, or drowned in the River. The Carthaginians having pursued them to the River Trebia, returned to their Camp so stupified with cold, that they were scarce sensible of the Victory. For, rain mixed with snow, and intollerable cold, killed many men, and almost all the beasts and Elephants.

And Sempro-
legue.

25. At this time things went better with the Romans in Spain and Sicily. In the former Cnaus Scipio (being sent thither by his brother the Consul upon his return into Italy) overthrew Hanno the Carthaginian, and took in a good part of the Country, wherein was also new Carthage. For the following year C. Flaminius (who being Tribune had preferred the Agrarian Law) was the second time made Consul, together with Cn. Servilius Geminus. He had a good gift in speaking, but no skill in War, being yet heady and impatient of advice. Hannibal having all this while made the Country of the Galls the seat of War, resolved to change it, and after some consultation about his way into Etruria, resolved upon that of the Fens, as short and unexpected to the Enemy, though more troublesome to passe. Being forced to march three or four whole dayes through water, this sorely distressed all his men, except the Galls, many of the beasts were left in the mud, and the hoofs of the Horses came off. He himself riding on an Elephant that was onely left, escaped with his life, but was sorely pained in his eyes, one whereof he lost utterly. Being arrived at dry ground, he hoped by some means or other to intrap the Consul, understanding what his disposition was: He passed by his Camp and went further into the Country, which enraged Flaminius, who thought himself slighted by the Enemy. When amongst the Romans some told him that he must not rashly pursue, but use great caution, especially by reason of the Horse; but above all things stay for his Collegue, and not hazard a battel without the conjunction of both Armies, he was so far from following their advice, that he could not bear their words. Rising with all his forces he had neither respect to time nor place, onely seeking to fight, as if nothing had been more certain than the Victory, with hope whereof he he so elevated the vulgar, that a rabble followed the Camp greater in number than the Army itself, and furnished with chains, bonds, and other things, wherewith to keep fast those prisoners and booty, whereof they doubted not to become Masters.

And Flaminius

Thrasymene.

26. Annibal marching through Etruria, wasted it with fire and sword, the more to enrage his Enemy, and at length came to the Lake called Thrasymenus and Thrasymene, near to which are certain mountains, and betwixt them and it a narrow way leading to a valley, beset with them, and a ridge of hills. These hills he made choice of, wherein to place his men, bestowing them round about, so that Flaminius following him into the valley, was fallen upon round about, and slain with many of his men ere (almost) they knew who hurt them, by reason of a mist which then was risen from the Lake. Within the valley fell 15000, and near upon 6000 escaped to a Village, where they were forced to yield themselves. Annibal gathering all his prisoners together, to the number of 15000, kept in custody the Romans, but dismissed the Latines without ransome. The body of the Consul, saith Valerius Maximus, was sought for by Annibal to be buried; even his body, who, as much as in him lay, had buried the Roman Empire. Cn. Servilius the other Consul who kept Ariminum (a Country of Italy now called Rimini, lying upon the River Rubicon) hearing of Annibal's coming into Etruria, purposed to go and joyn with his Collegue, but finding that difficult, chose out 4000 men whom he sent to his aid, under conduct of C. Centenius (by some called Centronius) whom he commanded, if possible, to reach him before the fight. Hannibal hearing of this supplie, after the battel, sent out Maharbal with a party, which cutting off one half, forced the other to an hill, where they also yielded themselves.

37. The Romans struck with consternation at these losses, upon mature deliberation resolved there was need of a General with absolute authority. But the Consul (who alone had power, and that in the Roman Dominions, to name a Dictator) being absent, and incompassed with the Carthaginian Forces, so that no message could conveniently be sent to him, and the People having no power to create a Dictator, they created as a Prodictator, or Vice Dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, whose Master of the Horse-men was M. Minutius Rufus. Fabius marched Annibal in policy, breaking his successe by delaying to fight, which others had increased by their remerity, so that he obtained the name of * Cunctator. Hannibal was hereof very sensible, being by him put to his shifts, wanting provisions exceedingly, and lying in an Enemies Country. But the Master of Horse-men being something hot and rash, in Fabius his absence, got the better in certain skirmishes, and hereby procured so much favour from the multitude, which now accounted the worthy Dictator lazie and fearful, that beyond all example his power was made equal to that of his. Minutius puffed up herewith, sought to improve his authority by further rashnesse, so as to ingage with the Enemy, in which action he and his party had been overthrown, but that Fabius in good time came in and saved him. This so convinced him of his former folly, that he confessed his fault to the Dictator, whom he called his Father, and renouncing his new power again, subjected his office to the Dictatorship.

38. Fabius, when his six moneths were out, laid down his Office, and was badly requited, the Tribunes and others calumniating him with the Nobility, as wilfully lengthening the War, which procured Terentius Varro a rash, hot, and inconsiderable man, for the next year to be created Consul. He, though joyned with a prudent person L. Aemilius Paulus, so far prevailed, as to joyn battel with Annibal at the place of Canna an ignoble Village of Apulia, which the year before had been destroyed, and onely the Castle remained, on which Annibal had lately seized. The Romans brought into the field 80000 Foot, and about 6000 Horse; the Carthaginians not much above 40000 Foot, and 10000 Horse. Florus writeth, that for the destruction of the unhappy Army, both General, Earth, Heaven, the day, and the whole nature of things conspired. For Annibal not content with the sending of those who counterfeiting a revolt, fell upon the backs of the Romans, observing the nature of the place, so chose out his ground, that besides his Army they must needs fight with wind, dust, and Sun. But from others it appeareth, that the Romans fighting with their faces toward the South, and the Carthaginians toward the North, the Sun-beams offended neither. However, the abilities of the Punick General were seen so far in this, as in other battels, that he overmatched them in skill, who exceeded him in numbers, making such slaughter of them, that at length wearied, he commanded his Soldiers to forbear, as Florus telleth us. Of the Romans were slain 50000 men say Plutarch and Appian; 70000 saith Polybius, and Livy hath 40000 Foot, and 2600 Horse. Amongst these was Aemilius the Consul (who

teth his Army
Capua.

39. Had Hannibal taken his opportunity and marched to Rome, in all probability he might have made an end of the War, and of the Roman Empire both together; but this great Soldier knew (as Mahabul Captain of his Horse truly told him) how to get, but not how to use and improve a Victory. For, he loitered all this Summer, and having Capua a wealthy and luxurious Citie given up into his hands by the Towns-men, there he took up his Winter quarters, and Capua became a Cannae to his Soldiers. For, hereby he utterly spoyled an excellent Army, which now was so enervated by the pleasures and effeminatenesse of the place, as ever after it became impatient of labour, and its ancient Military Discipline, so that before this it was harder for the Romans not to be overcome by Hannibal, than afterwards to overcome him. His fortune presently began to change. He was worsted at Nola by Marcellus the Prator, and repulsed at Casilinum, a very small Castle, for a good space. At this time, though there was a Dictator in the Camp (M. Junius Pera, whose Master of the Horse-men was Tib. Sempronius) yet the Senate being exhausted by the War, M. Fabius Buleo was named Dictator by Terentius the Consul, for filling it up, without a Master of Horse-men. He coming into the Rostra, said, he did not approve that there should be two Dictators at one time (which never before had been known) nor that he was created without a Master of Horse-men; neither that the power of Censorship should twice be permitted to one man; nor that power for six moneths should be given to any Dictator, except for the War. What extreim necessity had procured, he said he would moderate. For he would not remove any Senator which C. Flaminius, and L. Aemilius the late Censors had chosen, onely transcribe, and cause them to be read over, lest the credit, and esteem of Senators should be in the power of one man; and so he would supply the places of the dead, that this man before that, and not one order should seem preferred above another. The old Senate then being called over, he chose into vacant places, first such as since the last Censorship had born Curule Offices, as each one had been first created; then such as had been Aediles, Tribunes of the Commons, or Quaestors, and lastly, such had any spoils hung up at home, which they themselves had taken from the Enemy, or had received a Civic Crown. So 177 being thus chosen with universal approbation, he presently laid down his Office.

40. The Romans, though the defeat at Canna threatned them with no less than ruin, quickly recovered their courage. When Varro (being sent for to name a Dictator) was near the Citie, all Ranks went forth to meet him, and though he was the cause of the overthrow, gave him thanks that he had not despaired concerning the Commonwealth. Philip King of Macedonia having expected the fortune of both parties, after the battel of Canna joyned in affinity with Hannibal; and this being discovered through the intercepting of his Ambassadors, for to prevent his coming into Italy, the Romans took order for the invasion of his own Territories. At this time Hannibal was beaten at Cuma, and constrained to raise his siege; and from Nola the second time by the same hand; Hanno having the same fortune at Grumentum. In Spain the Scipios so managed the War that they got ground, being continually Superiors. Asdrubal was ordered by the Senate at Carthage to passe into Italy; but upon his departure they defeated him in battel, and and Spain.

SECT. 2. and by this successe not onely overthrew the design of joyning with Hannibal, but drew most of the Spaniards to their party, still improving the victory.

41. In Sicilie and Sardinia, though several attempts were made by the Carthaginians, and some revolts happened, yet things proceeded in a good condition. In one battel in Sardinia 12000 were slain, and many taken prisoners, amongst whom were Asdrubal, Hanno, and Mago, all noble Carthaginians. A year or two after the death of Hieron King of Syracuse (who having been a fast friend to the Romans died at 90 years of age or more) altered much the face of affairs. For Hieronimus his Grandson succeeding him, was for his wicked disposition quickly made away, and then the Citie breaking into divers factions; that which was most contrary to the Roman interest prevailed, by the means of two inconsiderable men made Prators. Marcellus the Consul besieged Syracuse both by Sea and Land, but was hindred from storming it by the skill and invention of that excellent Mathematician Archimedes. He framed such Engins, as therewith to cast huge stones upon the Romans, and great beams upon their ships. He would set the ships upon one end, overturn them, and hoizing them up into the air, after all the men, and other things were falln out of them, let them fall upon the Walls, or return down into the Sea. Such was the exactnesse of his skill, both near at hand, and afar of, that neither by Sea nor by Land could they attempt a storm, their Engins of battery being also disinounted by the force of his.

42. Marcellus hereupon departed from the siege, jeering his own Engineers, and calling Archimedes by the name of Briarens. He destroyed Megara, one of the most ancient Cities of the Island, and falling upon the Army of Hippocrates, as it was incamping it self, killed above 8000 men. After this he made incursions, and drew several Towns from the Carthaginians. He took Damippus the Spartan as he sayled from Syracuse, about the redemption of whom coming often near the Walls of that Citie, he observed a Tower negligently kept, & convenient for receiving of men, because the Wall there might be easily mounted. Taking the opportunity of Diana's feast, wherein the Syracusians gave up themselves to Wine and sports, he seized on this Tower, and through it bestowing his men about the Walls, easily became Master of the Citie, after three years spent in the siege. He wept when he beheld the goodlinesse of it, which notwithstanding his Commands for moderation (in which he was eminent) he knew would suffer much. But more than the rest, the death of Archimedes troubled him, whom he most laboured to preserve. Some wrote that this famous Artist busied in his Geometrical speculations minded not what was doing in the Citie; but a Soldier coming to him, and bidding him follow him to Marcellus, he would not go till he had finished his probleme, and demonstrated it, whereupon the Soldier killed him. Others reported that a Soldier rushing in upon him, he desired respite from death till he had finished his contemplation; but the Soldier not at all regarding him slew him presently. A third report went, that as he was carrying his Mathematical instruments to Marcellus, certain Soldiers came upon him, who supposing it to be Gold he carried in the Vessel, instantly slew him. One of these wayes perished Archimedes, who excelling all men in this noble skill, deserveth as much of blame as he had of knowledge, in thar esteeming sordid and base the making of Engins, and what served necessary uses, he onely seriously studied the science abstracted from Mechanick works, and through this kind of greatnesse of mind, refused to write any thing concerning those works, which procured him his deserved fame and estimation.

The Scipios having conquered almost all Spain, are destroyed by dividing their forces, and their death is revenged by Marcius.

43. At this time the Scipios in Spain having well nigh done their work, and intending suddenly to make an end of the War, unfortunately divided their forces, and through the treachery of the Celtiberians were both cut off with almost their whole Armies. The Roman interest hereby had been destroyed in that Countrey, had not the remainders of the forces been kept together.

gather, and preserved by L. Marcius a Tribune, who revenged the death of the two Generals and his other Countrey-men, by falling on the Carthaginians, divided into two several Camps, Secure, and without any watch, and suffering none to escape from one to give notice to the other, slew 37000. and took 1830 with great plunder. In Italy, Hannibal had Tarentum betrayed to him by the Inhabitants, the Castle still holding out; and the Romans laid siege to Capua. Hither was Annibal called for aid; but he made no great haste, out of desire he had to take the Castle of Tarentum. Bethinking himself how great scandal he should give to all his confederates, in case he did not relieve that Citie, he marched thither, and set upon the Roman Camp, which was so well defended, that he was repelled, though assisted by the Inhabitants, and his own Garrison he there had left. Perceiving then that the Enemy would not be drawn out of his Trenches, and that he could not break through his Camp, lest the new Consuls should intercept his Provisions, he resolved to be gone. Considering inuch whither he should go, he resolved for Rome it self, the head of the War, designing at least by this Enterprize to raise the siege of Capua.

Livius lib. 26.

44. His coming being heard of at Rome, they were there variously inclined as to resistance. Some thought that all the Armies in Italy were to be sent for; but Fabius Maximus would by no means hear of leaving Capua: Therefore a middle way was taken, to send for one of the Captains from the siege to the defence of the Citie. Q. Fulvius then the Proconsul chusing out 15000 foot, and 1000 horse out of the three Armies, marched for Rome, which he entred at the Gate Capena (when Hannibal now lay incamped eight miles off) the Senate, lest his power should be diminished, having decreed, that if he came into the Citie he should have equal authority with the Consuls. Annibal removing to the River Aniene, three miles from the Citie, with two thousand horse thence went to take a view of it. Flaccus stomaching he should take this liberty and do it with ease, sent out a party of horse, which falling on made him retreat. The day after, and that following, Hannibal on one side, and Flaccus with the Consuls on the other, drew out their forces for a battel, when on both dayes fell such storms of hail and rain, as the Armies could not joyn, but when they had retreated into their Camps, a wonderfull serenity appeared. This struck the Carthaginians with a religious awe, and caused Hannibal to say, that sometimes a Will, and otherwiles fortune were wanting to him for the taking of the Citie. Removing back then his Camp to the River Turia, thence he proceeded to the Lake of Feronia, which Goddesse had then a rich Temple there. This he robbed, and so marched through the Countreys of the Lucani and Bruttii towards Rhogium and the Straights, where he well nigh had destroyed the Inhabitants unawares by the suddenesse of his coming. Flaccus returned to the siege of Capua, whither that Hannibal returned not was much admired. The Campanians therefore despairing of any assistance from him, Capua was yielded up. The heads of the Rebellion (53 in number) were put death (28 having before poysoned themselves) at the command of Fulvius, contrary to the Will of his Collegue Appius Claudius, who would have had the matter determined by the Senate at Rome. The common seat was sold, and the Citie, because situate in so good a soyl, reserved for a receptacle of all sorts of Plow-men, Labourers, and Artificers, without any shew of government of its own, after it had stood about 260 years. These things hapned in the eighth year of the War, being the 543 of the Citie, the 11th of Antiochus the Great, and the 12 of Ptolomy Philopator, P. Sulpicim Galba, and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus being Consuls.

This year was sent into Spain Claudius Nero, who having got Asdrubal the Carthaginian into a straight so as he might have cut off him and his Army, Asdrubal promised he would draw all his soldiers out of the Countrey, but drew out the time in length by the interposition of his Panick faith, till by little and he withdrew all his men out of the danger. The Senate and People hearing this, took it ill that Nero would thus suffer himself self to be abused, yet know they not whom to send to succeed him, and when the Comitia were held for the creation of a Proconsul, none appeared to stand for the Office. A great sadness hereupon seized on the multitude, When Publius Scipio son to Publius Cornelius Scipio slain in Spain (whom as we said he defended in battle) a young man but of 24 years of age, stood up in a place where he might be seen, and professed himself candidatus, having the year before been made Ædilis, though under age, by the great favour and confidence of the People. With great joy he was created by the suffrages of all, but when they considered what they had done, and especially thought of his age, they were again much perplexed, which he apprehending, called them together, and with such spirit and resolution promised them good success, that they departed well satisfied, judging many things to be in him which surpassed humane admiration; for having good parts, he could set them off to purpose. Passing into Spain then this year, the summer following he took new Carthage by storm, a place of great consequence both for riches and situation, by the fame of which exploit, together with his loving demeanour towards the natives, he well improved the Victory.

Publius Scipio taketh upon him the government of Spain and exceedingly prospereth.

46. Hannibal at this time indulging his cruel disposition in wasting such Countries as he could not keep, lost his credit; and the Romans in Italy gained thereby. This year M. Valerius Levinus, who had done good service against Philip of Macedonia, was the second time, in his absence, created Consul, together with Marcellus the fourth time. Levinus went into Sicily, where taking the City Agirigentum, he thereby brought the whole Island under the Roman jurisdiction. The year following being the tenth of the War, Tarentum was betrayed into the hands of Fabius Maximus, now Consul the fifth time, with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who the fourth time bore this Office. Marcellus for this year sometimes winning and sometimes losing with Annibal, for that following being created Consul (though he scarcely seemeth rightly created according to the Roman superstition) though other whiles wary enough, was cut off in an ambush, whilst with his Colleague T. Quintius Crispinus, accompanied openly with 220 Horse, he went to view a place where he had a great desire to fight Hannibal. Crispinus also received a wound whereof he died, after he had named a Dictator for creation of the next Consuls.

Asdrubal ordered to march out of Spain into Italy.

47. The year following, Asdrubal was ordered to go out of Spain into Italy, to the assistance of his brother Annibal. This caused great carefulness in Rome, by reason they knew not well whom to oppose against him. At length M. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator (who lately had returned to the City, after that being publicly disgraced he had absented himself for seven years) were created Consuls, having been at great odds, and now reconciled through the interposition of the Senate. Livius was ordered to meet Asdrubal, and Nero appointed to attend the motions of Annibal. But the later having some success against his Enemy, picked out of the flower of his Army 6000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, and with great secrecy, and as much speed, marched towards his Colleague, that he might reach him ere he joyned with Asdrubal. Being joyned, they incompassed him, who was by a deceitful guide led into a dangerous place, and cut him with his whole Army in pieces: then marched Nero back to his own Army, and ere Hannibal knew of his departure, cast his brothers head into his Camp, whereby to his grief he knew of the defeat. The year following did P. Scipio after many Victories obtained, finish the War in Spain; all the Carthaginian Captains being either taken or driven away. This hapned five years after his undertaking the charge, and thirteen after the beginning of the War.

Is cut off with his whole Army by Livius and Nero the Consuls.

48. Scipio coming to Rome, and being made Consul, greatly desired to be sent into Africk, urging it to the Senate as necessary for finishing the War, subdued Spain and undertaking so to manage his affaires, as to force the Carthaginians to recall Hannibal for the defence of his own Country. Fabius Maximus most earnestly, and with some heat opposed this, and a considerable difference hereupon

hereupon arose ; but at length Sicily was granted him for his Province, and leave given him to passe over into Africk, if he saw it convenient for the Commonwealth. All this year he spent in the Island, in providing necessities for his Expedition, and the next, with a brave Fleet landed in Africk, where Masanissa King of Numidia (who in Spain had joyned with him) came in to his aid. Within a while he killed Hanno with 3000 men, and besieged Utica ; but Syphax King of Numidia, the enemy and competitor of Masanissa (who formerly had entred into league with Scipio, but again upon a marriage with Annibal's niece revolted) coming with the Carthaginians to raise the siege, he having attempted in vain to storm the Town, rose up and departed to his winter quarters.

49. In Winter he was not idle, but again besieged Utica, and entred into a Treaty with Syphax and Asdrubal about a Peace, in the mean time sending his ablest Soldiers in the habit of slaves with his Commissioners, to view the Enemy's Camps. This being sufficiently done, he brake off the Treaty, and set fire upon the Camps, which the other not suspecting, but thinking it came by accident, were cut in pieces when they were busied in quenching the fire, to the number of 40000 men, and 6000 were taken Prisoners. Not long after he gave them another great overthrow, which so affected the Carthaginians with fear, that they called home Hannibal. Presently after they sent a Fleet to relieve Utica, which worsted the Roman Navy ; and they might have done more than this had not fear made them loiter. But shortly after this, Scipio again routed Syphax, who had got together an unexperienced company of strangers, and taking him prisoner, gave his Kingdom to Masanissa. In Italy about this time Mago was overthrown, and wounded in an engagement with Quintilius Varus the Prætor, and M. Cornelius the Proconsul : he also was recalled as well as his brother Annibal, and died on the Sea of his wounds. The Carthaginians sent an Ambassage to Rome, with a design to obtain a cessation till Hannibal could arrive out of Italy. But their aim being sufficiently understood, the message was slighted ; and to witness their perfidiousness, they brake the Law of Nations, by offering to violate Messengers sent from Scipio.

50. Annibal being recalled by his superiours, with very much reluctancy quitted Italy, after he had therein spent sixteen years. He complained much of the Senate and of himself. Of the Senate, because fighting so long a time in an Enemy's Country, they had so little supplied him with money and other things necessary for War. Of himself, for that having so often overthrown and put to flight the Roman Legions, he had still delayed and given them time to breath. It's reported also, that ere he took ship, he built an arch near the Temple of Juno Lacinia, wherein, in Punick and Greek letters, he wrote the sum of his great achievements. Taking the Sea, he landed in a few dayes at Lepus, whence he marched to Adrumetum, and thence to Zama. Considering now the weak estate of his Country, he desired a meeting with Scipio to treat of Peace, which being granted, the two greatest Captains in the World came to an interview betwixt their Armies, but receiving mutually no satisfaction, they returned to decide the controversie by the sword. Hannibal in the battel behaved himself most gallantly, and like so expert a Warriour amongst his Soldiers, consisting of so many Nations and languages. But providence ordained the Victory to Scipio, who slew 20000, and took as many prisoners, yet not without great losse of his own men, whereof 2000 fell. After this, Annibal perswaded his Country-men to aske Peace, and Ambassadors were dispatched away accordingly.

51. Scipio was not averse to a closure, as loth to part with the glory of concluding the War, which the year before was in danger of being taken from him by Tib. Claudius Nero the Consul, and now by C. Cornelius Lentulus, who both had procured Africk for their Province, and to be joyned in equal authority with him. The power of concluding the Peace was by the People decreed to Scipio, with ten others, which was at length agreed to on these termes. That the Carthaginians being free, should enjoy all their territories stages for performance of these things. Thus ended the second Punick War, in the eighteenth year, and Scipio obtained the honourable surname of Africanus, being the first General (if Livy observeth rightly) who was ennobled by the name of a Country he had overcome.

The Macedonian War.

Galba the Consul profpereth against Philip.

52. The Romans had little or no rest after this War; for immediately begun, or rather went on the Macedonian, or that with Philip, the occasion being given, as was said, ten years before, upon his entrance into confederacy with Annibal. The Ætolians being also invaded by him, aid was sent them, by which he was worsted, and after seven years a Peace was made.
But now the Romans having nothing to do, and being not without provocation, as well by his breaking of his faith with the Ætolians and others of their friends in those parts, as by his supply of men and money not long before sent to Hannibal, and at the earnest request of the Athenians (the territories of whom he had wasted) they decreed War anew against him, being also complained of by Attalus King of Pergamus, and the Rhodians, for molesting the Cities in Asia. Ser. Sulpitius Galba the Consul obtaining Macedonia for his Province, by himself and his Lieutenant, put him to the worst divers times, and, had almost taken him. Together with Attalus and the Rhodians he caused him to raise his siege from Athens, whereupon the Ætolians before backward enough, by reason of their Magistrate, and the Athamanians now encouraged invaded his Dominions, but being idle and carelesse were easily repelled by him. This year, did M. Furnus the Prætor get a great Victory over the Galls, which besieged Cremona in Italy, killing 30000, and with them Amilcar the Carthaginian Captain. For this, after much dispute in the Senate, he triumphed, though against the custom, and without president, for any one to receive this honour, that had obtained Victory with the Army of another, as he had done with the Soldiers of C. Aurelius Cotta the Consul in his absence, who took it most hainously. The year following,
C. Bobius the Prætor entering unadvisedly into the territories of the Galls Insubres, was incompassed and lost above 6600 men.

53. Nothing considerable was this year done in Macedonia by P. Villius Tappulus the Consul; but his successor T. Quintius * Flaminius (not Flaminius as Plutarch now hath him; for the Flamini Patritians must not be confounded with the Flamini who were Plebeians) using great expedition beat Philip out of the Straights, wherein securely he had incamped, and by Sea his brother Lucius (with Attalus) took several towns of his confederates, and besieged Corinth, though in vain. The time coming for the election of new Consuls, and it being usual for them to take the Provinces from their predecessors, the Tribunes rightly objected, that this course hindred the progresse of the Wars, and procured Quintius his Government to be continued to him, who being about taking of the Castle of Opus, Messengers came from Philip about a Treaty. Several times they met (which before they had also done at the Straights) and the Ambassadors of Attalus, the Rhe-dians, and Acheans were present; but the effect was nothing, and Philip gave up Argos into the hands of Nabis Tyrant of Lacedæmon, who used the Inhabitants with great cruelty and incredible exaction. But Quintius following Philip into Thessaly, gave him such a blow at Cynoscephale, as forced him to ask Peace, which was granted upon terms moderate enough. All the Cities of Greece which he had got in his hands, were hereby, beyond all expectation, and to the wonder of themselves and others, set at liberty, and left to their their own Laws. The year preceding this conclusion, did the Galls receive a great overthrow from Cornelius the Consul. But in Spain, C. Sempronius Tuditanus was totally defeated. The same year wherein the Macedonian War ended, the slaves in Tuscany made a dangerous Rebellion, but were chastized, and quieted, by Atilius the Prætor. And about the same time was another victory obtained over the Galls.

54. The year after the ratification of the peace, some bickering there was in the City about the women. For, twenty years before, there had been a Law preferred by Oppius, Tribune of the People, presently after the defeat at Canna, forbidding women the wearing of Gold or Purple, and the use of any other kind of Pomp. This now did two of the present Tribunes labour to abrogate, the face of things being changed, and the occasion removed. M. Porcius Cato the Consul stood stiffly for preserving the Law, inveighing much against the Females; but partly through the apposite reply of L. Valerius the Tribune unto the Consul, out of his own book, called Origenes, and especially through the importunity of the women themselves (who with liberty of behaviour sufficient filled the streets, and came to the Assembly, and constrained two of the Tribunes to let fall their interposition) it was abrogated. Cato then betook himself into Spain his Province, where using severity towards himself as well as his Soldiers, he restored the Roman interest by good Discipline. Having led his Army upon the back of the Spaniards, and thereby necessitated them to fight, he overthrew them in a great battle, and took their Camp; after which, notwithstanding the fickleness of the Natives, he reduced the Province to obedience. The same Summer did L. Valerius Flaccus his Collegue give another overthrow to the Galls in Italy.

55. In Greece, Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, still held it, and Argos, in slavery; wherefore the freedom of them still was wanting to the universal liberty of Greece, resolved to be vindicated from the oppression of the Macedonian party. Quintius, upon Nabis his refusal to quit Argos, besieged them both, and took in Gytheum a Port Town, which drove Nabis to ask peace. Quintius was not against it, urging to the Græcian Allies the length, which was likely to be of the siege of Sparta, the unseasonableness of the Winter season, and the War that threatened from Antiochus King of Asia; but indeed fearing lest one of the new Consuls taking Macedonia for his Province, might rob him of the glory of sending the whole controversy in these parts. Yet the Greeks being earnest for suppressing the Tyrant, he seemed to yield to it, and afterwards put them off by demanding such supplies as they could not furnish him with. Notwithstanding this, the peace could not be made; for, Nabis accepted not of the terms, especially of parting with his ships. Hereupon Sparta was set upon round about, and had been taken, but that Pythagoras son-in-law to the Tyrant set the out-houses on fire, which drove away the Inhabitants. Though the onset succeeded not, yet the danger put Nabis into such a fright, that he now accepted of the former conditions, and had peace granted him; the Argives having ere this taken heart at the absence of Pythagoras their Governour, and freed themselves. The following year T. Sempronius the Consul killed many of the Galls who had set upon his Camp, but with great losse of his own men. Several times had the Romans now the better against these people, and the Ligurians. Then came they flatly to fall out with Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, and began a War with him five years after the ending of the Macedonian, in the 563 year of the City, the second of the 147 Olympiad, the 33th of Antiochus, and the 13th of Ptolemy Epiphanes, A.M. 3814. *P. ## SECT. 3.

SECT. III.

From the war with Antiochus, and the invasion of Asia, to the destruction of Carthage, after which the Romans degenerated through security, the space of 45 years.

The occasions of the War with Antiochus. 1. A Neiochus had invaded the Territories of Attalus; but being then the friend of the Romans, gave over his Enterprize at their desire. After this, having an hungry desire after Egypt; upon application of the Egyptians to Rome, he was commanded to desist, which breeding in him discontent, it was heightened by reason of his setting upon several Cities in Greece. He said that they once had belonged (though not of a long time) to his Predecessors; but the Romans being ambitious to set all Greece at liberty, plainly told him that these Towns must not be excepted. When he was thus enough incensed, and by Hannibal (who had fled to him) spurred on, the Aetolians importuned him to join with them against their late friends and benefactors. This they did, being an inconstant people, and very covetous, having taken offence at the small quantity of booty, as they accounted it, allotted to them in the War against Philip, by T. Quintius.

Things introduced to it.

2. The Aetolians first of all attempted to get into their hands Lacedaemon, and other Towns, before held as cautionary by Quintius; but missed of their design, though they brake into the former, and killed Nabis the Tyrant; for, they were afterwards cut in pieces by the Inhabitants themselves. Antiochus having through the cunning insinuations of Theas the Aetolian, changed his purpose of sending Amibal into Africk, and thence into Italy, landed in Greece, with an intention to make it the Seat of War. He brought an inconsiderable Army with him; but seemed to have made a good beginning, having got Chalcis into his hands, and by that means easily brought under the whole Island of Eubaea. After this, he sent, and buried the dead bodies of the Macedonians slain at Cynosephale, thinking thereby to oblige Philip, who taking it as tending to his reproach, because he had not done it before, it proved but an effectual means to make him his Enemy, the Thessalians being no better affected, because he had taken some of their Towns. Then wintering at Chalcis, he fell in Love with, and married an obscure maid; his Army which before was indifferently good, falling with him into all idleness and excess.

M. Acilius the Consul defeated Antiochus at Thermopylae.

3. M. Acilius the Consul, to whom Greece fell by lot, easily recovered the places of Theffaly, and afterwards beat Antiochus out of the Straights of Thermopylae, whither, being deserted by his confederates, he had retired, as is shewn in the History of his Kingdom. Then the Consul received the Boeotians, chiding them onely for their ingratitude, and the Gates of Chalcis being set open to him, he presently recovered Eubaea. This done, he went against the Aetolians, from whom after he had taken one or two Towns they offered to submit, but being offended with the hard conditions he propounded, and for that large things were promised by Antiochus, they flew back. Hereupon he besieged Naupactus (now Lepanto) and had utterly ruined them, but for the intercession of T. Quintius. For he having then received the Island of Zacynthus from the Athenians, came to the Camp, and though they had ill deserved at his hands by detracting from his worth, yet thinking it dishonourable for him, being the deliverer of Greece, that any one people should perish, he proposed to the Consul to be considered, whether to counterpoise the power of Philip, who now had got by his leave Athamania, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopio into his hands, it would not be good policy to preserve the Aetolians. For this respect, and at their humble sute he gave them Truce, that they might send to the Senate at Rome, and broke up his siege. Whilest Acilius did these things in Greece, his Colleague Scipio Nasica got a notable nable victory over the Bell in Italy, which utterly broke their power in pieces.

4. Lucius Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lelins Nepos, being Consuls for the following year, came, according to the custom, to divide the Provinces by lot. Both were extremely desirous to have Greece, and Lelins being a man in great favour, offered that the thing might be left to the discretion of the Senate. Scipio at first knew not what to do, but his brother Africanus perswaded him by all means to assent to it. The thing was new, and the Senate expected many words on both sides, when Africanus standing up, told the Fathers, that if they would deereed Greece to his brother, he would go his Legatus or Lieutenant, whereupon there was no need any more should be said; for it was presently voted with universal consent, and power given to the Consul to passe into Asia, if he saw it convenient. Coming into Greece he found Acilius fallen upon the Ætolians again, because the Senate had given them no positive answer, either as to peace or War; onely two things were proposed: To cast themselves wholly upon the Senate, or pay down 1000 Talents, and have the same friends and enemies with the Romans. When they desired an exposition of the former, no answer would be given, but a command to their Ambassadors to depart: The Consul prosecuted what his Predecessor had begun, and with much ado, through the intercession of the Athenians by Africanus, another Truce was granted that they might have time once more to send to Rome. There their Ambassadors instead of confessing their faults, and asking pardon, boasted what friends and assistants they had been to the Roman State, which gave such offence, that they were commanded out of the Citie, as before.

5. Antiochus having with his son Seleucus besieged Pergamus the Chief Citie of Enneches, the friend of the Romans, was forced to raise his siege. He sent to Emilius the Roman Admiral now on those Coasts about peace, who disowned any power of concluding it without the Consul. Then did the Rhodians at Sea defeat his Admiral, which was Hannibal, a man out of his proper Element, and afterward in a battel fought with Emilius, Enneches, and the Rhodians, he fully lost the command of the Sea. Affrighted hereat, he foolishly left Lyfimaehia, which this year might have kept the Consul in action, and adding one folly to another suffered Scipio to passe the Helle-spont without interruption. Now he offered to quit all places in Europe, and such in Asia as were the friends of Rome; to discharge half of the costs sustained by the Romans in the War, and rather than not be quiet, he was content to part with a portion of his own Kingdom. These seemed but small things to the Consul, who thought it just that he, who had been the cause of the War, should bear all the charges of it, and not onely quit Ionis and Æolis, but leave all the Greek Cities to their liberty, which could not be, except he parted with all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. The Ambassador had in charge to procure the favour of Africanus, to whom was offered the restitution of his son taken prisoner, and all that could be expected on this side the title of King, if he would live with him. But all private Offices of kindness onely would Africanus promise, desiring him by all means to procure peace, and, when he had received his son, not to fight till he should (being now sick) return to the Camp. This caused Antiochus to desist fighting, but the Consul followed, and provoked him to give battel, wherein his own Chariots Armed with Scithes, being driven back upon his own men, procured his overthrow. After this, peace was granted on the same terms as it had been offered to him before the battel. And thus this War ended in a short time, and lesse trouble than was expected, the second Consul putting a period to it, who in imitation of his brother took on him the surname of Asiaticus.

Which are rejected.

He is overthrown, and hath peace granted upon former demands.

6. The year following, wherein M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, the former going into Greece fell upon the Ætolians, who now had taken from Philip Dolopia, and Amphilochia with Athamania; and besieging Ambracia, drove them once more to sue for peace. They were referred by the Consul to Rome, where the Ambassadors of Philip made great complaints against them upon the former account. But the Rhodians and Athenians interceding once more for them, their sute was granted, on condition to pay 500 Eubœan Talents at several payments, to restore all prisoners, and have the same Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome.

Manlius subdued the Galatians.

7. Cn. Manlius the other Consul was now in Asia, where of that part taken from Antiochus, much he conferred upon Eumenes, and the Rhodians, according to the result of the Senate. This done, he undertook an Expedition against the Gallogracians, or Galatians, a People which having followed Brennus into Greece, after his death, had 90 years before passed into Asia, Justin. lib. 3. where they were so terrible, as none denied them tribute before Attalus King of Pergamus. They inhabited vast and high mountains, and in that respect were with difficulty to be come at; but the Consul by throwing darts, especially at their huge bodies, made great slaughter and subdued them. Returning home through Thrace, he had well nigh lost his booty by the inhabitants that lay in wait for it in the woody passages, and hardly got leave to triumph, because he had undertaken the War on his own head. It is observed, that luxury and idleness were first brought to Rome by his Army, out of Asia, through the provocations to effeminateness there found, and his loose and neglected Government.

Luxury first brought to Rome by his Army.

8. In the third year after the ending of the War with Antiochus, and the same wherein he died, envy procured the fall of those by whom the Victory was obtained. For, Scipio Africanus was accused of having defrauded the Treasury of the booty taken in the War, and had a day set him by the Tribunes to answer it before the People. It is not certain who was his accuser, some mentioning M. Nevius, and others the two Patulii Tribunes, set on, as some delivered, by M. Porcius Cato the Enemy of Scipio. The day of hearing being come, and the Tribunes having taken their places in the Rostra, the party entered the Assembly with a great train of Friends and Clients. Silence being made, he put on his triumphal crown, and told the People, how as that day he had overthrown Hannibal and the Carthaginians; wherefore thinking it convenient for that time not to meddle with any brawling business, he would go and salute the gods in the Capitol, and give them thanks, that as well that day, as at other times, they had given him both will and power to do eminent service for his Countrey. Then he wished that such of them there present as thought it convenient, would accompany him, and pray that they might have such principal Officers (Principes) as he had been.

He departed to Linternum and is not condemned through the procurement of Gracchus.

9. Going up to the Capitol, the whole Assembly followed him, as also to all the temples in the City, insomuch that the very Viators and Clerks left the Tribunes alone, who also followed, and from accusers turned admirers, (as appeareth from Valerius Maximus) out of very shame. The Tribunes accused him also grievously in the Senate, and desired he might be brought to his answer. He rising up, produced the Books of accounts, wherein was punctually set down all the particulars, but he tore it in pieces before them all, disdaining to give account for so small a matter in comparison of those vast sums he himself had brought into the Treasury. The next day of appearance he absented himself, and his brother pretending his indisposition, he was excused, and another day appointed, before which he withdrew himself to Linternum (or Liternum) a Sea Town of Campania. For he clearly perceived under what envy he laboured, it being also objected against him, that he had spent in idleness all that Summer he lay in Sicily, and his power with Antiochus, who having discharged his son without ransom, honoured him above all others, which he willingly took upon him, as one, who alone sat at the helm, and could steer matters concerning Rome according to his pleasure. In his absence the Tribunes were very fierce against him, yet through the interposition of Tiberius Gracchus (formerly accounted his Enemy) he was not condemned.

10. Lucius Scipio Asiaticus his brother was also called to an account, and escaped not condemnation, the money supposed to be retained to his own use, being charged upon his estate; and he was kept from imprisonment merely by the power of Gracchus. The following year was discovered the abominable practice of certain women at the feasts of Bacchus, which being kept in the night, all manner of filchiness and continual murders were committed. At first these festivals were observed but three dayes in a year; but now five in every moneth, and men were admitted, whereas they were begun by women. All who being present and drawn in, would not consent to such abominations, were sacrificed as beasts, a vast number being bewitched with this folly. The matter being revealed to Sp. Posthumus Albinus the Consul, he acquainted the Senate with it, by which, order was taken for apprehending the persons, imprisoning some, and putting others to death, as well in other parts of Italy, as in the City; the contagion having infected many other places, but especially Capua. It was brought to Rome out of Hetruria.

11. In the second or third year after this discovery, and the fourth of his exile, died P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, whether at Linternum, or Rome, is unknown, the place of his burial being also uncertain. That he died this year, Livy gathereth, because having been Prince or chief of the Senate at the former Lustrum, this year he was left out, (which none used to be as long as he lived) by L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato the Censors, the former whereof was chosen into the place. Valerius Maximus telleth us, that he commanded this to be ingraven on his Tomb, Ingrata Patria ne ossa quidem mea habes, which sheweth that he was not buried at Rome. He had that hap which usually accompanieth the best men, to find their Country ingrateful, being of excellent parts, and of a kingly spirit, which he ascribed to himself in Spain, when the natives saluted him by, and would have had him take upon him, the title it self. And upon this account he might be hated by Cato, who though a virtuous man, was morose and fowre. Livy joyneth with his (in the same year) the death of Philopæmen, and of Hannibal; so that the three great Captains of the World at that time, left it desolate as it were by agreement. Philopæmen Captain of the Achæans was through the fall off his Horse, taken in an engagement with the Messeniens, and compelled to drink poyson, having done great service for his Countrey. Hannibal having notice that the Romans would demand him from Antiochus, fled into Crete to the Gortynians. Having great treasure with him, and knowing himself to be in much danger, because of the Avarice of the Cretans, he filled many barrells with Lead, which covering on the top with Gold, he deposited in the Temple of Diana, trusting the Gortynians with his wealth. Then put he his money into brazen Statues, wick he was wont to cary about with him, and cast them before the gate. They then watching the Temple diligently from none so much as him, he got away secretly, and went to Prusias King of Bithynia, who used him in the Warre against Eumenes. But T. Quintius being sent to Prusias, whether by the Senate on purpose, or upon other occasions, demanded him as the grand enemy of Rome, to be delivered into his hands. He had provided in his house several places for issuing out upon such an occasion; but being beset, and no way left to escape, he took poyson, which it's said he caried about him in his ring. So this renowned Captain ended his life in his 70 year; for which thing Quintius was by many hardly thought of, and got the esteem of an importune and cruel man, as Plutarch writeth.

12. After these things, the Ligurians were often defeated by the Consuls and other Commanders; many a thousand of them being slain, as also of the Celtiberians and other Nations in Spain who were continually rebelling. The Istrians beat the Romans out of their camp, and put them to the rout; Manlius the Consul in vain opposing it; but shortly after they were discomfited by the said Manlius, and afterward fully subdued by Claudius the Consul, who quelled also the Ligurians, as his Collegue *Tib. SECT. 3. chus did the rebellion of Sardinia, with the losse of 1500 of the revolters. About this time Corfica also was subdued. The year following, Cornelius one of the Consuls died at the bath at Cuma, into whose place C. Valerius Lavinius was elected. Petilius Spurius the other Consul fighting against the Ligurians, laboured to take a certain Mountain called Letus, concerning which in his speech to his Soldiers he saying, that that day he would take Letus (Hodie ego Letum usque capiam) by rash fighting confirmed what he had said in another sence (viz. wherein Lethum signifieth death) than he had meant it. These actions abroad were shortly after followed by the second Macedonian War, or that with Perseus, in the 583 year of the City, 24 after the Peace made with his Father, and seventeen after the conclusion with Antiochus.

The War
with Perseus.

13. Perseus in a manner succeeded to this War as well as the Kingdom, his Father having intended and made great preparations for it. Puffed up by these preparations, he sought to draw away the Allies of the Romans from their friendship, and abused several of their friends. Their Ambassadors he slighted, refusing to give them audience, which made the Senate resolve upon the War; but it was to be committed to one of the following Consuls; only for the present, Cn. Sicinius the Prator of the City was commanded to raise men, and transport them into Epirus, there to seize on the Seaport towns, that the Consul might more freely land his Army. Some were sent also into Greece to confirm the States in their friendship and alliance, who also demanding audience of Perseus, after long waiting, he renounced the league made with the Romans, as entered into at the beginning of his reign merely for security. Hereupon the Ambassadors renounced also the confederacy made with him, and after that the Consuls P. Licinius Crassus and C. Cassius Longinus had assumed their Office, the Warre was propounded to, and decreed by, the People.

Peace is denied
Senate.

14. Quintus Martins and others being sent into Greece to establish the confederates in their fidelity, Perseus began to bethink himself, and was affrighted, hearing of the motions of the Enemy. He applied himself to Martins about a Treaty for Peace, trusting to that friendship which had passed betwixt their two families. The Ambassadors were glad of this addresse, and to divert him granted him Truce, that he might send to Rome, for he had all things in a readinesse, and might have begun the War, as with great advantage to himself, so too speedily to the Romans, who as yet had neither Army nor Leader arrived. Peace was denied him by the Senate, and A. Annius was sent to seize upon Larissa the chief City of Thessaly. Whereupon he drew together his Forces, having got a greater Army than any of his predecessors were Masters of since Alexander the Great. He took in some Towns upon his borders, and Licinius the Consul led so raw and unexperienced an Army into Macedonia, and through such difficult and almost unpassable places, as had Perseus taken his opportunity, he might easily have destroyed it, as also if he had not too soon retreated in a battel fought shortly after. After this he sent to Licinius, offering to embrace the conditions submitted to by his Father, in paying the tribute, and leaving the Cities to their liberty; which yet would not be granted. Then were Thebes and Albanus taken in by Lycetius the Prator; and the Consul having had the better in another skirmish, received some Towns, and took up his winter quarters; whilst Appius Claudius in Illyricum lost many men.

15. The year following C. Hostilius the Consul did nothing of moment; yet this he did in reference to the Army; he reduced the Soldiers to that ancient discipline which his predecessor had let fall. Q. Marcius Philippus succeeding him, at his first enterance into his Province might easily have been defeated, had he met with a prudent enemy, the wayes being so difficult and dangerous, that the Soldiers could scarcely for wearinesse hold their weapons. And after he had got into the plains he might easily have been shut up on every side, and famished, but that Perseus besetted with fear ran away to Pydna, and left the Straights open to him. Yet Marcius did nothing of consequence, leaving all to be performed by his Successor L. Aemilius Paulus, who had been Consul 17 years before. He caused the Eclipse of the Moon to be foretold to his Soldiers, lest they should be discouraged by it, which brought great terror to the Enemy, that knew nothing of the natural cause. He kept them from fighting when they were weary, though the Officers much desired to engage. But the Armies lying incamped on each side of the River Enipeus, it hapned that a beast passing over from the Roman side, was seized on, and being rescued by degrees drew both the Armies into an engagement, wherein Perseus lost the day, and with it his Kingdom. Flying into the Isle of Crete, when all forsook him, he delivered up himself into the hands of Cn. Octavius. Aemilius severely chastized the Epirots, who had joyned with Perseus, plundering and demolishing about 70 of their Towns, whereby so much booty was got, as each foot-man had 200 Denarii, and every horse-man as much more. But the Soldiers having got little or no plunder in Macedonia, nor any of the King's Treasure, denied their General a Triumph, which yet he obtained, and that very splendid. Of his four sons, the two eldest he granted to be adopted to Fabius Maximus, and Publius Scipio the son of Africanus, and of his two youngest, the one died five dayes before his Triumph, and the other three dayes after, which losse he sustained with great courage. Before his Triumphal Chariot was led Perseus with his two sons, and this same year Triumphed Cn. Octavius the Prator at Sea, besides L. Aemilius, before whose Chariot was led Gentius King of the Illyrians, whom being the Confederate of Perseus he had subdued, and forced to yield himself. This hapned to Macedonia and Illyricum, in the 586 year of the Citie, the said Aemilius, and L. Licinius Crassus being Consuls.

16. In the late War, Eumenes King of Pergamus, and the Rhodians, being wrought upon by Perseus, stood Neuters, whereupon Eumenes coming towards Rome, the Senate being unwilling either to declare him friend or foe, made a decree in General, that no King should come into the Citie: the Rhodians with much ado, and after much seeking, were hardly received as friends and confederates. The same year that Perseus was overthrown, Antiochus Epiphanes besieging Ptolomy in Alexandria, upon the desire of the besieged. C. Popillius Lenas an austere man, with C. Decimus, were sent from the Senate to command him to desist, which he obeyed. After this the Romans fought in Liguria and Corfica with various fortune, the Dalmatians who had wasted the Borders of Illyricum and had overcome, and were overcome by C. Marcius, were subdued by Scipio Nasica. But in Spain things went so badly, and such losses were received, that the Citie was abashed, none being found who would either go Lieutenant to the Consul, or take place of a Tribune upon him, till Scipio Aemilianus (the son of Paulus Aemilius, but adopted by Scipio the son of the African) standing up offered himself, and by his example drew on others. He went Lieutenant to Lucullus the Consul, and behaving himself most gallantly in the War, killed an Enemy in a Duel which had challenged out any one in the Army, and first mounted the Walls of Intercatia.

17. Lucullus subdued several Nations in Spain, though Salpicius Galba unfortunately fought against the Lusitanians. About the same time one Andriscus, an obscure man in Macedonia, but something resembling Philip, counterfeited himself the base son of Perseus. He was once sent to Rome by Demetrius the King of Syria, but making thence an escape returned, and renewed his claim to Macedonia, which partly by fair means, and partly by constraint, he got into his hands. Juventius the Prætor was first sent against him; but he having strengthened himself with the Thracians, cut him off and all his Army, and invaded Thessaly, whence he was ejected by the help of the Acheans. After this, Q. Metellus the Prætor sufficiently revenged the Commonwealth upon him, for he overthrew him in a great battel, whence he fled to Byzus, a petty King of Thrace, who delivering him up, he led him in Triumph. Metellus (accounted most fortunate) reduced Macedonia in this third Macedonian War into the form of Province, which shortly after also hapned to Africk. For, even now was prosecuting with all earnestnesse the third and last Punick or Carthaginian War, and the ruin of the Citie Carthage it self.

The pretences for the third Punick War.

18. Their opinion is not faulty, who professe not to be able to find any Meritorious cause of this War in the Carthaginians, & theirs, who affirm that Carthage was more hated for its comperition of Empire, than for any fault it had committed in those times. But there wanted not pretences. For, divers times had Masanissa King of Numidia, and the Carthaginians, quarrelled about grounds upon the Borders, and often had the Romans sent to take up the quarrel, but especially of late not with indifferency had they judged, for that the fault lay in Masanissa, who being a great friend of theirs, presumed too much upon their affection to himself, and the jealousie wherewith he knew them prejudiced against the other. The Ambassadors also that were sent to Carthage, finding the Citie full, and flourishing, from that peace they had now enjoyed about fifty years, and provided also for War as well as peace, spake much of the danger which threatned Rome from it; especially Caro, who never came into the Senate, but after that he had spoken his mind to any businesse, added, This I think, and that Carthage is to be destroyed. He was earnestly contradicted by Scipio Nasica, who feared, that this rival for Empire once being removed, security would breed the destruction of the Commonwealth; as it too truly proved, this security being strengthened by luxury and avarice, which the Asiatick Triumphs had brought in. But Caro's reasons drawn from present danger, so, in the apprehension of the Senate, over-ruled Scipio's forecast, that they resolved upon a War, and kept the resolution close till they could catch at a convenient opportunity and pretence.

19. There being at this time three factions in Carthage, one affected towards the Romans, another standing for the true interest of the State it self, and the third for Masanissa, this later was expelled by the second, and a Law made that they should never be again received. Those men flying to Masanissa, he sent Gulussa his son to intercede for them, who being laid in wait for by Amilcar Samnis, although he escaped, yet thereupon the King besieged Horoscopa, a Town he much desired; which act was expressly against the articles of the League. Asdrubal went with a great Army to raise the siege, and a bloody battel was fought, wherein the Carthaginians were overthrown; but more died of the Plague, being incompassed near a Lake, which by its noisom vapours corrupted the air. Hereby the remnant were forced to yield, and consent to a great Tribute, with the receiving back of their Exiles, and yet were they almost all slain by a parry of horse sent against them, out of revenge by Gulussa. The Carthaginians therefore had now had an Army in the field, and that against a confederate of Rome, which was against the tenour of the last League. This advantage the Romans took, and ordered the Consuls to undertake the War, though the other condemned those that had broken the League, and most humbly offered any reasonable satisfaction. M. Manilius Nepos, and L. Marcius Censorinus being now on their journey, it was answered, that they should enjoy all as formerly, if within 30 dayes they would send 300 hostages, (all sons of Senators, or the principal Citizens) to Lilybaeum, and do what the Consuls should further command them. The Carthaginians desirous to give satisfaction within the time limied sent the Children, and when now the Consuls were landed at Utica (which being a Sea-Town convenient for their purpose had been seized on beforehand) thither they sent their Commissioners to wait on them, and know their pleasure. Censorinus the Senior Consul commending their diligence, demanded all their Arms, which without any deceit were delivered up. Now with tears imploring mercy they desired to know their last doom, and were commanded to leave their Citie (which the Consuls had order to level with the ground) and build another any where in their own Territories, so it were but ten miles from the Sea. This they received with great horreur and rage, and all resolved rather to die than forsake, or give way to the ruin of, their ancient seat and habitation.

The Carthaginians being commanded to leave their Citie, refuse to obey.

20. The

20. The Consuls delayed to begin the War, as not doubting in the least but to take the Citie thus disarmed and naked at their pleasure. But they found it not so; for the Inhabitants acted by indignation and fury, though at first scarce themselves, setled their minds to resistance, men and women working night and day in making of Arms. Where iron and brasse were wanting, they made use of Gold and Silver; and the women gave the hair of their heads to supply the defect of Tow, or Flax. They made also Asdrubal (whom before for fear of the Romans they had condemned) their General in the field, where he had already a good Army. When the Consuls came against the Citie, they found such resistance that they were discouraged, and the resolution of the besieged increased hereby. They engaged several times to their disadvantage, and might have suffered much, had not the Army been secured and brought off, through the great wisdom and courage of Scipio Emilianus, who drew off also Pharneas, the Master of the Carthaginian horse-men, to his own party; which things procured him an exceeding great name. This year died Masanissa 90 years old, leaving a son but of four years behind him; and trusting his Kingdom with Scipio, to be at his discretion disposed of to his Children. This same year also died Cato, being about 85 years of age, and lived not to see the too much desired ruin of Carthage.

And the War
beginneeth.

Masanissa and Cato die.

21. The year following, Calpurnius Piso the Consul, and Mancinus the Admiral did no great matters, besieging Clupea, and Hippo (a Town situate betwixt Carthage and Utica) to no purpose. Within Carthage, Asdrubal Grand-son to Masanissa by his daughter, being joyned in commission with the other Asdrubal without, was accused by him as intending to betray the Citie to his Uncle Gulussa, and having nothing to say for himself, or being too slow in it, was knocked on the head by a form in the Council-house. Now at Rome were all mens eyes upon Scipio Emilianus, looking on him as destined to end the War; and whereas he sought but the Edileship, and it was against the Law for him to be chosen Consul so young (being but 36. whereas the Law required 43) it was dispensed with for this time, and then was he made Consul, who so ordered the matter, though not wholly during his Consulship, as he demonstrated the people not to have conceived vain hopes concerning him.

Scipio Emilianus
was made Consul, though under the Consular age;

22. For restoring Discipline which had gone much to wreck through the neglect of Piso, he soon after took that part of Carthage, called Megara, and drove the Inhabitants into the Citadel or Byrsa. Then securing the Isthmus leading to the Citie, he cut off all Provisions from out of the Countrey, and blocked up the Haven; but the Citizens with incredible industry cut out another passage into the Sea, whereby at certain times they could receive necessities from the Army without. Scipio therefore in the beginning of Winter set upon their forces lying abroad, whereof he slew 70000. and took 10000. so that now no relief could be obtained from without. In the beginning of Spring, he first took the Wall leading to the Haven Cubo, and then the Forum, where was a most lamentable spectacle, some being killed by the sword, and other wayes, others half killed by the fall of houses, or by fire, or half buried in the earth; or having one Limb torn from another. Six dayes the siege of the Citadel continued. On the seventh it was desired by some that all who would come forth should have their lives, which being granted to all but revolvers, some 50000 yielded, and afterward Asdrubal himself, who was reviled for it by the revolvers (who set fire to the Temple, and therewith burnt themselves) as also by his wife, which threw her self with her two Children into the flames.

Taken Car- thage.

23. Then was the Citie destroyed, being 22 miles in compasse, and so big, that the burning of it continued 17 dayes. The Senate at Rome receiving the news joyfully, sent ten of their own Rank whom they joyned with Scipio for disposing of the Countrey. They ordered none of Carthage to be left, and that it should never be rebuilt, laying heavy curses on those that should do it. All the Cities which assisted it in the War were to be razed, and the

All the Captives were sold, except some of the chief. And such was the destruction of this renowned City, so famous once for command and Empire, and rival to Rome itself, after it had stood about 700 years, in the fourth after the beginning of the War, the 608 of Rome, the third of the 158 Olympiad, and the fifth of Ptolemy Physcon. ## SECT. IV.

The Achaean war, and the destruction of Corinth.

1. THis year was fatal, not onely to the greatest City of Africk, but of Greece also; Corinth that famous Mart-town being levelled with the ground. The occasion was given by the Achaans themselves, who violated the Roman Ambassadors (though whether by word or deed is uncertain) who were sent to dissolve their Communality, and leave the Cities to their own peculiar Laws, which because of this union and fellowship had been too formidable. They had also in conjunction with the Boeotians and those of Chalcis, made War against the Lacedaemonians the friends and allies of Rome, because they would not be subject to them. Upon these grounds the Senate decreed the War, which Mecellus as yet in Macedonia first undertook; who drawing down his Army through Thessaly into Boeotia, there overthrew Crisolaus, then took Thebes, with Megara, and coming to the Isthmus was there treating of Peace, when L. Mummius the Consul came into this his Province. He overthrew Diaus the Achaean General, after which he entered Corinth and razed it, because there the Ambassadors had been abused. The men were slain, and the women and children sold, with all such slaves as the Achaans had manumitted for the Wars. As Scipio, who destroyed Carthage (as his Grand-father before him for conquering it) had the surname of Africanus, and Mecellus for his reducing Macedonia, that of Macedonicus; so this year Mummius for this success obtained the Sirname of Achaicus, and according to the custom, having others joyned with him, reduced those parts and all Greece with Epirus into the form of a Province, called afterwards Achaia, not Greece, because the Greeks were subdued when the Achaans had the chief command, as Pausanias writeth.

Viriatius up in Spain,

2. Now was it 74 years since the Romans, in the second year of the second Punick War, entered Spain in an hostile manner, and since that time, especially since the departure of Scipio Africanus the elder, many had the risings and strugglings of that People been, of all others most impatient of the yolk. Now was Viriatius up in arms, who of a shepherd became a robber, and of a robber a General over such-like as himself, and made the Romans work sufficient for the space of 14 years, in which time he defeated many Armies. Q. Fabius Maximus Semilianus (or rather Emilianus, being brother to Scipio Emilius, and adopted by Fabius Maximus) after some success was yet by him brought to such straights, as glad he was to ask Peace upon equal terms, which Cepio the Consul of the following year refusing to stand to, received orders from the Senate accordingly to prosecute the War. Cepio attempted at unawares to destroy him; but he escaped, and sending Ambassadors to treat of Peace, Cepio so wrought on them, that returning they murdered him, to their own shame, and the Consul's small credit, in his bed.

Is destroyed by Cepio.

3. But, a more dangerous War than this threatned from Numantia a town of no great bignesse, yet peopled with most valiant, though but few, Inhabitants.

Before Viriatus his death they had foiled Q. Pompeius the Consul several times, and forced him to condescend to a dishonourable Peace; which though he denied, was sufficiently proved, and by favour onely he escaped that punishment which fell on Mancinus, who being constrained to accept of the same terms, was delivered up to the Enemy; but (as the Sannites formerly did by another after the defeat at Caudinum) they refused to receive him. After this Brutus defeated many thousands of the Lusitanians, and overthrew the Gallacians; but Lepidus the Proconsul set upon the Vaccæ an harmlesse People of the hithermost Spain, or Hispania Terraconensis (for in the 559 year of the City, Spain was divided into Citerior or Terraconensis, and Uterior or Betica, and Lusitania, two Prætors being yearly sent thither, the number of which Officers was therefore upon this occasion increased to six) by whom he was utterly defeated. These things so affrighted the Roman Soldier, that he almost quaked at the sight of a Spaniard, and at Rome men were seized with great fear and shame. Therefore Scipio Æmilianus Africanus must be created Consul the second time, as the onely refuge and hope of his Country.

Bad successe in Spain

Causeth Scipio Æmilianus to be created Consul the second time.

He besiegeth Numantia and taketh it.

4. At the first he restored discipline, the want of which had spoiled all, but then coming to engage, found the courage of the Enemy such, that he resolved to fight no more, but lay close siege to Numantia, and govern himself according to the comportment of affairs. At length the besieged greatly straightned offered to yield upon reasonable conditions, or fight if they might have battel given them, which being denied, having drunk strong drink on purpose, they assailed the besiegers so fiercely, that the Romans hid run, but that Scipio was the General. At last they fired the City over their own heads, and scarcely one of them remained to be led in triumph. This famous City was seated in the hithermost Spain, in the head of Gallacia, and the confines of the Celsiberians. It had with 4000 men, for the space of fourteen years, saith Florus, or twenty according to Strabo, born the brunt of 40000 Romans, and many times put them to shameful flight with great slaughter. Scipio destroyed it, after he had for a year and three moneths continued the siege, fourteen years after he had so dealt with Carthage, in the 621 of the City, A. M. 3871. P. Mutius Scaevola and L. Calpurnius Piso Fruges (both learned men) being Consuls. At this time a servile War was raised in Sicily by one Ennus a Syrian of Apamea, the slave of Antigenes of Enna. It was followed by Calpurnius Piso the Consul, and finished by P. Rupilius Nepos his Successor. Twenty thousand slaves were by him slain in battel: Ennus being cast in prison died (it's said, of the lowlie disease) at Morgantia.

5. Ever since the beginning of the Tarentine War to this time, for the space of almost 150 years was there much modesty, abstinence, selfdenial, valour and virtue amongst the Romans in general, of which yet especially the Fabii, Fabritii, Marcelli, Curii, Metelli, the Scipio's and Æmilii have left examples admirable to be commended to all posterity, such were their cautions and politick yet just and noble carriage both at home and abroad. But now the Asian Expeditions and Triumphs having brought in excessse and rior, and the ruine of Carthage having taken away fear, idlenesse with security by degrees stole in upon them, and the infirmity of the Government (after that fear, which hitherto had preserved it safe, was removed) again effectually shewed it self. For though after this time many a People was subdued and brought under, and much glory gotten abroad, yet was it stined by emulations, jealousies, and contentions at home, and even by shedding the blood of one another in an open though civil feud, which first came to passe while the former things were performed in Spain by Scipio.

6. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus son to one of the same name (who had been twice Consul and once Censor) by Cornelia an excellent woman, daughter of Africanus the elder, being Quæstor to Mancinus the Consul in Spain, had an hand in the dishonourable Peace made by him, for which being reflected on by the Senate, or or at least thinking himself so to be, acted now by shame and fear, in distast of the Nobility, as it's said, he cast in his head how to become gracious and popular with the commons. Procuring himself to be chosen Tribune, he preferred a Law, forbidding any man to possesse above 500 acres of the publick grounds, and ordering the overplus to be divided to the poor. For, such grounds as the People of Rome took from their Enemies, they were wont, if till'd, to divide to their own Citizens; if not arable, they then let them out to farm by the Censors to Italians, or the ordinary sort of Romans, on condition, that if they plowed them, they should pay the tenth part of the Corn, and the fifth of other fruits: and if they bred up Cattel, they were charged with a certain rent. But it came to passe, that by incredible impudence and licentiousnesse of the rich, the Husband-men were outed of their ancient possessions, which by purchasing and other wayes they got wholly into their hands, so that the Publick was defrauded of it's revenue and the poor of their livelihoods. For restraining the avarice of the rich, the Lex Licinia and Sempronia were enacted. Gracchus increased the former by adding that, lest the Law should be wrested, half should be given to the children, and the rest divided to such poor as had nothing. And if any went about to enlarge their portion by purchase, Triumviri or three men should be yearly appointed to judge what ground was publick, and what private.

another Law for dividing of money,

7. This nettled the Nobility exceedingly, who by virtue of this Law were to part with their inheritances; and one of his Collegues, Ottavius by name, opposed it, for which he so handled him, as glad he was to quit his place, into which Gracchus chose Q. Mummius one of his own faction. This severity being without president, much alienated even the minds of the multitude from Gracchus, who also perceiving there was not ground enough to quiet them all (the expectation of whom he had now raised) he offered a Law for distributing the money which Attalus King of Pergamus had left, together with his Kingdom, to the People of Rome. The Senate being assembled to consult what was to be done, and all being of opinion that P. Mucius Scaevola the Consul should defend the Commonwealth by arms, he refused to do any thing by force. Hereupon Scipio Nasica taking up his gown under his left arm, held up his right hand, and bade every one that loved the State to follow him. Up he went into the Capitol, being accompanied with most of the Senate, many Equites, and some Commoners, where Gracchus was speaking to the People, and endeavoring to be chosen Tribune for the following year. They fell upon him and his hearers, whereof they killed 300, and amongst them himself with a piece of a seat as he ran down from the Capitol. Thus he fell by the means of his own kinsman, being a most excellently accomplished man, though too violent in a matter honest enough. And this was the first blood which in a seditious way the Romans first drew from one another, observed by Cicero to have been at the same time that the other Scipio destroyed Numantia.

8. At this time were there some risings at Athens, and in Delos, being as sparks of that fire formerly kindled by Ennus in Sicily, which with some trouble were extinguished; neither was Italy altogether free from them. But a more noble War insued about the Kingdom of Asia. For, Attalus King of Pergamus or Asia (for so he is called, because of a good part of Asia given to Eumenes his father) by his last will left the People of Rome his heir: But after his death Aristonicus his base brother seized on the Kingdom as his inheritance. First was Licinus Crassus the Consul sent against him, but was overthrown, and being taken struck one of the Soldiers on the eye, on purpose to provoke him to kill him, which he did. He having thus miscaried (though he was assisted in his enterprise by several Kings,) his Successor M. Perpenna, hasting into Asia set upon Aristonicus at unawares, when he was not yet recovered of the security contracted by his Victory, and overthrowing him in battel besieged him in Stratonice, where he forced him by famine to yield, and shortly after the Consul died at Pergamus. The remainder of the War was finished by M. Aquilius the next year's Consul, who who poisoned Fountains for taking in some Cities, and having together with those joyned with him (according to the custom) settled the Province with sufficient oppression of the people, he led Aristonicus in Triumph, though taken by another man's labour; who by order of the Senate was strangled in prison, in the 625 year of the City, the said M. Aquilius Nepos, and C. Sempronius Tuditanus being Consuls.

And strangled.

The civil dissensions renewed.

Caius Gracchus, the brother of Tiberius, patronized his Law.

9. The civil dissensions died not with Gracchus (who perished four years before) his Law for division of the grounds being still in force, and the people being sensible of the equity thereof, as they accounted it; for that the rich had got all into their hands, and those that underwent all the toil in Conquering the Land, were ready to starve, being also exhausted by the Wars, and almost none but slaves left in Italy for ordering of the grounds. Gracchus had a younger brother called Caius, whom together with Fulvius Flaccus, and Papirius Carbo, he had made Triumvirs for division of the grounds. He with his Collegues undertook the patronage of the Law, and prosecuting his Enterprize with all earnestness, such trouble arose about the division, in accounting and removing, that the Italians finding themselves agrieved betook themselves to Scipio Africanus. He refused not to undertake their patronage, yet in the Senate spake nothing against the Law; onely thought fit that the executive power thereof should be taken from the Triumvirs, and given to some others. The Senate most willingly did this, and conferred it on Sempronius Tuditanus the Consul, who finding the work troublesome, went his way under pretence of the War in Illyricum. There being now none to flie to in this case, the people conceived great indignation against Scipio, as ingratefull, and favouring the Italians more than themselves, from which his Enemies took occasion to raise further jealousies. Indeed hearing of Gracchus his death at Numantia by repeating a verse in * Homer he liked well of what was done to him, and being at his return asked concerning his death, he approved of it before all the people, which being offended at him for it, he rebuked the multitude with contumelious language. But at night going to his Chamber, he meditated of something he intended to speak to the people the day following, and in the morning was found dead in his bed, it's uncertain by what means. Cornelia the Mother of the Gracchi was suspected to have joyned with her daughter his wife (who being not over-handsome, neither loved him much nor was over much loved) in practizing something upon him. No inquisition was made after his death, and he was buried privately, though so great a man, and one that had been the pillar of the Commonwealth.

Scipio Africanus the younger dieth suddenly.

Caius getting the Tribuneship prefereth Laws distastfull to the Senate.

10. The Possessors of the grounds still made delays in the division, and some thought that they to whom they were to be divided should in way of recompense be made free of the City, which however pleasing to others, was highly displeasing to the Senate. While men muttered much of these things, C. Gracchus procured the Tribuneship, and then bearing a grudge to the Senate effectually shewed it. He preferred a Law for dividing of the publick Corn to every man monethly, and getting his Office continued to him for another year, that he might gratifie the Equites, brought down the Office of judging corrupt Officers from the Senators unto them. Romulus, as we said, instituted three Centuries of Equites or Hors-men, whereof one from himself was named Ramensis; another from Titus Tatius, Tatienis; and the third from Lucanio (or Lucus) Lucretis. Under Romulus, and the Kings, they were also called Celeres, Flexumines and Troisuli. Afterwards, Tarquinius Priscus added 300 more, and so there continued to be 600 Equites. But though they were in the Commonwealth from the beginning, yet had they no peculiar order, authority, or rank, till this Law of Gracchus, by which it was enacted, that these judgements should be peculiar to them. Their reputation thence forward increased with various successes about the Publicans till Cicero's time, who boasting himself of this order, procured it such honour, that from his Consulship it came to be as a peculiar order in the State (before being included in the Plebeian, though it had a distinction by way

SECT. 4. of service) being added to the Senatorial and Plebeian; out of which respect it was written after them both. Thus in several times were there several Ranks and distinctions; the first distinction was betwixt Patricians and Plebeians; then Plebeians wresting from the other a Communion in the greatest Offices and places, though Patricians might still be distinguished in reference to Families, yet all Dignities being common to the rest with them, such Plebeians as could rise to be Senators, constituted with the other the Senatorial rank (which included the Patrician, though the Patrician not it) thenceforth distinct from the Plebeian which still contained the Equites. Then, as was said, the Equites by the means of Gracchus and Cicero brake out from amongst the Plebeians into a rank of their own.

How the Senators lost in the translation of the judicial power to the Equites by Caino.

Publicans whence so called.

Caino attempteth other seditious acts.

11. By this Law (saith Florus) Gracchus so divided the people of Rome, that he made it double headed (bicipitem, which expression Varro also used, as appeareth from Nonius) and the Equites having the lives, and fortunes of Senators and Nobles in their hands, by seizing on the Revenue, with authority pill'd the Commonwealth. He took the best time that could be devised for the making of the Law, because the Senators having had hitherto the power of judging, were become odious of late, in that for money they had acquitted Aurelius Cotta, Salinator, and M. Aquilius, persons Capitally guilty of corruption. It's said, he boasted, that by this Law he had cut the sinews of the Senatorial rank. And so he did; for by the authority of judicature they passed sentence upon Roman Citizens, Italians and Senators, noting them with ignominy, banishing, or putting them to death at pleasure, till such time as their power was abated, as will be seen. For in the Comitia, or Assemblies, they conspired with the Tribunes, and obtaining thereby what they pleased, had all things in their power, and flourished with riches, whereas nothing remained to Senators, but a vain shew of Dignity. The Senators prevailed with Servilius Capi when Consul, to make themselves partakers of the power of judging, by a Law which he got preferred; yet still had the Equites the better, for 300 Senators onely were added to them, who were in number 600. By the Laws of Livius Drusus, Sylla and Cotta their power was abated, Drusus making it but equal in judgement with that of Senators. Sylla transferred it wholly to the Senators, and Aurelius Cotta communicated the power of judging to three sorts; viz. Senators, Equites, and the Tribuni Aerarii. But the Equites alone were wont to farm the customes of the Censors for five years, and thence from their farming the Publick Revenue had the name of Publicans. These were the principal of the Equestrian order, the Ornament of the Cirie, and the strength of the State, who made so many Companies as there were Provinces subject to the payment of Toll, Tribute, Custom, or Impost.

12. But, C. Gracchus, further than this, to gratifie the Commons, repaired the high-ways throughout Italy, sent forth Colonies, bade the Italians sue for their freedom, and gave power of suffrages to other Friends and Allies, contrary to the custom; whom the Senate forbad to come near the Cirie, at such time as they knew his Laws would be offered, and to please the people, they gave way to the sending out of twelve Colonies. Gracchus thus frustrated, departed into Africk with Flaccus his Colleague, intending to plant a Colony where Carthage stood; but was disappointed therein also, Wolves, it's said, removing the bounds of the intended Cirie by night, as they were laid by day, whereupon the Sooth-sayers pronounced the design unlawfull. Having been twice Tribune, he stood for it the third time, and had many voices; but his Collegues offended by his vehement carriage, got Minucius Rufus chosen into his place, who rescinded many of his Laws. Gracchus enraged hereat, when the Assembly was met, went up to the Capitol, accompanied with Flaccus and his friends privily Armed. There Atilius the Crier of Opimius the Consul taking him by the hand, and desiring him to spare his own Countrey, was slain. He then went about to excuse the fact to the people, but could not be heard, and so together with Flaccus, and his other Confederates got them home, the Consul keeping strict watch all night in the Cirie.

Citie. After this they were cited by the Senate to come and give an account of their actions, but they betook themselves to the Aventine Mount, where fortifying themselves, they offered in vain liberty to all slaves that would come in to them. But the Consul sending a party against them, Gracchus fled into a grove beyond Tiber, and procured his slave to kill him, who instantly after he had cut off his head, run himself through with the bloody sword. Flaccus flying to a friends house was betrayed and slain: and of their party, through the severe inquisition of the Consul, were put to death 3000 persons, 11 years after the death of the elder Gracchus. In the Consulship of this Opimius was there such a temper of the air called Coctura, that wine being congealed through the heat of the Sun into a consistency of honey, kept good for near 200 years, and from him had the name of Vinum Opimianum, being still preserved in Plinius (a) his time, though (b) Paterculus denieth there was any in his, which was long before.

13. The death of Gracchus (whose head was not Sacrosanct, as Florus imagineth, being out of the Office of Tribune) for the present allayed the distempers of the Commonwealth. For, presently after was a Law made, that any one might sell his Land, which the Elder Gracchus had forbidden, whereby the poor, partly by purchase, & partly by constraint, were again dispossessed. Afterward the Law for division was fully abrogated by Sp. Borcius, and the grounds left to their ancient Owners, with this condition, that a Tribute out of them should be payed to the people, and this divided man by man. But not long after another Tribune abrogated the Tribute it self, and so nothing was left remaining to the poor.

14. During these Domestick troubles the Sardinians rebelled, and were reduced by L. Aurelius, and the Fregellans were punished with the losse of their Citie by L. Opimius the Prætor. Upon Africk fell such a Pestilence, as for its Original, and effects, was strange and wonderfull. It arose from an infinite number of Locusts, which having overspread the ground, and destroyed not onely Corn and other fruits, but even Trees and dry things themselves, at length by a wind were driven into the Mediterranean Sea, and there putrifying corrupted the air. Hence ensued a most fearfull plague, both of men, Cattel, and Fowls. In Numidia, where Micipsa was now King, 800000 died; upon the Sea-Coasts about Carthage and Utica 200000; and in Utica it self 30000 Soldiers there lying in Garrison, 1500 being reported to have been carried out in one day through one Gate alone. Two years after, Q. Metellus the Consul subdued the Islands Baleares, and restrained piracy there maintained, and at the same time was carried on the War, called Bellum Allobrogicum; which hence arose. The Salies in Gall beyond the Alps invaded the Alasilians, the friends of the people of Rome, and for this were chastized by Fulvius, and subdued by C. Sextius Calvinus. Teutomalus their King flying out of the battel, was received, and protected by the Allobroges, who also invaded the Ædai friends of Rome, and drew into Confederacy the Arverni. First, Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus overthrew them, and (by the use of Elephants especially) slew 20000. and took 3000 prisoners. After him Q. Fabius Maximus (Grandson of Paulus Æmilius, by his son adopted into the Fabian family) defeated them, with the Arverni and Ruteni, in a bloody battel, wherein 120000 are reported to have been slain, and taking Bituitus (or Beutulus) King of the Arverni prisoner, obtained the surname of Allobrogicus. These Allobroges inhabited about the Countreys now called Daulphine and Savoy: the Ruteni neater to the Sea; the Arverni more toward the North; the Ædai in Burgundy, and the Salioi or Salies in Piemont. Now was Gallia Narbonensis reduced into a Province.

15. But the Scordisci, a people of Gallia Original, inhabiting Thrace, defeated the Roman Army under Cato the Consul, yet were afterwards driven back into their own Countrey by Didius the Prætor, and the Consul Drusus; and after this gave occasion of a glorious Triumph to Minutius, of which honour Metellus also had partaken. These transactions of Thrace are of all others most unknown; either because they are confounded with those of Illyricum, Pannonia, Mysia, or Macedonia; or because what has been written of that subject in particular, hath miscaried. Now we arrive at two Wars both together, and carrying noyse sufficient with them through the variety of events, and fulnesse of history: viz. that with Jugurtha, and the other with the Cimbri and Teniones. Now to know the Original of the former, it's necessary to fetch things a little higher.

The original of the War with Jugurtha.

16. Masaniſſa King of Numidia, that old and constant friend of the Romans, left three sons: Gulassa, Maſſanabal, and Micipſa, of whom the laſt (his brothers being dead) obtained the Kingdom alone. He had two sons, Hiempſal and Adherbal, with whom he brought up Jugurtha his brother Maſſanabal's son in the ſame condition, and receiving letters from Scipio out of Spain, who gave him large commendations (and under whom he ſerved with his Uncle's Auxiliary forces) he adopted him. When Micipſa was dead, Jugurtha murdered Hiempſal, and attempted to do as much for Adherbal, who fled to the Romans for ſuccour. By this time avarice and inſtice had ſo much poſſeſſed the City, that Jugurtha ſenſible of it, ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome with full hands, who ſo wrought upon the Senate, that might overcame right, and it was decreed, that ten Commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to divide the Kingdom betwixt them. The Commiſſioners thinking they might lawfully imitate thoſe that ſent them, were bribed to beſtow the richeſt and beſt Peopled part upon Jugurtha, who therewith not ſatisfied, after their departure, ſell ſodainly upon Adherbal, beſieged him in Cirta, and at length getting him into his hands made him away. For this, War was at length decreed againſt him by the Senate, and committed to the management of L. Calpurnius Beſtia the Conſul, in the 643 year of the City, the ſecond of the 167 Olympiad, the ſeventh of Ptolomy Laſburus, the 25 of Job. Hyrcanus, P. Cornelius Scipio Naſſea, and the ſaid Calpurnius being Conſuls.

17. Calpurnius invaded Numidia with great fierceneſſe, and took in ſome Towns, but was preſently ſtopped in his career, being allured with the golden balls of Jugurtha; ſo that a Treaty of Peace was ſet on foot. The Senate was moved hereat, and at the power of M. Scæurus, who accompanying the Conſul as his friend and counſellor, was guilty of the ſame crime. The People was perſwaded to ſend L. Caſſius Longinus the Prætor to fetch Jugurtha to Rome upon the publick faith, to diſcover his complices, whereof he had by gold procured many in the Senate it ſelf. Caſſius perſwaded him to caſt himſelf upon the Peoples mercy, and he came to the City in a mourning habit. But coming into the Aſſembly to do as he was commanded, Baſtus the Tribune bade him hold his Peace, being alſo bribed to put off the buſineſſe, and delude the People. At this time there was one Maſſina the ſon of Gulassa his couſin german at Rome, who when he had murdered Adherbal eſcaped out of Africa. Him Albinus the Conſul, (who gladly would have had to do with Numidia) perſwaded to beg the Kingdom of the Senate: but Jugurtha having ſome notice hereof, procured him to be killed, and conveyed away the murderer into Numidia. Hereupon within a few dayes he was commanded to be gone, and being out of the City, he looked back upon it, and uttered theſe words: O City that wouldeſt be ſold if there was but a chapman for thee. This he ſaid, as having himſelf experience of the corruption of it's Inhabitants; ſo horribly were they now degenerated from the fidelity and abſtinenſe of the preceding age.

18. Albinus followed him with an Army, and at firſt ſeemed to be very ambitious of finiſhing the War, before the creation of new Conſuls. But upon ſome account he prolonged it, and his brother, by virtue of ſome compact, withdrew from Snihul, where the treaſure of the Kingdom lay, when he was about to beſiege it. The Centurions alſo were ſo corrupted, as Jugurtha was ſuffered to break into the Camp, whence beating out the Army, he either forced, or by former agreement, brought Albinus to ſubmit unto moſt diſhonourable terms. In this condition Metellus the following Conſul

But is humbled by Metellus.

Consul found affairs and the Army spoiled for want of discipline. But bringing the Soldiers into good order, within the space of two years he overthrew Jugurtha several times, oured him of several Towns, and chased him further than his own borders, which constrained him to submit and beg Peace; but the conditions thereof he brake, and the former hostility returned. Now was there one C. Marius, Legatus or Lieutenant to Metellus, who by his good demeanour won much upon the Soldiers, for being desirous of the Consulship, he took all wayes to purchase their favour. He calumniated Metellus privily to the Merchants at Utica, avowing that he was able with half of the Army, and that within a few dayes, to take Jugurtha. By these speeches he procured many complaints to be written to Rome against Metellus, and getting leave to go thither, obtained his desire, being created Consul, and had the management of the War committed to him, which now was even ended. Notwithstanding, the People was so grateful to Metellus, that at his return, being certified what he had done, they both granted him a Triumph, and bestowed on him the surname of Numidicus.

Several of the Metelli obtained surnames from Countries conquered.

19. This was the fourth Metellus, who from the Nation subdued obtained a surname. The first was Q. Cecilius Metellus surnamed Macedonicus, of whom we have formerly spoken. Much is said of this man's * felicity, whereof this is chief, that when he died, he had, of four sons, seen three Consuls, and the fourth Prætor. Of these, the first was Q. Metellus surnamed Balearicus from his subduing the Baleares, who was Consul in the 631 year of the City: the second L. Metellus, who was Consul in the 635 year: the third M. Metellus, Consul in the 639 year, the same wherein his father died: and the fourth C. Metellus of Prætorian rank. But the third of this name who obtained a surname was L. Cecilius Metellus, surnamed first Diadematus, because having an ulcer in his forehead, he kept it bound a long time, and afterwards Dalmaticus, from the Dalmatians whom he subdued to get him a Triumph; this People having nothing offended. He was son to L. Cecilius Metellus Calvus, who was Consul in the 612 year. Lastly, the fourth thus surnamed was this Q. Cecilius Metellus Numidicus, who was Consul together with M. Junius Silanus in the 645 year of the City.

Marius overthroweth Jugurtha and Bocchus.

20. Marius after some time took the City Capsa a place very rich and strong, and after this another called Mulucha. Jugurtha finding himself too weak, drew in to his assistance Bocchus King of Mauritania his Father in Law, by the help of whose Horse he very much wearied the Roman Army. Coming to raise the siege at Cirta, before which Marius was sat down, what by the number of the Horse reported to be 60000, and what by heat and dust, the Romans were sorely distressed, and the fight continued dangerous and terrible to them for three dayes. Then a Tempest of rain fell, which spoiled their Enemies weapons, and relieved Marius his men almost killed with thirst; and the course of fortune changing, the two Kings were defeated and fled. In another battel Marius, as it's said, killed 90000, after which Bocchus began to repent of his enterprize, and sent to Rome to enter into a League, which he could not procure, but obtained pardon of his fault. Not long after, Marius took Jugurtha in an ambush, whither he had drawn him by specious pretences, and delivered him up to Sylla his Quæstor, who had brought over some forces gathered in Italy. Sylla having little or no skill in matters of War before, under him got that skill, which afterwards he used against his General. Jugurtha being led in triumph by Marius with his two sons, was after, by order of the Senate put to death, and so the War ended, after about seven years continuance. Numidia was not now made a Province, as some have thought; for we find other four Kings on which it was bestowed, viz. Hiempsal, Hiarbas, and Juba, concerning whom we may have occasion to speak hereafter. Now is to be described the War with the Cimbri.

Taken Jugurtha who is led in triumph and put to death.

21. The Cimbri inhabited the Chersonesus from them named Cimbrica, (now Holsatia) and were a vagabond People. With a sort of Germans called Teniones (from Tenio or Tuisco the Patriarch, or reputed god of that Nation)

Nation) they brake into Illyrium in the 641 year of the City, and there put to flight Cn. Carbo the Consul, to whom that Province had fallen by lot. Some three years after, they made an irruption into Gall and Spain, but being repelled, sent to Silanus the Consul, desiring some ground wherein to plant and settle themselves. This being denied by the Senate, they betook themselves from intreaties to force, and setting upon the Consul put him to flight, entertaining M. Scaurus sent against them into Gall in the same manner. Scaurus was succeeded by the Consul L. Cassius Longinus, who pursuing the Tigurins (now Switzers) to the Ocean, was circumvented by them, and slain, with L. Piso, a man of Consular dignity, his Lieutenant. After him Capio the Consul made War upon the Tectosages or Tolosans, whose chief City Toloso (now in Gascoigne) he took, and therein a great treasure, which some said was taken out of the Temple at Delphos by the Galls. His command was continued to him for the following year, as Proconsul, in conjunction with Manilius (or Mallus) his Successor. These two could not agree, but divided the Army, and parted the Province betwixt them. At length they were overthrown in a bloody battel by the Cimbri, to whom the Tenons, Tigurins, and Ambrones, another People of Gall joyned themselves: 80000 men were slain, and 40000 lackies and drudges, as also both the Camps taken. Capio for this was cast into prison, where he died, these great defeats being charged upon his sacrilege, of which those Galls that were guilty, were still followed and consumed by one plague after another. After this, the Cimbri made another Expedition into Spain; but being thence repelled by the Celeberians, returned into Gall, whence, with the Tenons and Ambrones, they resolved to passe over the Alpes into Italy.

22. C. Marius having vanquished Jugurtha, was in his absence made Consul the second time, to manage the War against the Cimbri. Whilst they continued in Spain he waged War against their friends the Tolosans, whose King Copilus was taken by Sylla his Lieutenant. Being created Consul again the following year, he neglected to fight till their fury was abated. In his fourth Consulship they were ready in three bands to passe over the Alpes, which he considering, attended their motions. His Army was almost oppressed with thirst, the Tenons and Ambrones lying betwixt it and the water, which made him desirous to ingage with them, and coming to fight, in two dayes he utterly destroyed them, taking prisoner Thentobocchus their King. The Cimbri escaped him and got over into Italy, though it was Winter, and the Alpes were covered with snow, being in vain opposed by Caecilius, both at the Alpes and the River Athesis near Verona. To Caecilius did Marius joyn himself now the fifth time Consul, for carrying on the War, and being challenged to give battel slew 140000, and took 60000. Their wives resisted, fighting from the Chariots, and when they saw all desperate, killed first their children and then themselves. The third band of the Tigurines came to nothing; and so an end was put to this War, on the third of the moneth Sexilis, as Plutarch writeth, after it had continued twelve years, in the 653 year of the City, C. Marius the fifth time, and M. Aquilius Nepos being Consuls, the former whereof was counted the preserver of his Country, and contented himself with one Triumph. And his Colleague put an end to the second Servile War in Sicily, which now had lasted almost four years.

23. These dangers abroad did not suppress domestic troubles. There was one L. Apuleius Saturninus, who having been Quæstor at Osfin during a dearth, was put out of his place by the Senate, for which he conceived great displeasure against it, and to shew it, procured the Tribuneship. By his help especially Marius obtained the fourth Consulship. But after his year was out, Metellus Numidicus being Censor would have removed him from the Senate, but he was hindered by his Colleague; and to revenge this he stood to be Tribune the second time. Now was Marius Consul the fifth time, and there being nine of the ten Tribunes chosen, and A. Nonius standing in competition with him, by the assistance of Marius he murdered him, and got the place.

place. Now being again in power, he preferred a Law for dividing of such Lands as Maurs had recovered in Gall, and compelled the Senate to swear to it, which Metellus refusing to do, he set him a day to answer it before the people; but for fear of him and Marius, Metellus fled to Smyrna. Saturninus being Tribune the third time, and finding C. Memmius to stand for the Consulship; he also made him away to prefer Glancius the Prator, a man most addicted to his own party. At these things the Senate being startled took up resolution, and Marius now the sixth time Consul, seeing him in a falling condition, withdrew himself from his friendship. The Consuls were, as in dangerous times, impowered by the Senate to see that the Commonwealth received no damage. Marius therefore with his Collegue L. Valerius Flaccus, set upon Saturninus in the publick meeting place, and drove him and his followers into the Capitol, where for want of water (Marius having cut the pipes) they were forced to yield. This they did upon his faith given for their safety; for Saturninus and Glancius much relied upon him, not sticking to give out that they were but the actors of his designs. Notwithstanding, they were killed in the Court-house by the Equites, which brake in amongst them; and Metellus, through the labour of his son especially, was recalled, with the general applaus of the people.

24. For the space of about 8 years after, there was not any open Sedition; yet great dissatisfaction amongst those of the Senatorial order. For, it lay under great grievances by reason of the power of Judicature, which was by Gracchus his Law brought down to the Equites, by whom they were cruelly, and despightfully used, their lives, liberties, and estates being wholly in their power. The Commonwealth was even bought and sold, the Publicans, who farmed the customs, and publick revenues, being, as Equites, both Judges and parties. It hapned that thirty years after Gracchus his Law, M. Licinius Drusus the Tribune cast in his mind how to restore the Fathers to their antient power, and yet not offend the Equites. He preferred therefore a Law, that because the Senators were reduced to a small number, as many Equites should be added to them, and the power of Judicature committed to this body. But herewith neither party was satisfied. Not the Senators, because they disdained that the other should be equal to them, and neither the Equites, for that they feared the power would at length be wholly removed from them. Capio also one of Drusus his Collegues (not that Capio, as some mistake, who having been formerly Consul had proposed such a Law, which took not, he himself being condemned, and dying in prison as was said) opposed him, and coming into the Senate, there accused some of the chief of unlawfull seeking for Offices. Drusus to withstand his indeavours, by the favour of the people proposed again the Agrarian Law, and that the Allies and Confederates of Italy, now Possessors of the Lands, might not be aggrieved, he gave them hopes to make them free of the Cirie. Great concourse there was, and as great contention. Q. Marcus Philippus the Consul opposed the Law for division of Lands, and for that was soundly buffeted by a Traveller. Drusus in this particular disappointed, still bent his mind how to make good what he had offered to the Italians; but going home accompanied with a great multitude, he was stabbed in the Court of his own house, its unknown by whom, the knife being left in his body, and died within a few hours. He was a man excellently accomplished, both with understanding and morals, whose good intencions had not the fortune to be rightly understood by the great ones, but to dissatisfie all parties. And still more unfortunate he was in that great and dangerous War, which by his means (though not intentional) was kindled, and which being foreseen or feared, might perhaps have no small influence into his death.

25. This War is called by divers names. before all others chosen for the place of the conspiracy. The occasion of it was the disdain conceived by the Italians, because they were not admitted to the freedom of the Citie, which had been partly promised them 36 years before by Flaccus the Consul, who being earnest for it, was diverted into Gall by the Senate, and afterwards joyned himself in the Tribuneship with the younger Gracchus, to no purpose endeavouring with him the passing of it; with whom also as is formerly shewn he lost his life. Now again, their expectation was heightened by Drusus; but then was he murdered, and all the great ones banished who stood for them, by a Law which the Equites by force of Arms obtained, who hoped that having the power of Judicature in themselves, the profit would be great which would arise in ridding away their Enemies. They also thought they had reason enough to expect this privilege from that Citie, which was maintained both in its subsistence and Empire by their valour, they ever sending out forces double in number to those of the Romans. Upon these grounds they resolved to procure by force what could not be by fair means obtained, sending Messages to and fro, and for the performance of what was agreed on, receiving Hostages from one another.

26. This being known late enough at Rome, so busied with its private seditious contests, Spies were sent out into the several quarters. One of them seeing a young man of Asculum carried into another Citie as an Hostage, therewith acquainted Servilius the Proconsul, who going to Asculum and chiding the Citizens, was set upon and slain, together with all the Romans. After this, the Conspiracy being quite discovered, all broke out into open Rebellion: the Marfi, Peligni, Vestini, Marrucini, Perentani, Hirpini, Picentes, Pompeiani, Venusini, Apulians, Lucanians, and the old Enemies of the Romans, the Samnites. They thought good first to send to Rome to complain; but the Messengers could not be admitted without repentance for what was already done. Hereupon the War was committed to both the Consuls, L. Julius Caesar, and P. Rutilius Lupus, to whom were added Cn. Pompeius Strabo (father to Pompey the Great) C. Marius, who had been six times Consul, L. Sylla, Licinius Crassus, C. Perenna, Q. Capio, Q. Metellus Pius (son to the Numidian) M. Marcellus, Val. Messala, and T. Didius, who were all sent with Proconsular power. The forces on either side amounted to 100000 fighting men. Rutilius the Consul quickly lost his life, falling into an ambush laid for him by the Marfi, and many other blows did the Romans receive; so that they were forced to list such as once had been slaves. The bodies of the Consul, and those of several others being carried into the Citie, the sight of them so discouraged the people, that the Senate made a decree, that thenceforth the slain should be buried where they died, which as a prudent example was followed by the Enemy.

27. None succeeded Rutilius all the year, for that Caesar could not come to a new Election, but his Army was committed to Marius his Lieutenant, and Q. Capio. Capio was killed not long after, being intrapped by Popedius one of the Italian Generals. Marius now alone commanding the forces, did good service, as did also Sylla. For the following year, Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato were made Consuls. Now the Senate thought fit to make such Italians free of the Citie as had not revolted, which thing established those, who something wavered in their minds, and took off the courage of the other already engaged: Yet they chose them not into any of the 35 Tribes, but placed them by themselves behind all; so that as in voting they could not hinder the rest, so seldom were they called to vote at all, which afterwards considered, though not at present, wrought some disturbance. Cato the Consul did very good service, but thereof boasted so much, that he compared himself to Marius, for which, as he was fighting against the Marfi, he was killed in a croud by Marius his son. Pompey overthrew the Picenes and Asculani. Having long besieged Asculum, he defeated the Enemy which sallied forth, killed 18000 of the Marfi, took 3000, and being got into Asculum, caused all the Officers and principal men men to be beaten with Rods, and then beheaded. Sylla his Successor in the Consulship overthrew the Sannites, and stormed two of their Camps, by which successe elevated, he went, stood for, and carried that greatest Office. This War was ended by him after it had endured above two years, in the 666 year of the Citie, he the said L. Cornelius Sylla, and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Consuls.

28. What the Italians could not get with armed hand, was given them Conquered; at first to all, except the Lucanians and Sannites, and shortly after to them also, but ranked by themselves in the same manner as the former. Not long after this, which was a kind of Civil War, there were riots in the Citie about Usury, which being rigorously exacted by the Creditors, Asellio the Prator, who withstood it, was murdered by them. Yet hitherto these Seditions in the Citie were managed but by private persons, or in a private manner, but now came it to that passe, that the heads of the factions got whole Armies to themselves, and carried on their interests in open War one against another, their own Countrey being as the prize and reward of the victory, such were the manners and behaviour of those who through the infirmity of the Government were not able to bear that greatnesse of fortune, which from the temperance and moderation of their fathers had descended upon them. But an occasion to the first Civil War was ministred by that with Mithridates, which began ere the Social or Italian ended.

SECT. V.

From the War with Mithridates, and first Civil War, to the combination of Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar, termed by Varro Tricipitina, which proved the ruin of the Popular Government, for the space for 28 years.

Mithridates
King of Pontus.

1. Mithridates was King of Pontus (a Countrey of Asia, so called because it lieth upon the Euxine Sea) thought by some to have been descended from one of the seven Persians, who conspired against the Magi that had usurped after the death of Cambyses. He was surnamed Eupator and Dionysus, being a man of a vast mind and ambitious spirit. Succeeding his father, who was a friend of the people of Rome, at thirteen years of age, within two years he made away his mother, who was left partner with him in the Kingdom, and after her his brother also, and in his youth he subdued the Kings about Phasis beyond Caucasus. Thirty years after his coming to the Kingdom, he thought of no lesse than the Empire of Asia, the Romans, as he fancied, being now sufficiently employed in the Cimbrian and Italian Wars. He began with Paphlagonia, parting it betwixt himself and Nicomedes King of Bithynia, and being checked for this by the Romans, and commanded to desist, he pretended it was his fathers inheritance, and to amend the matter he seized on Galatia too. Then casting his eye upon Cappadocia, he caused to be murdered Ariarathes King thereof, and his sisters husband, and when she married to Nicomedes he drove out his forces, and pretended to seize upon it for the use of her son, whom then he murdered also, and bestowed it on one of his own sons. The Cappadocians refused to obey him, and called out of Asia Ariarathes one of their former King's sons; but him did Mithridates drive away, and he shortly after died. Nicomedes afterwards procured one to counterfeit himself the brother of Ariarathes, and beg the Kingdom of the people of Rome; and he sent his wife thither to aver that she had three sons by Ariarathes. Mithridates hereupon sent one to the Senate to affirm, that he whom he had placed in Cappadocia was also the son of Ariarathes.

Cappadocia; and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes, who had got it into his hands, and left these two Kingdoms to their own liberty. But the Cappadocians protested that they could not live without a King, and being therefore allowed to chuse one from amongst themselves, made choice of one Ariobarzanes. Mithridates sorely repining to be thus overruled, procured Tigranes the King of Armenia and his son in Law to be an Enemy to the Romans, and perswaded him to expel Ariobarzanes, whilst he did as much by young Nicomedes, who now had succeeded his dead Father. Both of these Princes fled to Rome for relief, which was decreed them, and Commissioners were appointed to re-establish them, whereof Manius Aquilius was chief. This being performed, they perswaded both the Kings to invade Mithridates. Nicomedes did it, though unwillingly, whilst Mithridates opposed him not, that he might have an advantage against him; onely he sent Pelopidas to the Commissioners to complain of him. They considering that Mithridates was a powerful Prince, returned this answer, that they did neither like that he should molest Nicomedes, nor Nicomedes him; for the former was not convenient for the Roman Commonwealth. He nothing moved with this answer, re-invaded Cappadocia, sending Pelopidas back with a bold expostulation. They hereupon raised a considerable Army against him on their own heads, without any decree of Senate or People. Nicomedes engaging first of all with him was put to flight, though Mithridates his main body never engaged, and next after him Manius was discomfited. Then seized Mithridates upon Bithynia, Phrygia, Misia, Lycia, Pamphylia, and other Provinces, as far as Ionia. He took also Q. Oppius and Aquilius, the later whereof he killed by melted gold poured into his mouth, being ever wont to upbraid the Romans with avarice and corruption.

2. The Romans hereupon decreed a War against him, though they were now imployed in the Italian; and L. Cornelius Sylla and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Consuls, it fell by lot unto the former. But whilst he was yet imployed in finishing the Italian War about Nola, C. Marius, who had been six times Consul, either moved by a desire of profit or of glory, perswaded P. Sulpitius Tribune of the People to prefer a law for transferring the command against Mithridates to himself. He drew the People of Italy to his party, by promising them that had been of late made free of the City, equal privilege with the rest, which were distributed into 35 tribes; so that the thing was carried on by strong hand, and Pompey's son, the son in law of Sylla, was killed in the heat of contention. Sylla hearing of this, hastened to the City, easily perswading his Army to any thing, for that his Soldiers were unwilling that any other should go that Expedition, from which they promised themselves so great matters. To him his Colleague Pompey joyned, and though Marius and the Tribune made all opposition possible, with some difficulty they entered the City, and Marius with his complices betook themselves to their heels. Sylla suffered no harm to be done to the Citizens, but reversed what Sulpitius had done, regulated the Senate, and procured Marius, with Sulpitius, and ten others, to be declared Enemies to their Country, whom it might be lawful for any to kill, and unlawful to harbour; their goods also being set to sale.

4. Sulpitius was found and put to death. Marius hid himself in the fens of Minturnum, and being discovered, a Gall was sent to kill him, but could not do it, he was so dashed at his presence; so that being conveyed out of that place, he escaped into Africa. To him Cethegus and others, who had fled into Numidia, joyned themselves, expecting an opportunity to invade their own Country. Pompey the Consul, to secure Italy, was appointed to receive the Army of Cn. Pompey, who had done such good service in the Masian War; but the Soldiers unwilling to leave their old General, who also took it heavily, made away the Consul. For the year following L. Cornelius Cinna and C. Octavius were Consuls, whereof Cinna as some think corrupted, was altogether for the new Denisons, and recalled Marius with the rest of the Exiles; but he was driven away by his Colleague, and L. Merula was put in his place. He then going about to the Italian Cities, by giving them fresh hopes of equal privilege, and pretending that he suffered these things for their sakes, got much money. Marius also coming over to him, they raised a considerable Army, wherewith Cinna sat down before the City. Marius took Hostia by force, and Cinna being not able to do any thing at Rome, stormed Ariminum. The Consuls, for that they could not recall Sylla, sent for Mecellus then lying in Samnium, but he differing with them about some conditions, had them granted by Marius, to whom then he joyned himself. In the mean while the City it self was near being betrayed to Marius by Appius Claudius a Tribune of the Army, who being intrusted with the Janiculum, thus required him for former kindnesse.

5. Though he and Cinna brake in, they were repelled by Octavius, and C. Pompey the Proconsul, who shortly after was killed with a Thunder-bolt. Marius after this took in several Towns about Rome where provisions lay, and Cinna by promise of liberty, drew many slaves out of the City, which the Senate understanding, lest the People should make disturbance within, sent to him about an agreement. He refused to admit of any addresse made to him as a private man, so that they were forced to treat with him as Consul, and desired he would swear to abstain from blood. This he flatly refused to do; but promised, that wittingly and willingly he would not be the cause of any mans death; so he was received, and the Law abrogated for banishing Marius and his associates. Upon their entrance began plundering and slaughters in all places. Octavius, though having the oath both of Cinna and Marius, refusing to flye from his charge, was killed, and his head set upon the Rostra, to which was afterwards added that of Antonius (Grand-father to the Triumvir) an excellent Orator, who for a good space defended himself by his eloquence from the Soldiers, and several others. None were spared, either for dignity, worth, or age. The dead bodies, being mangled and abused otherwise, were left to be torn in pieces by dogs and fowls, none daring to bury them. All Sylla's friends were killed, his house defaced, and his goods put to sale, he being judged and declared an Enemy. Merula, though he never sought the Consulship, but had it put upon him, and Calpurnius, having their dayes set them to answer, destroyed themselves.

Dieth.

6. Cinna and Marius having thus satisfied their bloody minds, made themselves Consuls for the following year: But Marius died ere the moneths end, having born this Office now seven times; a man more profitable to his Country in the time of War than of Peace. To him succeeded Valerius Flaccus, whom Cinna sent into Asia, to supply the room of Sylla there. But he by this time had done the work, and was coming home to revenge the former injuries, having subdued Mithridates in lesse than three years, killed 160000 of his men, recovered Greece, Macedonia, Ionis, Asia, and other Countries, which he had got into his hands, taken his Navy from him, and forced him to be content with his own inheritance. These things are to be declared in order.

causeth 80000

Romans or

7. After Mithridates had taken Aquilinus with the rest, and seized upon Asia and other Countries (whilst Sylla was at Rome, settling things there against Marius and his faction, as is before shewed) he sent his letters abroad into all the Cities of Asia, willing them at one day prefixed, to kill all Italians and Romans, with their wives and children, and cast them out unburied; then to seize on their estates, taking one part to themselves, and reserving the other for his use. This was accordingly done, and 80000 according to some; according to others 150000 perished in one day. Then went he into the Island Cous, where getting great treasure into his hands, there laid up by one of the Cleopatras, he departed to Rhodes, and all manner of waies attempted to take the City, though without successe; such was the constancy and fidelity of the Rhodians towards the Romans, amongst other confederates which universally revolted. Then sent he Archelaus his General into Greece, leaving Pelopidas in Lycia to carry on the War there, he himself providing Forces, and punishing such as he found inclinable towards the Romans.

8. Archelaus first recovered Delos, which from the Athenians had revolted to the Romans, then joyned he to himself the Achaians, Lacedæmonians, and Bæotians. After this he was fought by Brutius, who had put to flight Metrophanes sent also into Greece from the King; but having fresh supplies, Brutius withdrew himself to the Piræus, or Haven of Athens, which shortly after Archelaus took in with his Fleet. Now Sylla arrived in Greece with five Legions and some Companies of Horse, and having furnished himself with money and provisions in Ætolia and Thessaly, marched into Ætica against Archelaus, almost whole Bæotia, with Thebes the chief City, revolting to him in his passage. He besieged Archelaus in the Piræus a very strong place, as fenced with a wall almost 40 cubits high, consisting of square stones, and built by Pericles during the first motions of the Peloponnesian War. Having also besieged Athens it self, he spent the whole Summer in the siege, and at length took it, the Inhabitants being unable to make any more resistance through famine, which so far prevailed, as they made meat of sodden leather, and fed upon the bodies of dead men. The Piræus was also shortly after taken, and the walls thereof demolished, with the Arcenal, and all the rarities therein were destroyed. Then Sylla followed Archelaus through Bæotia, and fought with him near Cheronea, in a place so straight, that no way being open for flight, he slew so many, that of 120000 not many more than 10000 remained, this being an Army sent over by the King out of his new Provinces.

9. Mithridates put divers Princes of his newly conquered Provinces to death, for fear they should kill or betray him, by which cruelty he lost all Gallatragia. Ephesus also, and other towns revolted from him, whereof such as he recovered he used cruelly, and afterwards fearing a general defection, to purchase favour he set the Greek Cities at liberty. Some that conspired his death were discovered, and upon suspicion were 1600 men made away. Then sent he another supply to Archelaus of 80000 men, which with the other 10000 remaining of the former Army, were routed by Sylla near Orchomenus, and about 15000 being slain, the rest betaking themselves to their Camp were also killed or taken, a vast slaughter having been made. Archelaus having lost his son Diogenes hid himself in a fen, and thence fled to Chalcis once more. After this Sylla chastized the Bæotians for their fickleness (for they would stand to neither party long) and took up his Winter quarters in Thessaly, providing himself of shipping, because he heard nothing of Lucullus, whom he had sent into Egypt to procure a Navy. Now at this time was Flaccus, who had succeeded Marinus, sent into Asia by Cinna to succeed Sylla. Him Fimbria his Quæstor killed in a quarrel about lodging, being hated by his Soldiers, and he headed his Army, with which he several times fought, and that prosperously, against Mithridates his son, and drove the King himself into Pergamus, and thence to Pisane, where he took ship and fled to Mitylene, and might have been taken if Lucullus would. Then did Fimbria haraze Cappadocia, and burnt Ilium the daughter of Troy, for that the Inhabitants had given up themselves to Sylla, and not to him; so that though a Roman and so akin to them, he is said to have used them worse than did Agamemnon himself. This hapned to Ilium in the later end of the 173 Olympiad, about 1050 years after the first taking it by the Greeks.

10. Mithridates receiving intelligence of the blow he had received at Orchomenus, wrote to Archelaus, to procure his peace on as good terms as he could. To a Peace Sylla was not now averse, being in great want of mony, and receiving no recruits from the City, where he was declared an Enemy, and desiring above all things to carry back a good Army into Italy to revenge himself. He offered Peace therefore on these conditions: That he should deliver up all his Navy, all fugitives and Captives, restore the Inhabitants of Chios, and others whom he had carried into Pontus, remove his garriisons from all places whither he had brought them since the breach of the Peace, pay all the charges of the War, and be content with his Father's Kingdom. All these conditions were agreed to save parting with Paphlagonia, but the Ambassadors saying they could have had better terms of Fimbria, drove Sylla into a great displeasure, with a comparison so odious to him. Shortly after Mithridates himself met him, and found him so resolute, as he gladly accepted all the terms. So ended the first War with Mithridates, being concluded by Sylla three years after his coming into Greece.

11. Sylla required of Fimbria the Army to be delivered up to him, as held by no authority; but was answered, as having as little himself. Yet the Army denied to fight against that of Sylla, and forsook Fimbria, who thereupon sent a Slave to murder Sylla, which was discovered. He begged pardon, and it was granted him, so he would take ship and depart out of Asia; but he said, he had a better way, and going to Pergamus there destroyed himself. Sylla gave him to be buried, saying, he would not imitate the barbarism of Marius and Cinna towards his friends at Rome, whom they deprived both of life and burial; yet he kept in this mind but a while after his arrival there, which he now hastened, having fined Asia grievously for its revolt, and settled affairs according to present occasions. He took Athens in his way, whence he carried with him the Library of Apellicon the Teian (in which were most of the Books of Aristotle and Theophrastus, then not vulgarly known) bought by him of the posterity of Nелеm, to whom Theophrastus had given it. He wrote to the Senate, to which he recounted all the great services he had done, and then how he had been rewarded by the party of Marius, telling them plainly, he would come and revenge both himself and the Publick, by punishing the authors of the injuries, not meddling with any other, either old or new Citizens. The Senate hereat affrighted sent to treat with him, offering their endeavour for his satisfaction, if he would presently make known his mind. Cinna they ordered to stop his leavies; but he onely returned them a plausible answer, and proceeded, designing himself and his Colleague Carbo Consuls again for the following year, that there might be no need of going to Rome to a new creation. He passed over some of his forces into Dalmatia, there to fight Sylla; but the hindmost were driven back by a tempest, and they refused absolutely to fight against their Country-men; so that those, who as yet had not passed the Sea, refused to go aboard. Hereupon he going to speak with them, an Officer who made way before him struck one of them, who struck him again, for which offence he commanding him to be laid hold on, a tumult arose, where-in he himself was ran through; and so perished in his fourth Consulship, and the 670 year of the City, a man worthier to have died by command of the Conqueror than the fury of the Soldiers. Carbo then continued Consul alone all the remaining part of the year.

12. Cinna and Carbo had by a Law abrogated Sylla's command, and procured War to be decreed against him, before the Senate was affrighted into the offer of a mediation. He answered, that he would never be reconciled to such wicked persons, as they desired he should; but if the People of Rome would give them indemnity he should not oppose it; yet he thought those that would come to him might be more safe, seeing he had at his devotion such an Army. Hereby declaring sufficiently what his intentions were, he also demanded restitution of his estate, his ancient dignity and honours; but the messengers coming to Brundisium, and there hearing of Cinna's death, and the disturbance of the Commonwealth, returned back to him. Then crossed he the Sea to Brundisium with a Fleet of 1600 ships, and 60000 men. Being landed, Metellus Pius, who had absented himself from Rome for fear of Marius and Cinna, came to him, as also Pompey, afterwards surnamed the Great, who though his father was no friend to Sylla, yet coming now to him with some forces, became afterwards his greatest favourite. Besides these came Cethegus, who having joyned with Cinna now begged pardon. C. Norbanus and L. Scipio the Consuls, with Carbo, made all preparation for resistance. The first trial at arms was at Canusium, where Norbanus lost 6000 men, and fled to Capua. Scipio through the treachery of his Army, came with his son into the power of Sylla, who dismissed them both. After this Sylla sent to Norbanus to treat of Peace; but (perhaps) being not thought serious, had no answer returned back.

SECT. 5.

13. He then passed on in Italy, making havock of all things, as Carbo did, A. M. 3922, who getting into Rome, procured Metellus and the rest that joyned with Sylla to be declared Enemies to the State. Both parties sent up and down the Italian Cities, labouring both by fair means and fowl to procure forces; and so all this Summer was spent, wherein the Capitol was burnt none knoweth how. For the following year Papirius Carbo the third time, and Marius, son (but adoptive as most probable) to the old one, were Consuls; the later being but 27 years old. In the Spring was Carinas the Lieutenant of Carbo overthrown by Metellus, and Marius himself by Sylla, and beaten into Præneste, where being close besieged, and despairing of his own safety, he wrote to Brutus, then Prætor at Rome, that he should under some pretext call together the Senate, and kill those his Enemies: P. Anisthius, another Carbo, L. Domitius, and Mucius Scaevola the High-Priest, which was with cruelty enough performed. Metellus by his time having overthrown another Army of Carbo's, Pompey defeated Marcus another of that party, Sulla marched to Rome, which he easily entered; many of the opposite faction being fled. Their goods he set to sale, and willing the people to be of good cheer, for that he was necessitated thus to do, he left a sufficient Garrison, and departed to Clusium, where he and his Officers several times overthrew Carbo's Armies. Carbo sent to Præneste to relieve Marius his Colleague eight Legions, which Pompey meeting in a straight place slew many of them, and most of those that escaped departed to their own homes. After this, Carbo and Norbanus in a fight with Metellus had 10000 of their men slain, and 6000 yielded, whereupon many fell off to Sylla's party, as also all Gall within the Alps. Norbanus fled to Rhodes, where fearing to be given up he killed himself; Carbo into Africk, though he had 30000 men at Clusium and other forces, which were then broken in pieces by Pompey. Carinas, with other Commanders attempted to break through, by the help of the Samnites, and relieve Marius; but this being with no effect, they made then for Rome it self.

14. A bloody battle was fought at the Gates, where many thousands were slain on both sides. Yet Sulla had the better. Carinas and Marcus were taken, and their heads sent to Præneste to be shewed to the Inhabitants, at which sight understanding how things had passed, they yielded up the Town to Lucullus, and Marius killed himself, whose head was set up in the pleading place at Rome. All his faction in Præneste were put to death, and all the Natives with the Samnites; the Romans onely with the Women and Children were spared, who lost all they had, the Town (the richest at that time of all others) being plundered. Norba a little after was taken, and burnt to the ground by a fire which the Inhabitants kindled over their own heads, some one way, and some another destroying themselves. So came Italy into the power of Sylla, who in the improvement of his victory shewed what fury and revenge backed with power are able to do.

Getteth all Italy into his power.

15. Having sent Pompey into Africk against Carbo, and given him a charge thence to passe into Sicily against others of that party, he called the people together, and told them that he would put them into a better condition if they would obey his commands, but he was resolved to prosecute his Enemies with all sorts of calamities. So he did in a larger measure than any before him. He put to death 8000 together in the Villa publica, a large house in the Campus Martius made for the reception of the Ambassadors of Enemies; and liberty was given to his Soldiers to kill all they met, till Farfianus putting him in mind that he ought to leave some to reign over; he then first of any man published Tables of proscription, wherein were proscribed first of all 80 Senators, and 1600 Equites, to which he afterwards added more; promising two Talents to those that should discover them, and threatened such as by whom they were harboured or concealed. Of those outlawed persons some were slain in their houses; others killed in the streets, and others prostrate at his feet; those that fled their goods were seized on. Marius a man of Consular dignity, and brother to that he might die by degrees. But not onely against private persons, but Cities also did he rage, whereof some, after the Inhabitants were sold, he caused to be demolished. Many were turned out of their possessions which were given to his Creatures. Pompey drove Carbo into Sicily, and thence in-against him in an assembly, he caused his head to be cut off, and sent it to

16. Both the Consuls being now destroyed, Sylla withdrew himself out of the Citie, and willed the Senate to create an Inter-rex, which they willingly did, hoping they should have a new election of Consuls, and named Valerius Flaccus. He then wrote to him to ask the people, that seeing the necessity of affairs required so great an Officer, a Dictator might be created, and that not for any limited time, but till all evils should be redressed; and now he spared not to mention himself. This the people was forced to yield to, as being in his power, and so this Office which for the space of 120 years (ever since the years after Hannibals quitting of Italy) had been inter-mitted, was conferred on him without any limitation of time. A gilded Statue on horse-back was erected to his memory near the Rostrum, with this inscription, To L. Cornelius Sylla the happy General: for he would be called

17. That a shew of the Commonwealth might remain, he permitted *Con-the Kings in old time, with a great Guard continually at his heels, abroga-ring old Laws, and enacting new at his pleasure. He regulated the Consulship, ordering that none should be capable of it without passing first through other Offices. He overthrew the Tribunship, by making those that bore it incapable of any other trust. To the Senate he added 300 out of the Equites, to the people 10000 out of the slaves of the proscribed, making them free, and calling them after himself Cornelii; and to 23 Legions he assigned much Land in Italy to oblige them to him. For the following year he gave way to have Consuls also, but joyned himself with Q. Cassius Metellus, which course the Emperours afterwards imitated. The year after, when the people to please him designed him Consul again, he waved it, and created Servilius Isauricus and Appius Claudius Pulcher; and then, to the astonishment of all men, laid down his Dictatorship, and though he had done such and so many horrid things, yet offered to give an account of his action-

made him say, that this for the time to come would keep any one from lay-thing but his pleasure, he not long after died at Puteoli of the Lowfie disease, his body being putrified, and all turned into Lice, as Plutarch writeth. And this was the end of L. Cornelius Sylla, a man born of the noble family of the Cornelii (which of late had been Eclipsed through the laziness of his Ancestors) being the sixth in descent from Cornelius Rufinus, one of the most eminent Captains in the War with Pyrrhus. As his life was pernicious to his Countrey; so his death also brought trouble to it, the two Consuls and their factions falling out about the honour which was to be given to him at his funeral. Catulus prevailed against Lepidus, and he was carried in great State through the Citie, and first of any of his family was burned, being fearfull, as Cicero thought, lest he himself should be dealt with as he had used Marinus, whose bones he had caused to be digged up and thrown away. After the funeral, the Consuls fell into a greater dissension. Lepidus would restore the grounds given away by Sylla, and abolish his Laws. The Senate was fearfull of another War, and caused them both to swear that they would not decide the controversie by the sword; but Lepidus was resolved not to return out of his Province, till the new Creation vvas over, and vwhen he should be out of his Office begin a War, as then discharged from his Oath. Hereupon the Senate sent for him, and vwhen he came he vwould have brought his forces into the Citie, but being opposed by Catulus and Pompey, a fight insued, vwherein he had the worst, and then fled into Sardinia, vwhere he died the same year vvith Sylla.

Sertorius riseth in Spain.

19. The Civil dissensions died not with him: for, though Pompey had suppressed Carbo in Sicily, M. Brutus in Gall, Cn. Domitius and Hierba King of Numidia in Africk, who were preparing for War, (and for this triumphed, being neither Consul nor Prætor, and scarcely 26 years of age;) yet a more dangerous War was now depending, raised in Spain by Q. Sertorius. This man being one of Cinna's faction, joyned vvith Carbo against Sylla, and having taken Suessa, thence passed into Spain, which fell to him by lot as Prætor. Thence he drove out such as were for Sylla, and joyning the Celtiberians to himself, stiffly resisted Metellus who was sent against him, whereby obtaining a great name, he chose 300 of his friends, whom he called a Senate, in opposition, and despite to that at Rome. And now being made stronger by part of Lepidus his Army, which Perpenna had led thither, he designed no lesse than the invasion of Italy. The Senate afraid of this, sent Pompey against him, a young man, but of great esteem, who passing the Alps in imitation of Annibal, but another way, at first received some losse, & in the Spring following had no successe, (though Perpenna and Herculeus were several times beaten by Metellus) but was reduced into great straights, and wrote to Rome for a supply. Lucullus Consul for the following year procured it to be sent him, lest the War that was renewed vvith Mithridates should be committed to him if he came back into Italy, which he affirmed else he would. Being now supplied vvith men and money, he, and his assistants, fell upon the places subject to Sertorius; yet did they this year no great matters. But many of Sertorius his Army came over to them, being aggrieved that he made the Celtiberians his Guard, as distrusting themselves, and upon suspicion of the alienation of their minds, being cruelly used by him.

Is murdered by Perpenna.

20. The year following Pompey and Metellus being more bold, made excursions into several places, and vvith more successe; yet no considerable battel was there fought. Indeed it needed nor. For, Sertorius now grown lazie, spent his time vvith women, and falling into an humour of cruelty had put many to death, whereby he wrought his destruction from his own party. Perpenna fearing it might fall to his lot to be made away amongst the rest, resolved to prevent it, and so vvithing him to a feast, murdered him after he had besotted him and his attendants vvith Wine. This was the end of this great Captain, who for some ten years had stoutly resisted such as had been sent against him, being rather Superiour to them all, and admired by the Spaniards as another Hannibal. Perpenna vvith much ado was owned as his Successor, and not long after was overthrown, and taken in battel by Pompey. He offered, if his life might be spared, to disclose certain things of consequence in private unto Pompey; but he to his great commendation, commanded him to be killed, lest accusing any man he should bring the State into further trouble. So ended this War in the 681 year of the Citie. M. Terentius Varro that vast * Scholar (being the most learned of any, either Greeks or Romans) and Caius Cassius Varus being Consuls. Appius Claudius in Thrace, and after him Scribonius Curio fought prosperously against the Scordisci and Dardanians at this time: so did Servilius against the Pirates of Cilicia expelling them the Seas, and taking several of their Towns; as also Cosconius against the Dalmatians. But these were inconsiderable matters in comparison of that War which now was renewed vvith Mithridates.

The War vvith Mithridates renewed.

that belonged to Fimbria, Murena being ambitious of a Triumph, had caught on all occasions to renew the War, and had one presented to him after this manner. Mithridates waging War with them of Colchos and Bosphorus, who had revolted from him; the former desired and obtained his son for their King. This proved the destruction of the young man, for his father thinking it to have been procured by his seeking, put him to death, having sent for and bound him with iron chains, though he had done him especial service against Fimbria. Against the Bosphorians he made then great preparations, insomuch that every one thought he designed another Warre against the Romans. Archelaus was now at this time out of favour, for that he was thought to have granted too much unto Sylla in the Treaty of Peace, and therefore fled to Murena, and stirred him up to invade Mithridates, who neither had restored the intire possession of Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes. Murena did so, slighting the mention of Peace, which was objected to him. Mithridates sent to Rome, to complain to Sylla, and expecting the return of his Ambassadors, stirred not, though the other passing over the River Halys fired 300 of his Villages. Afterwards came Callidus from Rome, who though he shewed no Decree of the Senate, yet said, it was the pleasure of the Fathers, that all acts of hostility should be forborn, and afterwards he talked with Murena alone. Yet did not Murena forbear, so that the King judging that War indeed was intended, resolved to look to himself, and passing over the River overthrew Murena in battel, who fled into Phrygia. This Victory brought many over to the King's party, and hereupon he drove all Murena's Garrisons out of Cappadocia. Sylla now Dictator, was not well pleased he should be thus disturbed, and therefore sent A. Gabinus to command Murena in good earnest to forbear, and reconcile the King to Ariobarzanes. Mithridates gave him his son of four years of age for an Hostage, and received part of Cappadocia. So things were settled again, and the second War, as Appian saith, ended in the third year. But some seven years after another was begun.

22. Presently after the last conclusion, he sent to Rome to have the conditions of the League recorded, but the thing was neglected. Ariobarzanes sent also to complain, that he kept the greater part of Cappadocia from him, whereupon Sylla commanded him to quit it, which accordingly he did. Afterward he sent again to desire that the League might be recorded; but Sylla being now dead, the matter was not as much as reported to the Senate. Hereupon he underhand procured Tigranes King of Armenia his son in Law to invade Cappadocia, whence he led away 300000 persons, and there built a City, to be the Metropolis of the Kingdom, which from himself he named Tigranocerta, i. e. the City of Tigranes. L. Magius, and L. Fannius, who had fled to him from Fimbria's Army, perswaded him to send into Spain, and joyn in League with Sertorius, which he did, and had granted to him Bithynia and Cappadocia, receiving from him as a Captain M. Varius (or Marius) one of his Officers. Being now without hope of pardon, he made all preparations possible, and got together an Army out of divers Countries, consisting of 140000 Foot, and 16000 Horse, wherewith the following Spring he invaded Bithynia, which Country, Nicomedes being dead without issue, had a little before given by testament to the People of Rome, which thing enraged him. Cotta the Governour, a man of little courage, fled to Chalcedon, and he got it all into his hands.

He found the King before Cyzicus a City of Propontis, and presently besieged the besieger. Hee drove him to such straights by the help of L. Manius (who now again revolted) that though having a great desire to the place, he laboured much to take it, yet through extreme famine he was forced first to send away the Horse, and sick Footmen, into Bithynia, whereof whereof 15000 were intercepted, and then to flye himself with the rest that could escape the great slaughter made of them in their flight. During this double siege, Eumachus one of Mithridates his Captains made incursions into Phrygia, subdued the Pisida, and Isanri, and endeavoured to do the same by Cilicia, till he was repelled by Deiotarus one of the Tetrarchs of Gallagracia. But Lucullus improved his successe on land by several Victories at sea, wherein he took divers of Mithridates his Commanders, and hastened into Bithynia to overtake him. He, flying with all speed for fear of this, suffered most grievous shipwrack, and had been cast away, but that he was received into a Pirate's Vessel, to which he was glad to commit himself in so great danger, and at length, after many difficulties, got into his own Kingdom, whither now Lucullus pursued him, having in his way taken in Bithynia and Paphlagonia. He made all possible preparations for resistance, sending for aid to Tigranes his son in Law, and to his own son reigning in Bosphorus; and hee sent Diocles with great gifts to the Scythians; but he ran away to Lucullus. In the space of a year hee got together 40000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, with which force he once or twice repelled the Romans, and struck some terror into them. But Lucullus sending out some Horse for provisions, he also sent a party to interrupt them, which fighting in a disadvantageous place was worsted. Being now destitute of Horse, he thought of removing from Cabira, where he had wintred; and communicated his intencion to his friends. They not expecting the sign began to pack up, and send their baggage out of the Camp before day, which the Army taking notice of, thought much they should flye without any warning given, and in great fear and disorder breaking out of the trenches ran away. The King went about to hinder them, but none taking notice of him, he was born down in the crowd, and being got on horseback betook himself also to flight, and might have been taken, but that the Romans were too busie in plundering the Camp, though warned by their General to forbear.

24. Mithridates first fled to Comana, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes, who admitted him not to his presence, but caused him to be entertained like a King, though in fenny and unwholesome places. All Pontus, except a few places, yielded to Lucullus, to whom also Machares King of Bosphorus sent a crown of gold, and purchased the title of his friend and allie. After this Lucullus pursued Mithridates into Armenia, intending to fall on Tigranes King thereof, if he gave him occasion by defending his Enemy. Tigranes at this time was a very potent Prince, having conquered several Nations. He wrestred Asia from the Parthians, transported many thousands of Greeks out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, into a City built by him near Euphrates, and called Tigranocerta; he obtained Syria and Palestine, displacing the Kings thereof, as was acknowledged by Lucullus. This made him intollerably proud, so that when he rode, he would have four of those Kings he had subdued to run beside him like Lackies, and stand before him with their hands folded in token of subjection, when he sat on his throne. Lucullus sent to him Appius Claudius his wife's brother, to demand Mithridates; but he was then busied in Phenicia, in reducing some places, which the Messenger made an opportunity in his absence, secretly to withdraw from him many, whom his intollerable pride had rendred impatient. At his return he gave a negative answer, and therefore Lucullus with two Legions and scarcely 3000 Horse, passed over Euphrates, being not acknowledged a General, because he had not given him the title of King of Kings.

25. Tigranes had no good intelligence of his coming, for he hanged him that first brought the news, as a disturber of the Peace; but when he perceived it was so indeed, he sent Mithrobarzanes with 2000 Horse to interrupt his passage, left Mancaus to guard Tigranocerta, and went himself up and down levying forces. Whilst he was bringing 250000 Foot, and 50000 Horse, the former was beaten back, and the later could not defend the City. Mithridates advised him not to hazard all in a battel, but rather starve the Romans, as they had done him at Cyzicus, but he slighted the motion, and jeered at the smallness of their number, saying, that if they were Ambassadors they were very many, and if Soldiers, very few. But Lucullus pitching upon an hill, sent his Horse to provoke and draw out the Enemy, that he might break his ranks, and then setting upon the carriage beasts, caused them to drive the Foot amongst the Horse, whereby a great confusion was made, and great execution continued all the day. Tigranocerta was taken by the means of certain Greeks, who being out of jealousy disarmed by Mancaus, took clubs, and setting upon him and his men, got the better, and received the Romans within the walls. After this, another great Army was raised, and committed to the conduct of Mithridates. They then endeavoured to incompass Lucullus, but were crossed in their expectation, and both parties continued without any great matter performed, till want of victuals forced them to depart. Then went Tigranes further into his Kingdom, and Mithridates marched away into his own, being pursued by Lucullus.

26. Mithridates overthrew Fabius, who had been left in Pontus by Lucullus, and after him Triarius, who being sent with a new supply, out of a desire of glory ventured to fight ere the General came. He lost in one engagement 24 Tribunes, and 150 Centurions (which numbers were seldom heard of in an overthrow of the Roman Armies) and 7000 in all were slain near the Mountain Scotius, about three miles distant from Zela a City of Pontus. Lucullus having heard of the Kings intention to set upon Triarius, procured the Soldiers of Fimbria to march, who through the procurement of P. Clodius mutined against him, as formerly against Flaccus by the means of Fimbria. But Mithridates taking away all the necessaries he could carry, and destroying the rest, departed into Armenia the less. Lucullus would gladly have followed him, and might have put an end to the War, but that now by the procurement of A. Gabinus the Tribune, Manius Acilius Glabrio that years Consul, was appointed his successor, and an order made for disbanding of Fimbria's Soldiers. This being known, Lucullus was slighted by his Army so much, that hardly could his men be drawn to stay, though they marched no further against Mithridates; so that the King began to recruit himself, and Tigranes wasted Cappadocia. Shortly after, Glabrio arrived in his Province, and sent about to give notice, that the Senate was displeased with Lucullus for prolonging the War, disbanded his Army, and would confiscate the estates of such as should disobey it's order. Hereupon all the Army forsook him, except some few poor men, who had no cause to regard the threatnings; and Lucullus being outed of his command, Mithridates recovered almost his whole Kingdom, and did much hurt to Cappadocia; Glabrio not as much as coming to the Army, but loitering in Bithynia. This happened in the eighth year after Lucullus had undertaken the War; the 687 of the City, C. Calpurnius Piso and the said M. Acilius Glabrio being Consuls. The year following the War was committed to Cneius Pompey (afterward surnamed the Great) by the means of C. Manilius the Tribune, who having offended the Senate by a Law, which gave the same right of suffrages to Liberti or Freeman (once slaves) as to their Patrons, or such as manumitted them, procured this Law also to passe to curry favour with him, who now had a very great name and power, having scarcely finished the Piratick Warre, which for his famous and speedy Expedition, must be described, after we have first spoken something of the War with Spartacus, that was managed whilst Lucullus was busie in Pontus.

27. Spartacus a Thracian born, was a Fencer in the house of Lentulus at Capua, where perswading about 70 of his condition, rather to fight for their own liberty than the pleasure of spectators, they broke the house and fled to Vesuvius the hill in Campania, where receiving to them all fugitives, they fell down upon the parts adjacent, and robbed them. By making equal division of the booty, he got together a great power of men, over whom he set as Captains two Fencers that were Galls by birth, called Oenomaus and Crixus. Clodius the Prator, who was sent against them from the City, they routed and put to flight, as also P. Varinus, whose Licitors and Horse they took. Spartacus now having got together 70000 men, and making great preparations, began to be formidable to the Romans, who therefore sent against him L. Gellius Poplicola, and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus the Consuls with two Legions. Crixus was at the Hill Garganus defeated and slain. Spartacus making for Gall, was beset before and behind by the Consuls; but one after the other he overthrew, and putting them both to flight, killed 300 prisoners to appease the Ghost of Crixus. Marching then towards the Alps he was opposed by Cassius the Prator, whom he also overthrew, and who hardly escaped from the engagement.

28. Spartacus puffed up by such success, now consulted of no less than setting upon Rome it self. At the Comitia for Prators, when the Candidate appeared, M. Licinius Crassus, a person of great Nobility, and exceeding rich, undertook the Office, and was sent against Spartacus with six Legions. He ordered Mummius his Lieutenant with two Legions to attend the Enemies motions, but not to fight, which doing, he was worsted, and many being taken, many also cast away their Arms and fled. Crassus to terrifie others, used great severity against such as forsook their Colours, decimating 500 who had first begun to fly; which ancient kind of Discipline being of a long time disused, he hereby revived. Spartacus having by this time passed to the Sea, thought of going over into Sicily; but failing of his design upon some Cicilian Rovers, he sat down in the Peninsula of Rhegium, where Crassus as it were besieged him, having drawn a line through the Isthmus from Sea to Sea, to cut off all Provisions. Spartacus in a tempestuous night made a shift to fill up the Ditch, and get over the third part of his Army, then engaging with Crassus lost 12000 men. After this defeat he went toward the Pesiline Mountains, and the Lieutenant and Quasstor of Crassus pursuing him, he faced about, and put them to flight, whereby his men being encouraged, refused not to give the Romans battel. Crassus now desired also to fight, because Pompey, who was lately returned out of Spain was reported as coming to end this War. Pitching then one against another, Spartacus engaged with all his forces, and made at Crassus through the midst of Weapons and Wounds, whom yet he missed, but killed two of his Centurions. At length such as stood near him running away, whilst he stood his ground manfully he was slain, and the rest were disordered and put to flight. Some that escaped from the battel, and made head again, Pompey suppressed, three years before he undertook the War against the Pirates.

of Pirates.

29. The Pirates who had been a little repressed by Servilius Isauricus (as we said before) were now grown so numerous and powerfull, that there was no passing of the Seas, nor any dwelling upon the Coasts; for they not onely took and robbed ships on the Sea, but also whole Provinces on the Land; the chief place of their Rendezvous being Cilicia the Rough. Mithridates first set them on work, which finding profitable they ceased not when he left off, but continued their Robberies; many thousands of several Nations, as Syrians, Cypriots, Pamphylians, the Natives of Pontus, and almost all others of that part of the World joying together. For, seeing that the War continued, they thought it more wisdom to damnifie others, than lose their own Estates. Because they made choice of Cilicia, as most commodious in the Mountainy and Craggy places thereof to secure themselves, they all went under the name of Cilices. They had defeated several Roman Prators. Murena did little good against them, and Servilius but a little repressed their violence; for so impudent were they now grown, that besides their incursions into Sicily and other places, which made the Inhabitants of the Coasts forsake their habitations, they landed in Italy near Brundisium, whence they took away several women of quality; and more than that, two Armies with their Ensigns.

people of Rome.

30. The People of Rome being very sensible of these disgracefull losses, a Law was preferred by A. Gabinus the Tribune, 'tis uncertain whether at the motion of Pompey, or from his own desire to ingratiate himself with him; for being none of the best men, he little valued the good of the Commonwealth) monwealth) that some one from amongst those of Consular Dignity should be Created General with full power for three years against the Pirates, to whom also should be granted large forces, and many Lieutenants for carrying on the War. This Law little pleased the Fathers, who now began to be jealous of Pompey's power; but to him was the business committed, having equal authority with Proconsuls any where within fifty miles distance from the Sea, and full power over all persons within that compass, whether Kings or others, that they might assist him in the work. The Senate permitted him to chuse out of their body fifteen Lieutenants, to whom he might commit several Provinces; to take up as much money out of the Treasury and from the Publicans as he pleased; to raise what force he would, and take 200 ships. But he obtained greater things of the people, and doubled his preparations, getting 500 ships, 120000 foot, and some 5000 horse. He had also out of the Senate about 25 Viceregents, two Quaestors, and took up 6000 Aunic Talents; so difficult a thing it seem'd to destroy so many Fleets as the Pirates had, in such a Sea, where there was so many places of retreat and refuge.

31. He distributed to his Lieutenants the Mediterranean Sea, including all the Bays, Havens, Promontories, Straights, Peninsulæ, and windings whatsoever, furnishing them with convenient shipping, forces, and authority; so that the Pirates being roused out of their lurking holes by some, might be received by the next, and chased by others, and none might need to sayl too far. He himself like a King of so many Kings sayled up and down, and visiting, giving directions, and overseeing, took care that not one Pirate escaped. By this course prosecuted with singular industry, in 40 dayes he scoured all the Seas about Africk, Sardinia, Corfica, and Sicily; and the Pirates that escaped flocked into Cilicia, as the common receptacle. He coming to Rome about some necessary occasions, quickly after followed them with 80 Gallies; but though they prepared to give him battel at Sea, yet when they saw his Fleet at hand, submitted to mercy. Then in the space of 40 dayes he reduced Cilicia unto Roman obedience; for though he had provided Engines of all sorts to batter their Walls, it needed not, the greatness of his name, and preparation for the War had so terrified them, that one after another they all yielded themselves with the furniture for their trade. Such as remained of them being above 20000 he was unwilling to kill, and to let them return to their old habitations was not safe: therefore he removed them into another place at a good distance from the Sea, where he gave them houses and Land; and furnished their seats with new Inhabitants. Thus having taken well nigh 400 ships, killed 10000 men, and taken 120 Forts, he finished this War in three moneths, using the Conquered with more clemency than did Q. Metellus in Crete, which being the other nest of these Pirates, and glorying that it never underwent the yoke of any, he subdued, and obtained with a Triumph the surname of Creteicus. Having succeeded Antonius (who died in the action, and had as large authority there as Pompey) he used the Pirates very roughly, and so much the more, because hearing of Pompey's mercy, they had by a Message given up themselves into his hands.

32. Whilest he was putting an end to this Piratic War, did Manilius prefer a Law, as we said before, that all the Armies the Romans had any where, with the Government of all Asia, and the War against Mithridates and Tigranes, might be committed to him. The Nobility conceived great indignation against this Law, as which did manifest injury to Lucullus, Glabrio, and Marcus; but especially out of an high jealousy of Pompey's greatness, to whom now even all the Roman Empire was subject, having these Provinces laid to his former, with the same power of Peace and War, and making what friends and enemies he pleased, and chiefly for that he had Jurisdiction over all Armies whatsoever, which things had never before been conferred upon any single person. But the Commons with great alacrity embraced the Law; Cicero the Prætor pressing it exceedingly, who having formerly set himself to defend the Nobility, now had betaken himself

SECT. 5. to the vulgar sort. And C. Julius Caesar (who of late had been Questor) is said to have favoured it, that he might have the people more inclined afterwards to commit extraordinary commands to himself.

33. It being now the 688 year of the Cite, the 64th before the birth of A. M. 3939. Christ, the fourth of Aristobulus King of Judea, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Volcanius Tullus being Consuls, Pompey undertook the expedition. He first sent to Mithridates, offering him good terms; but he slighted them, because he hoped to have Phraates the Parthian on his side; yet when he heard that he had first made a League with him, on the same conditions as were offered to Sylla and Lucullus, he himself then sent and asked peace. Pompey commanded him to lay down Arms, and deliver up all Fugitives; vvhho fearing they should be given up, and the other Soldiers mutining for being about to be deprived of their help, a great trouble insued, which he evaded, by saying that he onely sent to make an espial, and by swearing, that he never would be reconciled to the Romans, because of their insatiable avarice. Then marched Pompey into Galatia, where meeting with Lucullus, much ado there was betwixt them. Lucullus said the War was finished, and that the Commissioners sent from Rome were to decide the businesse, and when Pompey would not hear of this, he reviled him with an immoderate thirst after power; Pompey again objecting coverousnesse to him, so that the accusations could on neither side be denied. Lucullus gave out commands as yet in power, but Pompey by his Edicts forbade them, nulled all his Acts, and at length drew away most of his men. But at his return he was received with great honour by the Senate, carrying with him amongst his booty gotten in Pontus, many * books, wherewith he furnished his Library, which ever stood open to Greeks especially. He also first brought * the Cherry-Tree out of Pontus (from a Cite of which Region it was called Cerasus) into Italy.

34. Mithridates had now got together a considerable Army; but coming to ingage with Pompey was inferiour to him in all skirmishes. Pompey considering how the King had wasted all the Countrey on purpose to straighten him for Provisions, went into Armenia the lesse, subject to Mithridates, who fearing he might get that Countrey into his hands, followed him thither. First here Mithridates had hopes to starve him; but was disappointed with considerable losse, and was himself encompassed with a Trench 150 furlongs about. Hearing that Marcins was joyned to Pompey, who had Provisions at will, he fled away, having first killed all such as were sick, and uselesse, about him. But Pompey pursued, and prevented him from passing over Euphrates; then forced him to fight in the night, being surprized, and at unawares. The Moon being low, and on the backs of the Romans, so lengthened their shadows, that his Soldiers thinking them nearer than they were, shot most of their Arrows without doing any execution. He lost many thousands; but he himself brake out with 800 horse, whereof but 300 stayed with him. Then wandring through the Woods with his horse in his hand, he light of some Mercenaries, and about 3000 foot, by which he was conveyed into a Castel where he had laid up much Treasure. Hence he sent to Tigranes, who refused to receive him, laying to his charge, that by his means Tigranes his son (by the daughter of Mithridates) had rebelled against him, and offering 100 Talents for his head. He fled therefore to Cholcos, which formerly he had subdued.

35. Pompey followed him to Cholcos, thinking he vvhould not have stirred thence; but he passed into Scythia, vvhich partly by force, and partly by perswasion, he made the Princes thereof of his party, bestowing his daughters in marriage upon them. For he had now vast designs in his head, though outed of his Kingdom, even no lesse than of passing through Thrace, Macedonia, and Pannonia, and so over the Alps into Italy. Pompey departing from Cholcos, and escaping the ambushes laid for him by the Albanians and Iberians, marched into Armenia against Tigranes, vvhich was resolved novv not to fight, for that having had three sons by Mithridates his daughter, two of them upon provocation he had already killed, and he that remained rebelling also, was now after an overthrow received from his Father, fled to Pompey. This son prevailed that his Ambassadors were not heard, who came to ask Peace. But Pompey marching against the City Ariaxa, Tigranes yielded it up to him, and afterwards, without sending any beforehand, came into his Camp, and giving up himself with all he had into his hands, made him umpire betwixt him and his son, who would not so much as rise up to him, or give him any respect, though Pompey used him very civilly. Pompey left him his inheritance of Armenia, with a great part also of Mesopotamia (allowing the son to reign in Gordene and Sophene, and expect the rest after his father's death) but deprived him of all the Provinces he had subdued, and fined him 6000 Talents of Silver for the charge he had put the People of Rome to in the War. So, he not onely quitted part of Cappadocia and Cilicia, but also all Syria and Phœnicia from Euphrates to the Sea, which he had got into his hands, with part of Cilicia, after he had ejected Antiochus Pius; as is said before in the reign of this unfortunate King. Tigranes the son was very refractory, unwilling his father should have the treasure adjudged to him by Pompey, that he might be able to pay his fine. Being minded to make away his father, and for that cast into prison; where therein also he solicited the Parthians against the Romans, he was reserved for a Triumph, and after that killed in prison. The old King payed more than his fine, and gave something to every Officer and Soldier, after which he was accounted a Friend and Allie of the People of Rome.

36. Pompey restored Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, gave him also Sophene and Gordene, with Cabala a City of Cilicia, and others. After this with some adoe he forced the Albanians and Iberians to beg Peace, and then passing over the mountain Taurus, made War upon Antiochus Comagenus, and also Darius the Median, either for that he had helped Antiochus, or made War against Tigranes, or Aretas King of the Nabathæan Arabs. Then Phraates the Parthian affrighted at his great achievements begged Peace, which he granted not, but sent Afranius into Gordiene, to drive out his forces, and restore it to Tigranes, who about it had warred with the Persian. Phraates hereupon invaded Armenia, and Tigranes sent to Pompey for aid, who being unwilling to begin a War with Phraates without an order from Rome, sent three Commissioners to agree them. Antiochus son of Antiochus Pius, to whom Lucullus granted Syria his inheritance, thought first of beraking himself to the Parthian; yet upon second thoughts, resolved to cast himself upon the good nature of Pompey. But he having obtained it without a stroke, put him beside it, commanding him to content himself with Comagena, though he had never ill deserved of the People of Rome: for knowing he was not able to right himself, he excused the matter, saying, it was not fit that Syria, whence Tigranes had banished the posterity of Seleucus, should now rather fall to it being conquered, than to the Romans, who were Conquerors. He refused flatly to give Antiochus what before he could not keep (for he had layn in a corner of Cilicia fourteen years, all the time that Tigranes enjoyed it) lest he should again render it lyable to the incursions of the Jews and Arabians. Therefore having overcome the Issureans and Arabians, he reduced Syria into the form of a Province.

37. Mithridates, in the mean time had sent to Pompey to ask Peace, offering to pay tribute; but being willed to come to him, he flatly refused, and made great preparations to renew the War. After this Castor his Governour of Phanagoria a Port Town of Pontus revolted, and calling the People to their liberty, took the Castle held by Mithridates his sons, whereof four he sent to Roman Garrisons. Hereupon several places fell off, which made him put many persons to death, amongst whom were divers of his own friends, and one of his sons. Seing also that many revolted, and his new Army had no heart to the service, he sent to the Princes of Scythia to hasten their supplies, sending his daughters to them with a convoy of 500 Horse; but these men killing the Eunuchs who had molested them about the King, caried away the women unto Pompey. Yet such a courage still he had, as to think of passing through Scythia and Istria, and joyning with the Galls of Europe to invade Italy, hoping there to find many enemies of the Romans; though Pompey coming out of Syria had through ambition done what he condemned in Lucullus, having reduced his Kingdom into the form of a Province, whilst he was yet alive, and provided for new opposition. But his Army was startled at the news of his intentions, hating the tediousness of the journey, and having small hope to conquer those in Italy, whom at their own doors they could not withstand. Yet such was his authority, as for a while they were quiet, till his own son whom he had most loved, and destined his successor, became the procurer of their defection and his death.

His son Pharnaces draweth the Army from him.

38. This was Pharnaces, who either out of apprehension that this attempt upon Italy would cut off all pardon from his family, or upon other grounds, conspired against him. The plot was discovered, and though his Complices were tortured and put to death, yet was he pardoned, and betook himself to the fugitive Romans, shewing them their danger in case Italy were invaded, and then to the Army, which with small trouble he drew to his party. Mithridates coming to speak to them, his own guard forsook him, his horse as he fled was killed under him, and Pharnaces saluted King, having a piece of parchment put about his head in form of a diadem. Mithridates seeing this from a high room, sent divers to ask leave to depart, who not returning, he himself often desired it of his son, but in vain, who bidding him dye, he cried out, and prayed, that he might hear one day the same words from his own children. Then came he down to his wives, daughters, and concubines, to whom when he had given poyson, fearing he should be delivered up to the Romans, he took some himself; but having used much his body to antidotes (such as yet are named from him) it would not work, though he walked much for that purpose, whereupon he wounded himself, but this not dispatching him soon enough, he called one Biceius (or Bithocus) a Gall, who, the wall being broken, had got in, by whose hand partly, and partly by his own, he dispatched himself. A man, as one saith, neither, without good heed, to be omitted nor spoken of; in War most eager and fierce, and alwaies of notable valour. Sometimes in fortune, all times in courage of highest rank; in direction a good Captain, in execution a good Soldier, in hatred to the Romans another Hannibal; finally, the greatest King after Alexander in the judgment of Cicero. This end came he to, after the War had first commenced just 20 years; for it began when Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato, and ended now when M. Tullius Cicero the Orator, and C. Antonius Nepos were Consuls, in the 691 year of the City, the second of the 179 Olympiad, and the first of the reign of Hyrcanus, 61 years before the birth of Christ. A. M. 3942.

Pompey invadeth Judea, where he setteth matters betwixt Hyrcanus and Aristobulus the two brothers.

39. Pompey, when the first tidings of his death came to him, was near Jericho, marching towards Jerusalem against Aristobulus King of Judea, who had displeased his elder brother Hyrcanus and usurped the Kingdom. Hyrcanus complained of his brother to Pompey at Damascus, who came thither to answer for himself. Pompey used them both kindly, telling them, that as soon as he had dispatched some affairs he would come into their Country, which after he had settled Syria, subdued the Arabians with the Itureans, and reduced Pontus into a Province, (all in a short time) he now performed, being much incensed by Hyrcanus against the other. He sent to Aristobulus to come to him, and deliver up all his holds, which he did with much regret, and afterwards withdrew himself to Hierusalem, to prepare for War. Pompey suspecting some such matter, delayed not to follow him, who then came out to meet him; but though the City was entred without opposition, his Soldiers fortified the Temple and stood out, which made him be delivered into custody. The Temple being very strong by it's situation, was after much labour taken in the third moneth, Faustus the son of Sylla having first mounted the walls. Twelve thousand Jews were slain, of the Romans very few. Pompey entred the Holy of Holies, but medled with nothing, restored Hyrcanus to the Priesthood and Government (yet with command

After this, leaving Syria with two Legions to Scaurus his Quæstor, he fully subdued Cilicia, and thence returning into Pomus, settled things there, bestowing the Kingdom of Bosphorus upon Pharnaces. At his return he wintered at Ephesus, whence having subdued many Princes, and joyned others as Allies to the State of Rome, having taken 1000 Castles, 900 Cities, and restored 39; having planted Colonies in eight Cities and Countries, and ordered the policy of such as through the continent of Asia belonged to the Romans; and having magnificently rewarded his Soldiers, he returned into Italy, and at Rome triumphed two dayes together very gloriously, leading amongst other captives Aristobulus King of Judaea, after he had spent five years in his Eastern Expedition.

The conspiracy of Cataline

40. The same year wherein Mithridates died, and the Temple of Jerusalem was taken, hapned a most dangerous conspiracy at Rome, by the means of L. Sergius Catalina, a Patrician by degree, but one of a debauched and infamous life. Some years before he had been accused of incest with Fabia a Vestal Nun; but by the means of Caesar was acquitted; suspected also to have murdered his son for the love of Aurelia, who would not marry one that had children. Having contracted by this loosenesse of life a vast debt, he grew desperate, and sought for power and command, that he might if possible obtain the sovereignty over all; but being also suspected hereof, he twice received a repulse in standing for the Consulship. The later time it was caried from him by Cicero, whom he would have killed in the Comitia, and railed at as a foreigner and upstart, because he was born but of an Equestrian family at Arpinum a Town in Puglia, a Province (now) of the Kingdom of Naples. Hereby driven into extream disdain and rage, he fell into that course wherein formerly he had been engaged with Piso for the destruction of his Country, to whom also L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus (being denied the Consulship which they had sought by indirect means two years before) joyned themselves, and anew plotted the destruction of the Consuls and Senate, the burning of the City, and overthrowing of the Commonwealth, with Lentulus, C. Cethegus, and others. This Lentulus had been Consul seven years before, and now was Prætor (as also Cethegus) being driven on by a vain confidence he had in the Books of Sibylla, which he would often say did portend that the sovereign power, should be in three hands of the Cornelii, viz. Sylla, Cinna, and himself.

Discovered by the means of Fulvia.

41. The plot was discovered through Fulvia a Courtisan, to whom Q. Curius one of the Conspirators (a man that for his debaucheries had by the Censors been removed out of the Senate) blabbed it out, while he boisted to her, that shortly he should be a very considerable man. She gave intelligence to Cicero, who out of them two got the whole matter, how, and where they had met, and what designs they had in hand; particularly for his own destruction to be brought about by L. Vaspenteius a Senator, and C. Cornelius of Equestrian rank, under pretence of a kind visit. He appointed guards to the several parts of the City, and on the eighth of November (as the year then went) called the Senate together, whither came Cataline amongst the rest; but none of the Senators would come near him, so as that part of the bench whereon he sat, was wholly void. Cicero, whether fearing him, or angry to see him there, made his first Oration against him, wherein he commended him to depart the City. He went away late in the night with 300 armed men, and Lictors carying Axes and Rods before him as a Magistrate, into Etruria, gathering Soldiers all along, intending to return and make prey of the City, which upon his departure he had given order to burn, as also to kill Cicero, which Lentulus and Cethegus took upon them to do, as soon as he should come to Fasula. In the mean time the Ambassadors of the Allobroges, who were come to Town to accuse their Magistrates, were also drawn in, to stir up the Galls against the Commonwealth; but declaring it to Fabius Sanga their Patron (it was the custome for each Nation

Cicero maketh his first Oration against him.

SECT. 5. or State to have one in the Citie) it came to Tullie's ear, and so was prevented.

42. The day after Cataline's departure, the Consul made his second Oration, wherein he Congratulates the People, and Commonwealth, concerning his absence. The Senare judged Cataline an Enemy, and Manlius, with whom in Eiruria he had joyned; they deprived Lentulus of his Office, by whom the Ambassadors had been drawn in, who confessed they had often heard from him what he idly conjectured out of Sibylla's books. Cicero's third Oration declareth what was done in the Senate. The times being very dangerous, he propounded to the Fathers to consider what course was to be taken with Lentulus, Cethegus, Stalrus, and Cassius, all whom he having secured, this bred a great disturbance; for the Slaves and Dependents of the two former got together a great company of Artificers, and indeavoured to break in upon the back-side of the Prator's house, and rescue their Lords. This being known, the Consul hastened out of the Senate-house, and appointed a watch to be set, then returning, asked the opinions of the Senators. Silanus designed Consul for the ensuing year, being first asked his opinion, according to the custom, was for putting them to death, and so were divers others, till Nero dissuaded it, judging it better to secure them till Cataline were suppressed, and the thing better sifted out. Of this opinion was C. Julius Caesar, something suspected to be privy to the design. He would have them dispersed in several Towns in Italy by the Consul's appointment, afterwards to be tried, and not put to death altogether unheard. This seemed very plausible, till Caio (great Grand-son to M. Porcius Caio the Censor) very earnestly pressed the contrary, falling foul upon Caesar as a suspicious person. Then the Consul made his fourth Oration, wherein he so disputeth of the two contrary opinions, as he evidently inclineth to severity, as fearing what the guilty party might do the night following out of necessity and desperation. Hereby the Senate was induced to put them to death as surprized in the fact, which Cicero saw done accordingly ere the house arose. After this Cataline was overtaken by C. Antonius, the other Consul, near the Alps, as he was going into Gall to perfect his Levies, and there fighting most valiantly was slain. His men also fought it out to the last, scarcely one of them being taken. So was quashed this most dangerous conspiracy, by the vigilancy especially of Cicero the Consul, who wrote an History thereof which is lost. Publick thanks for his great care and pains were given to him, and, at the instance of Caio, with divers acclamations of the People, he was first of all others stiled Father of his Country.

43. Now began C. Julius Caesar to be very eminent, two years after these stirrs being sent as Prator into the further Spain. He was born in the 654 year of the Citie, C. Marius the sixth time, and L. Valerius Flaccus being Consuls, the same that the Sedition about Saturninus hapned, on the 12th day of the moneth Quintilis, afterward from him named July by Antonius his Law. His father was C. Julius Caesar, who never arose higher than the Pratorship, and died suddenly at Pise, as his shooes were drawing on in the morning: his mother was Aurelia, the daughter of C. Cotta; and Julia the wife of Marius was his Aunt. In his youth having married Cinna's daughter (by which he had Julia) refusing to put her away, he was in great danger, being with much ado spared by Sylla, who as it were foretelling what trouble he would bring to the State, said, that in Caesar were many Marii. The foundation of his Military skill he laid in Asia, under M. Thermus the Prator, by whom being sent into Bithynia to fetch away the Navy, he flayed with Nicomedes the King, to whom it was suspected that he prostituted himself. Afterwards in the taking of Mitylene he had deserved well, and served under Servilius Isauricus in Cilicia; but not long. For, hearing of Sylla's death, and hoping to make his fortune out of the dissensions raised by Lepidus, home he came; but not finding a convenient opportunity, and having to no purpose accused Dolabella, to shun the Envy thereby contracted sted, he went to Rhodes to hear Apollonius, whence sailing in Winter, he fell into the hands of the Pirates, and was forced to purchase his freedom with fifty Talents; to revenge which, he procured some ships, & took some of them, whom he nailed to Crosses, though without leave from the Prator, who would have sold them. After this he gave a stop to Mithridates his Lieutenant, and saved divers Cities in Asia. He assisted Pompey the Consul, and others, in restoring the Tribuneship which Sylla had broken. Shortly after he was made Quaestor, and sent into further Spain, where going about to administer Justice, he came to Gades, and saw Alexanders image in the Temple of Hercules. It troubled him exceedingly, to consider that he himself had done no memorable thing at that age wherein Alexander had Conquered the World, and thereupon he earnestly desired to be recalled, that being in the Citie, he might catch at some opportunity for his own advancement.

Made Quaestor.

Joyneth with factious persons.

44. Having got leave to return ere his time was out, he joyned presently with the Latine Colonies in demanding the freedom of the Citie, and had incited them to some desperate design, but that the Senate for fear of the worst, retained the Legions some time, which were raised for Cilicia. He was suspected to have been of the party of M. Crassus, of P. Sulla also, and Auroni (who having been designed Consuls, were found to have indirectly sought for the Office, and so according to Law forfeited their places to the discoverers) in the beginning of the year to set upon the Senate, and kill whom they pleased. Crassus being made Dictator, he was to have been Master of the horse-men under him, and all things being ordered according to their pleasure, the Consulship was to have been restored to the other two. Some have affirmed (whom Suetonius citeth) that he also conspired with Cn. Piso, that the one in the Citie, and the other abroad, should rise, which was prevented by Piso's death. Being after this Edilis, he so managed the businesse of publick buildings, and shews, that all was ascribed to him, and nothing to his Colleague; by which means, and others, he procured the favour of the People, and essayed by the Tribunes to get Egypt assigned to him, which, now having expelled the King, he thought would afford him an opportunity of an extraordinary command. But he was crossed by the great ones, whom that he might vex, he restored the Trophies erected by Marius over the Cimbri, which Sulla had caused to be pulled down; and suborned those who accused Rabirius. By his means especially the Senate had suppressed Saturninus the seditious Tribune, and now being brought before Caesar as his Judge, he was so severe against him, that nothing so much helped the man in his appeal from him to the People.

Made Adilis.

Getteth by bribery the High Priesthood.

45. After his repulse as to Egypt he stood for the High-Priesthood, and by large sums (such corruption were those times arrived at) bought so many voices as he carried it from two most powerfull men and his Seniors, having more suffrages out of their two Tribes, than they had out of all the rest besides. Then being Prator, he stood for the complices of Cataline so earnestly, as he drew to his party the brother of Cicero the Consul, and diverse others. After this he assisted Cacilius Metellus the Tribune in preferring turbulent Laws, till both of them by a decree of the Senate were displaced, and yet then would he sit, and execute his Office still, till forced to withdraw: then, out of policy he restrained the multitude which flocked to him, and offered to restore him by strong hand, of which the Senate taking notice, gave him thanks with great commendations, and re-invested him in his Office. After this, he fell into another danger, being accused by Vettius and Curius, as a partner of Cataline; yet, appealing to Cicero that he had discovered some things to him, he came off, and revenged himself upon his accusers. Then obtained he by lot, as we said, the Government of Spain, and having contracted a vast debt, put off his Creditors for that time, by the interposition of sureties. Coming into his Province he spent not his time in administering Justice, but pierced farther into the Countrey, and subdued certain people before this untouched, seeking matter for a Triumph, which then to obtain he halted to

SECT. 5. Rome. But it being now the time for the Consular Comitia, he had an extraordinary desire to that Office, and begged of the Senate, that he might stand for it by proxy, for that he could not himself be present, it being against the custom for any that was to Triumph to enter the Cirie ere that day came; for which as yet he was not provided. This, though against the Laws, was not without president, but could not now be granted. Therefore he resolved rather to lose his Triumph than misse of the Consulship, and coming to Town, stood for it himself.

46. Great contests hapned about this Office, and he had not carried it, but Obtaineth the that Pompey at this time stood in need of it. For, the great ones envying his Consulship by fame, refused to confirm those conditions which he had granted to the Kings, the means of the means of Pompey.

Governours, and Cities of Asia. Lucullus his Predecessor in the War with Mithridates, who since his return had given up himself wholly to idleness and luxury (for he first brought into Rome the extravagancy of buildings and feasting) they stirred up, by his authority to promote their opposition, and he presently fell upon him, together with Metellus Creticus, who bore him malice also ever since the Piratic War. Lucullus bade him report his matters singly, and not as a Sovereign Lord expect they should all be confirmed without any consideration: and whereas he had rescinded several of his acts, he desired of the Senate that this might be considered of, whether justly done or otherwise. Caio, Metellus Celer, the Consul, and Crassus, defended Lucullus, who boasted that the victory over Mithridates was his own; and he obtained that his decrees which Pompey had repealed might be in force, and those that Pompey made in reference to the Conquered Kings should be null: and he hindered, by the help of Caio, a Law which he would have preferred about dividing grounds to his Soldiers. Pompey being thus used in the Senate, betook himself to the Tribunes, one whereof (L. Flavius) that the Law for the grounds might more easily passe, would have given the suffrage to all Citizens, but Metellus the Consul so earnestly opposed it, that though the Tribune cast him in prison, yet would he not depart from his former sence, which pertinacioufnesse of him and others, when Pompey saw, he desisted, repeating too late that he had disbanded his Armies, and exposed himself thus to the malice of his Enemies.

47. At this time came C. Julius Caesar to Rome to stand for the Consulship. Pompey joyned with him, upon condition that he procuring the Consulship for him, he would confirm his acts. And whereas Pompey and M. Crassus had formerly been at odds ever since their joynt Consulship which they executed with great discord; Caesar now made them friends, and not onely so, but they all three conspired together, that nothing should be done in the Commonwealth which displeased any one of them; which conspiracy, say Writers, was pernicious to the Cirie, the World, and at length to themselves. This conspiracy of these three principal persons, Varro (who wrote 400 books) described in one book, & called it Τρικεφαλον, Tricipitina, or Three headed. Diodorus Siculus fetcheth the Original of Cesarean matters from this year, wherein he travelled into Egypt, when young Ptolomy Dionysus was King. With this conspiracy also Asinius Pollio begun his History of the Civil War. For the falling out of Caesar and Pompey, did not, as most have thought, procure the Civil Wars; but rather their Conjunction, which was designed to break in pieces the power of the Nobility, as Plutarch observeth in the life of Caesar. ## SECT. VI.

I. CÆSAR by the help of Pompey obtained the Consulship; but not without the assistance of money also. There were two other Competitors, L. Lucerius and M. Bibulus, whereof he was much for the former, having agreed with him, that because he was lesse in favour, but very rich, he should give money for them both through the Centuries. But the Grandees understanding this, and fearing if he had him for his Colleague he might do what he listed, they caused Bibulus to offer more, they themselves contributing to the expence, which corruption Cato denied not to be for the good of the Commonwealth, now brought by the means of such evil members into absolute danger and necessity. Cæsar confirmed Pompey's acts according to agreement, neither Lucullus nor any other opposing it, and Pompey procured, that what honour Lucullus had promised to certain men of Pontus, should not be confirmed by the Senate, filling the City with Soldiers, and by force casting him and Cato out of the Forum. In this his first Consulship he sold alliances with Rome, and also Kingdoms; and, to procure the favour of the Commons, preferred a Law for dividing certain grounds in Campania (which had been preserved to defray publick charges) to such Citizens as had three children or more. This he caused to passe by force, and compelled all Plebeians to swear to observe the Law, and the Senators also, though Cato urged them to refuse; for they did it to save their lives, he having caused the People to decree, that it should be capital for any to deny it. He had recourse to the People in all cases, making little use of the Senate, which he seldom called together. Bibulus his Colleague having opposed his actions for some time to no purpose, kept himself at home, and stirred not for the remaining part of the year. Cæsar then governed alone, and was much courted by the Equites or Knights, who having farmed the custome, desired an abatement of the rent. The Senate refused to remit any thing, but he did their businesse for them, procuring the People to abate a third part. By this and other wayes of shews and largesses, he so inveigled the multitude, that he got Gall to be decreed to him for five years, with four Legions, and for the remaining part of the year, spent it in seeking how to establish himself for the time to come.

2. Knowing how considerable a man Pompey was, to bind him faster to him, he gave him in marriage his daughter Julia. He procured two of his own creatures, A. Gabinus and L. Calpurnius Piso (whose daughter he had married after Cornelia's death) to be designed Consuls for the following year, as also Varinius and Clodius Tribunes, though the later had abused his wife (for he was a person exceedingly loose that way) having in womens clothes crept into the meetings proper onely to that Sex, for which he was accused as a breaker of the sacred customes by Cicero. He appeared not against him though he put away his wife, nay he helped him to his place, as it's thought, out of opposition to the Orator (who was wont to declame against the combination of the three great ones, as pernicious to the Commonwealth) and in way of requital for the help hee had afforded him in the procurement of Gall, whither, when the time of his Consulship was expired, he departed. This year was Titus Livius the Historiographer born at Padua.

3. Clodius out of malice to Cicero seeking for the Tribuneship, whereas he was a Patrician, thereby incapable of the place, he procured himself to be adopted by a Plebeian, and so with the losse of his former dignity obtained it. Then did he prefer a Law, that whosoever had put to death any Roman Citizen unheard, water and fire should be forbidden him, which amounted to as much as banishment; and set Cicero his day of appearance, for putting to death Cethegus, Lentulus, and others of Catalines conspiracy unheard. Pompey at first stood stiffly for the accused, saying, he would rather dye himself than Tully should be hurt; but Cesar took him off, because Cicero having desired to go his Lieutenant into Gall, upon Claudius his seeming willing to be reconciled, had changed his resolution, and hereby displeased him. This is certain, that he who was wont to defend others so earnestly, was very timorous in his own cause (which hapned also to Demosthenes) and chose rather to depart the City, and late at night, than undergo his trial, after that Pompey had forsaken him, and the Consuls would give him little hope. After his departure Clodius banished him by decree of the People 400 miles from Italy, demolished his Villages and his house, on the plot whereof he built a Temple to Liberty, and set his goods to sale. He went to Thessalonica a City of Macedonia, being by letters of the Senate commended to such Kings, or Governours, as into the Dominions of whom he might have occasion to come.

Banisheth Cicero.

Sendeth Cato to spoil the King of Cyprus most unjustly of his estate.

4. Clodius having thus rid himself of Cicero, for that Cato's presence was very troublefom to him, sent him also out of the way, under colour of doing him honour. He preferred a Law against Ptolemy King of Cyprus (brother to Auletes of Aegypt) for the spoiling him of all his estate, and reducing that Island into the form of a Province, though this man had nothing ill deserved. He was indeed very vicious, if that could have given them any right to what he had; but the truth was, Clodius had been taken by the Pirates, and sending to him for money to redeem him, he would part but with two talents, and therefore he took this occasion to be revenged on him and Cato both together. The King hearing of Cato's coming, killed himself, and some said that he cast his treasure into the Sea. Cato sold his goods, and brought a great sum of money into the treasury. But, by this time Pompey repented that he had forsaken Cicero; for, Clodius wanting other matter now to work on, vexed all the great ones, and repealed some things which he had done, so that now he set himself to have him recalled. Clodius withstood it, but thereupon the Senate passed a Decree, that nothing should be heard before his restitution was propounded. Lentulus the Consul propounded it on the Calends of January; but the matter being hindred, several wayes, was brought down to the People on the eighth before the Calends of February, where was great endeavour used by T. Annius Milo and P. Sextius two other Tribunes for his restitution. Clodius their Colleague taking some Fencers belonging to his brother Appius, fell upon the multitude and killed many: The Tribunes were wounded, and Q. Cicero brother of the banished (newly returned from Asia, which he had governed three years) lay for dead amongst the slain. Now the People began seriously to bethink themselves. Milo ventured to draw Clodius by force to judgement, and Pompey possessing himself of the Forum, put the People to their suffrages, who with universal consent voted his restitution. The Senate decreed honour to such Cities as had entertained him, and that his house and Villages should be re-edified at the publick charge. So Cicero who had been banished the year before about the Calends of April, returned this year in the moneth Sextilis, or, the day before the nones of September, and therefore was absent about sixteen moneths. As Plutarch more rightly computeth than * Simpson, who strangely forgetting himself, blaming him, for saying he returned in the sixteenth moneth, contendeth that from the first of April to the moneth Sextilis or August of the following year, intervene but fourteen moneths. Now P. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Caecilius Metellus were Consuls.

They then sent to him to desire that they might passe through his Province without offence, to consider whereof he took time till the Ides of April, and in the mean time raised a wall twenty miles in length, from the Lake Lemanus to the Hill Jura (which divideth Burgoin from Switzer-land) and thereby hindred their passage. They then bent their course to Araris (a River in France now called Saon) where in their passage he overthrew and dispersed them. They sent him another message to no purpose, and repelled 4000 of his Horse which too greedily chased them; but he continually followed, and hindring them from wasting the Country, at length quite routed and put them to flight; of 348000, 120000 onely remaining, who also shortly after were forced for want of provisions to yield, and giving Hostiges, and delivering up their arms, to return from whence they came, and rebuild their Towns and Villages. After this was done, the Galls complained to him of Ariovistus King of the Germans, who had seized on a third part of the Countrey belonging to the Sequani (now Burgundians) and intended to take the rest also. He first sent to him, but this being in vain, he led his Army against him, and they came to an interview, which succeeding not, he overthrew him also, and he fled into Germany in a little boat, two of his wives and as many daughters being taken. These things Cæsar accomplished in the first Summer, in the Consulship of his two creatures, Piso and Gabinus.

6. The following year all the Belge (now inhabitants of the Low-countries for the most part) except those about Rhimes, conspired together against the Romans, and besieged Birax (now Bearne) and another fort kept by Q. Titurinus. Cæsar hereupon marched to the River Axona (now Le Disne) and there overthrew them, after which divers yielded themselves; but the Neuvii (a People about Tournay in Flanders) a warlike and severe Nation, stood out, with whom joyned the Atrebares and Veromandus (now Inhabitants of Artois, and of part of Picardie) but these he utterly overthrew, scarcely any escaping out of the field. This was done that year wherein Cicero was recalled. In the third year, purposing for Italy, he sent Servius Galba with the twelfth Legion and part of the Horse against the Amnates, Veragri, and Seduni, Nations inhabiting from the River Rbene as high as the Alpes, because he would have the passage thereabout cleared for traffick. Galba defeated a great multitude of them, which set upon him in his Camp. Cæsar not long after returning, found the Veneti and other Nations of Gallia Celtica in rebellion, who gave him trouble enough, but at length he overthrew the Veneti at Sea, Crassus subdued the Somates, and the greatest part of Aquitaine, and Sabinus the Ucelli and maritime Cities. Then fell he upon the Morini (a People near Calais in Picardy) and the Menapii also, these two Nations still being in Arms. But, Winter growing on, foul weather secured them in the marshes, and caused him to remove his men to their winter-quarters.

Herewith he corrupted the Ædiles, Prætors, Consuls and their wives. Passiug over the Alpes this Winter into Luca, where he took up his head quarters, so great concourse was made to him, that there were present 200 Senators, amongst whom were Crassus and Pompey, and so many Pro-consuls and Prætors, that 120 bundles of rods have been seen together at his gates. He fearing he might be recalled, procured Pompey and Crassus to obtain the Consulship for the following year, and continue him his employment in Gall for other five years. Cato perswaded L. Domitius to stand for the Consulship, telling him he should contend not for Magistracy but for liberty against the Tyrants. But Pompey fearing Cato's vehemency, left, having the whole Senate in his power, he should perswade the People to what was best, sent some armed men upon Domitius as he went down to the Forum, who killed the slave that caried the light before them, dispersed them all, Cato being the last that fled, who received a wound on his arm whilst he fought fought for Domitius. Pompey and Crassus having thus by force obtained the Consulship, bore themselves nothing more moderately afterwards. The people being about to give Caio the Prætorship, Pompey pretended a strange sight from Heaven, and dismissed the Assembly: then corrupting the Tribes with money, he procured Antias and Vatinius to be chosen Prætors. Then by the help of Trebonius the Tribune they procured Laws, which continued to Caesar (as they had agreed) his Government in Gall for other five years, assigned Syria to Crassus with the Parthian War; and to Pompey all Africa, and the Spains with four Legions, whereof two he lent to Caesar for the Gallick Wars. Pompey being permitted to Govern his Provinces by Deputies stayed at Rome, where he spent his time in shews and pastimes. Crassus much rejoiced in his part, scarcely being able to contain himself abroad and at home, contrary to his wonted gravity, breaking forth into Childish expressions of joy. For, he sleighted the thoughts of Syria and Parthia, as one who would so order his affairs, that the exploits of Lucullus against Tigranus, and of Pompey in the War with Mithridates, should seem but toys, extending his hopes as far as Bactria, the Indians, and the utmost Ocean.

8. The Tribunes hindred all they could, the Consuls from raising men, and laboured to repeal the Laws made for their expeditions. Pompey was herewith well enough contented, having sent his Lieutenants into his Provinces, and being unwilling to leave the Citie, as he pretended, because of the charge of Provisions committed to him, which Cicero, in way of recompence for his labour in his restitution, had procured him from the Senate, that so he might have authority all over the Roman Empire. But Crassus betook himself to force, which when the Tribunes saw themselves unable to withstand, they desisted, but loaded him with curses, and when he made the accustomed prayers in the Capitol for prosperous successe, they spoke of unluck auspicia and prodigies which had hapned. Atteius the Tribune laboured to hinder him from going, many exclaiming against it as an unworthy thing that he should fall with War upon those, who had nothing ill deserved of the Romans, but were at peace with them. This made him fly to Pompey to conduct him forth, at the sight of whom those who came to stop him gave way. But Atteius meeting him, earnestly exhorted him to desist, and when that would not do, sent a Viator to lay hold of him; but the rest of the Tribunes not permitting this, and the Viator not quite dismissing him, Atteius got before to the Gate where he had some fire ready, and as Crassus came by, throwing his Odours upon the Coals, devoted him with horrible and bitter curses, invoking certain terrible and unheard of gods. These secret, and ancient execrations the Romans, thought to be of that force as no man ever escaped destruction to whom they were denounced, and also proved unfortunate to the denouncer, and therefore they were seldom used, and Crassus was blamed on the behalf of the Citie. * Florus calleth this Tribune Metellus, and others write that the Tribunes generally thus devoted him, but it appeareth, * from Cicero, that P. Atteius was principal in this action.

He spent many dayes in weighing the Treasure of the Idol, called Atargatis by the Syrians, and by the Greeks Derceto, the Goddess of Hierapolis, otherwise called Edessa, and Bambyce, and Magog by the Syrians. In his whole passage he shewed more covetousnesse than valour, listning men, and then for money discharging them again. He neglected his opportunities of falling on the Parthians unprovided, and the friendship of the Armenian King, who offered him to invade Parthia through his Kingdom, as also of refreshing his Army in some Citie, (as Crassus advised him) till he had certain news of the Parthians, or else passing down the River to Seleucia, where he might have Provisions by water, and could not be compassed in by the Parthians. This later Counsel he rejected by the cunning insinuations of Abgarus the Osroenian (otherwise called Angarus, Mazates, Mazarus, Marachus, Masorus, Ariamnes, and

He perswaded him to leave off thoughts of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and go straight against Surenas and Sillax the Kings Captains. This he did, and thereby first losing his son, a choice young man, he himself was by Surenas circumvented under pretence of a Treaty, and either slain by his Enemies, or killed by some of his own men, to prevent his falling into their hands. This hapoed at Sinnaca, a Citie of Mesopotamia, on the sixth of the Ides of June, as Ovid informeth us; 20000 men were slain, and 10000 taken, according to Plutarch (not to name other accounts) so that the East being almost destitute of forces, many Provinces thereof revolted; but by the care, industry, and valour of C. Cassius the Quæstor of Crassus (the same who afterwards with Brutus, killed Julius Cesar) Syria was appeased. This King of Parthia against whom Crassus miscarried (called Orodes, Herodes, and Hyrodes) was something skilled in the Greek tongue, and other learning. Artabazes, or Artavasdes the Armenian (that first offered kindnesse to Crassus) had reconciled himself to the Parthian, who was now with him. He being also learned, (for he wrote Tragedies, Orations, and Histories) some of Enripides his Baccha was repeated, and the head of Crassus was brought in as it were by chance, and thrown at their feet. But Surenas was afterwards punished for his treachery, being killed by his Master who envied him his glory. And Orodes himself having lost his son Pacorus in a battel against the Romans, and fallen into that kind of Dropsie, called Anasarca, Phraates (or Phraortes) his other son gave him Aconitum, or Wolfsbane, which working so upon him, as with it self it brought out the humour, and gave him ease, he made short work of it, and strangled him.

10. Thus perished Crassus (a) (who was so rich that he would have none so accounted, but he that could by his own Revenues maintain an Army) and one of the heads of the Tricipitina was hereby cut off. This laid the foundation of the Civil War betwixt the other two, for he, whilest he lived, balancing them, when he was gone, Cesar must bring under Pompey before he could be Chief. Whilest Crassus warred against the Parthians, Gabinus, who had been Consul when Cicero was banished, reduced (b) into his Kingdom Ptolemy Auletes, whom his subjects had expelled. Then was he Proconsul of Syria; but at his return being accused, especially for making War upon Egypt (which was supposed to be forbidden by the Verses of Sibylla) and ready to be torn in pieces by the people, he was yet acquitted by corrupted Judges (or Lælius the Tribune) of treason, but banished, as upon other accounts, so chiefly for that he had served out of his Province 100000 Drachmas, or Denarii, and was afterwards recalled by Cesar. In the mean time several Nations of Germany, driven out by the Suevi (not Swedes (in Latine Sueci) but Grisons now for the most part) came into Gall to seek new seats, and there outed the Menapii of their dwellings. Cesar defeated them, killing many thousands, and pursued them over the Rhine, on which he laid a wooden bridge, into the Countrey of the Sigambri (now Guelderland) and freed the Ubii (now Inhabitants of Cullen) from the Dominion of the Suevi, to whom they had been Tributaries. Then returned he to the Morini, or into Picardy, and thence came over into Britain.

11. Britain, or Britany, which also is Albion, being in Greek ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΣ, ΑΛΒΙΟΝ, and ΑΛΟΥΟΝ, was by the Romans called Britania and Romania. It is most probable, saith Cambden, the Inhabitants were called Britans from their painted bodies, for whatsoever is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient Countrey speech they call Brish, having been of old much given to paint themselves, as many Writers do testifie. Now the ancient Greeks who sayled by the Coasts, understanding that the Nation was called Brish, might unto it add Tania (which word in Greek, as the Glossaries shew, betokeneth a Region) and thereof made the compound name Βετανία, that is Britons-Land, which is corrupted into Βετανία, but by Lucretius and Cesar the two first Romans that make mention thereof is truly called Britannia. In confirmation of this opinion Cambden observeth, that in the names of well-nigh all the ancient Britains, there appeareth some signification of a colour, which no doubt (he saith) arose from this kind of painting. The Red colour is of the Britans called Coch and Goch, which in his judgement lieth Couched in these names, Cogidunnus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The Black colour called Dù, sheweth it self in Mandubratius, Carimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunnus. The White colour called Gwin, in Venninus and Immannentius. The Waterish called Gwellwe in Vellocatus, Carvilius and Suella. The Blew, which they call Glass in Cuniglasus, and he proceedeth further. But this Learned man coming to speak of the time wherein Britain came to be known abroad, denieth that the Britains were with Hercules at the rape of Hesione, that Ulysses was ever in Britain, that the Britans bestowed any Presents upon Cato, that King Alexander the Great, or Hannibal, was ever in the Island; he doubteth whether ever the ship of Hiero mentioned by Athenæus came hither; yet thinketh that the Britans were mingled with the Cimbri and Galls, in their expeditions into Italy and Greece.

12. But as the Romans, Galls, and Spaniards were unknown to Herodotus, and the ancient Greek Geographers, so of this mind he ever was, that it was late ere the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britans name. For he judgeth that little book of the World, which goeth abroad under the name of Aristotle, and maketh mention of the Britans, of Albion and Hierne, to be of later dayes by far than that Philosopher, as the best learned men (saith he) have judged. He accounteth Polybius the ancientest Greek vvriter that mentioneth the British Isles; who yet knew nothing of them: then doth he, in reference to other Nations, count it but a fable that Himilco the Carthaginian, being commanded by his Superious to discover the Western Sea-Coasts of Europe, entred into this Isle many years before that time. And the first Latin Author to his knowledge that made mention of Britain was Lucretius, in his Verses concerning the difference of aire. Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Cesar no man denieth: at what time we are taught out of Cesar himself, that Divitiacus King of the Soissons, and the most mighty Prince of all Gall, Governed Britain, which, as also appeareth from Cesar, is onely to be understood of the Maritime Coasts. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth that Britain had experience of no foreigners rule; for neither Dionysus (or Bacchus) nor Hercules, nor any other worthy, or Demigod have we heard (saith he) to have attempted War upon that people. Now Cesar, who for his noble acts is called Divus, was the first that subdued the Britans, and forced them to pay a certain Tribute. From his time (saith Cambden) and no further off must the Writer of our History fetch the beginning of his work, if he thoroughly weigh with judgement what the Learned Varro hath in time past written (viz. of the three distinctions of times which we have formerly mentioned, uncertain before the Flood, Fabulous before the Olympiads, and Historical since the beginning of them) and my self already heretofore signified. This most learned man mentions this division of Varro, because that the British History of Geffrey of Monmouth taketh its beginning 333 years before the first Olympiad. This History we must absolutely disclaim as utterly Fabulous in reference to King Brutus, and other fictions depending on his story. But whether or no Britain was not known abroad till so late time as our Antiquary judgeth, must be examined for the honour of our Countrey, saving ever that respect which is due (and that justly) unto his name, and vwill not be at all diminished, seeing the contest is betwixt him also, and Bocharius himself.

13. The controversie is decided clearly against Cambden if two things

can but be made out. 1. That the Cassiterides or Islands of tinne were known very antiently, and 2. That the Cassiterides are no other than the British Isles. The first is proved from the testimony of many, that the Phœnicians were wont to trade to the Cassiterides, and thence to fetch plenty of Tinne. * Strabo affirmeth it, and that they first traded thither alone from Gades, hiding from others this course of traffick, insomuch that a certain Phœnician Sailor being chased by a Roman Vessel, chose rather to run his ship aground and suffer shipwrack, to cause his pursuers to miscary, than to reveal the matter, for which fidelity, having escaped himself, he had his losse made up out of the publick Treasury at his return to Carthage. Pliny also writeth, (b) in the Chapter of the first inventors, that Midacritus first carried Lead from the Island Cassiteris. For Midacritus is to be read Melacritus or Melicritus the Phœnician Hercules, according to Sanchoiathon, whom the Phœnicians make Author of the Western voyages. (c) Herodotus acknowledgeth he knew not where the Cassiterides were; but that there were some then he acknowledgeth also, whence Tinne came to them the Greeks, and from him it appeareth, that they were situate in the utmost limits of Europe. The Phœnicians being unwilling that any should know them but themselves, the Greeks bought Tin and Lead, either of them, or the Venets or Narbonenses, to whom it was wont to be carried by Land in a journey of thirty dayes, as Diodorus telleth us. (d) Dionysius Periegetes mentioneth them under the name of Hesperides, and so doth Izetzus. Festus Anienus speaketh of them under the name of Oestrymnides, expressly of the sailing of the Phœnicians to them, and that Hamilco, who was sent from the Senate of Carthage to discover the West, came thither, as he himself recorded, whom Festus professeth to follow in the description of the West, having made his collections out of the depth of the Punick Annals. These things considered, prove sufficiently, that the Cassiterides were known in very antient times.

14. For the second, that the British Isles are those Cassiterides or Stannaries, there needs no proof, Cambden himself confessing, nay proving by many arguments, that the Islands of Silly lying off from the Promontory of Cornwal eight leagues, and in number 145, are the very same that from the plenty of Tin were called Cassiterides, from their site Hesperides, and Oestrymnides from Oestrymnis the Promontory of the Artabri, now Gallitia in Spain, over against which they lye. Now for the consequence of the thing, can any imagine that these Islands should be so long known, and not Britain itself to which they lye so close, and from which they are deservedly called British Isles? And what reason is there to think (as Cambden doth) that such dream as believe that Hamilco came hither? It's a wonder he should say, that there's nothing for it but a Verse or two of Festus Anienus; when Festus saith, that he read the story of the whole Navigation, described by Hamilco himself in the Punick Annals. Cambden himself contendeth, that from the Cassiterides was Lead first of all carried into Greece; whence it followeth, that they were known before the time of Homer, who maketh mention of that metal. As for what he urgeth concerning Polybius, that he was utterly ignorant of these parts, if it were granted that he was, yet the Phœnicians, who in the Heroick times sent out Colonies into the Ocean beyond Gades, knew these Coasts sufficiently. But Cambden mistook the Historian, as may appear from all that passage read together, which onely importeth, that as it was not known whether Asi and Africk on the South side were terminated by the Sea, so neither whether the Sea flowed about the Northern parts of Europe that lye above Narbon, which truly at this day we know not certainly, though in so much light. That this interpretation is to be made, and that Polybius did not mean, that in his age whatever lay above Narbon was unknown, and that they dreamed who spoke or wrote any thing of it, hence appeareth. For he himself accurately described the Fountains of Rhodanus, with Corbilon upon Ligeris, and many other places of Gall above Narbon. And in his third book he promiseth he would write of what lay beyond the Sea, and what was there remarkable, nay (which is especially to be noted) of the British Isles and making of Tin. That he performed his promise in the Books that are lost, appeareth from * Sirabo, who telleth us, <sup>Lib. 2. p. 104.</sup> that Polybius describing the regions of Europe, said, he would let passe the ancients, and inquire into such as reprehended them, as Dicaearchus, and Eratothenes, who last of all had handled Geography, and Pytheas who had imposed upon many. For, he (Pytheas) said he had not viewed all the soil of Britain; but the Island was above 40000 (stadia or furlongs I suppose) in compasse.

ments refuted.

15. From this place it appeareth, that several whom Polybius calleth ἄρχαῖοις or ancients wrote of these parts, before either Dicaearchus or Eratothenes, Pytheas, or himself. Now Eratothenes, who, as he saith, was the last that handled Geography, Suidas writeth to have been born in the 126 Olympiad, which was celebrated in the 37 year of the Seleucida, the seventh of Antiochus Soter, the ninth of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and the 478 year of the City, when Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Genutius Clepsina were Consuls, Pyrrhus then warring in Sicily, 274 years before the birth of Christ. But Dicaearchus boistereth in Athenaus, that he had Aristotle for his Master; and then Pytheas who was cited by both, must needs have preceded them. Yet these Writers were but of late in comparison of Orpheus the most ancient Poet, one of the Argonauts, by whom Cambden himself affirmeth Britain to have been described. Although in truth Orpheus was not Author of those Poems fathered on him, but Onomacritus an Athenian Poet, who lived under the Pisistratida, as both (a) Clemens Alexandrinus and (b) Tertullianus inform us; yet two advantages we have hereby. For first, Cambden is inconstant, denying that Britain was known to the ancient Greeks; and secondly, this Island must have been known then long before the former Geographers; for the Pisistratida were banished Athens in the third year of the 67 Olympiad, the twelfth of Darius Hystaspis, the 244 of the City (at the same time that Tarquinius was banished) 508 years before the birth of Christ, though they write that he flourished in the 50 Olympiad, in the first year whereof Pisistratus indeed got the Sovereignty over that City. These things sufficiently prove, that Britain was known of old to several Nations, though we mentioned not what Bochartus probably conjectureth concerning the Etymology of the name. The Phœnicians trading hither for Lead or Tin, might justly call it Barat-Anac, that is, The Land of Lead or Tin, as the Greeks Cassueris; and this might easily be changed into Bretanica. Anac signifieth both Lead and Tin, no places in the World are so fruitful of either as the British Isles. And it may seem no wonder that the Word should be so altered, seeing that from Phœnice are derived Pœnicus, Punicus, Puniceus, and Pannus. He also giveth other marks of the Phœnicians their planting in those Islands, in the 39 Chapter of the first Book of that excellent Work entituled Canaan, concerning the Colonies and Language of that People, to which wee refer the studious in Antiquity, having thus farre in some sort seemed to vindicate the honour of our Country, yet with submission to the impartially Learned Reader. Now to return to the course of our History.

16. The occasion of this Expedition was given by the Britains. They had sent a continual supply to the Galls, almost in all their Wars against the Romans, and therefore he resolved to use this advantage, and passe over this Summer, though it was well spent, judging it would be worth his labour, though he but viewed the country, and took notice of the Havens and Natives, of any whereof the Galls could give him but very small intelligence. He sent Volusenus beforehand to make what discovery he could, after whose return, having received the Morini into friendship, that he might have no Enemies at his back, about two of the clock at night he put forth to Sea, and at ten in the morning got to the Coasts of Britain, where he might see all the shoar full of men to oppose him, for they had received intelligence of his coming. He perceived there was no good landing place where he was, and therefore staying for the Fleet till three of the clock, he sailed eight miles further.

Here, though on an even shoar, was he so opposed, that his Soldiers fought not with their wonted alacrity, because their ships being great and deep, could not come near the Land, untill he got more shallow Vessels, and the Ensign-bearer of the tenth Legion leaping out, drew others moved with shame after him. No order was kept in the fight, but every one as he leaped forth into the water, joyned himself to the next Ensign. Caesar sending out continually fresh supplies of men, at length landed all his Army, and the Britains fled.

17. His horse being not come over, he could not pursue them, but they presently sent to treat, promising to give Hostages, and do further what he should enjoin them. He accepted of their offer, and some Hostages they delivered, promising to give up the rest with conveniency. But it hapned that the horse being come within kenning, was driven by the tide (the Moon now being at full) to the Westward, and forced back to the Continent; the ships which brought over the Legions, lying at Anchor, by tempest were miserably shattered, and no Provisions had Caesar brought over, as not intending to Winter here. The Britains, having knowledge of these things, agreed amongst themselves to break their promise, concluding, that if they could but intercept or destroy his Army, besides getting much plunder, they should not be invaded for the time to come. They then set upon the seventh Legion as it was reaping Corn, but Caesar being informed by the Watch of a greater dust than ordinary that way, suspected what the matter was, and going to the rescue killed many, and burnt their houses for a good compasse. Hereupon they sent to him again for peace. He required a double number of Hostages, whom he commanded them to send over into the Continent; for the Æquinoctial being near, he would not in Winter trust himself, and the Army, in such weak Vessels. Going on board about midnight he came safe to Land; but 41 Vessels being driven, the men were forced to Land at another place, whereof 300 were presently besieged by the Morini, (who before had been reconciled to Caesar) out of hope of some booty. They were presently rescued, and T. Labienus was sent to chastize the Rebels, who being reduced to obedience, he, and L. Cotta harrazed the Countrey of the Menapii, who hid themselves in the thick Woods. Then was the Army led into its Winter quarters, in Belgia. The first expedition of Caesar into Britain fell out in the second year of the 181 Olympiad, the 699th of the Citie, 53 years before the birth of Christ, A. M. 3950. Cn. Pompeius the Great, and M. Licinius Crassus (both of them the second time) being Consuls.

18. Caesar going into Italy according to his custom, ordered a great Navy to be provided. Having dispatch'd his businesse within the Alps, he went into Illyricum against the Pinista, who had invaded his Province. After this having settled things amongst the Treviri (or them of Triers) who neither came to Councils, nor were otherwise obedient, he took ship at the Haven Iccius (now Calis) with five Legions, and 2000 horse, at Sun-set, and being for sometime carried down by the Tide towards the right hand, arrived again in Britain the next day by noon. The Natives seeing a great number of ships (for in all there were 800 Vessels) for that they had falsified their word (all but two sorts of people, who sent their Hostages over into Belgia) for fear withdrew themselves into the Woods. Caesar pursuing them took one of their Fortresses, which they made onely with great Trees laid together, and when he was busied in skirmishing, word came that his Navy was shattered by another Tempest, whereupon he retreated, and took care for the repairing of such ships as were fit to be mended (four being utterly lost) in which work ten dayes were spent with the great labour of the Soldiers. Drawing then up such as were repaired, and fortifying the Camp, he returned. In the mean time the Britains had made Cassivellaun (whose Dominions lay North the River of Thames, and with whom before Caesar's coming they had waged War) their General against the Romans. At first the Britains fighting from their Waggon put their Enemies to it, and killed Q. Laberius Durus a

19. Then did Caesar passe the Thames (the Soldiers wading over with their heads onely above water) though the Britains had fastned sharp stakes under the bank, and there made all opposition they could, which was inconsiderable. Passing on in Cassivellaun's Countrey he wasted it, Cassivellaun (or Cassibellin) having dismissed all his Army except 4000 Waggones, wherewith he much endamaged the Romans by making sallies upon advantage out of the Woods. But the Trinobantes (inhabiting those parts long after by the Saxons called Essex and Middlesex) having had their King Imannemius killed by Cassivellaun, for that Mandubracius his son had escaped to Caesar, yielded themselves, and desired that the young man being restored first to his Father's Kingdom might be protected against Cassivellaun. This Caesar granted, receiving 40 Hostages and Corn for his Army; and these having protection given them, others near adjoining yielded themselves. Then did Caesar take Cassivellaun's Town not far distant, being onely a fortified place in the Woods. He sent into Kent, where four petty Kings, Cingetorix, Carnilus, Taximagulus, and Segonax reigned, ordering them if possible to seize on Caesar's ships; but Caesar having left to guard the Camp ten Companies of foot and 300 horse, these repulst them with great losse, killing many of their men, and amongst the rest Lugiorix, a Captain of great account. Cassibellau hearing this, and knowing the defection of the Trinobantes and the rest, sent, and begged peace of Caesar, who being resolved, for fear of insurrections in Gall, there to winter, for that Summer was now almost spent, commanded him to deliver in Hostages, ordered what Tribute Britain should pay yearly to the People of Rome, commanded him not to offend Mandubracius nor the Trinobantes, and then drew down his Army to the Sea, which he wasted over at twice, for that he had many Prisoners, and many ships had perished by Tempest. The season being very good they came all safe to land, and he quartered them about in several places, because Provisions were very scarce in Gall. This second expedition of Caesar into Britain hapned the next year after the former; L. Domitius Aenobarbus, and Appianus Claudius Pulcher being Consuls.

20. This Winter did most of the Galls revolt. First, the Eburones (now inhabiting the Bishoprick of Liege) by the instigation of Ambiorix their Prince, who by treachery circumvented two of Caesar's Officers, Q. Titurinus Sabinus, and L. Arunculeius Cotta, with a whole Legion. He also besieged Q. Cicero, who commanded the Legion that quartered amongst the Nervi, who had their seats about Tournay in Flanders. But Caesar came in to the rescue, and overthrew the Galls. Labienus lying with another Legion about Rheimes, the Treviri and Indutiomarus came to his Camp, intending to destroy him; but he took his opportunity, and powred out his men upon them, willing his Soldiers to be sure that they killed Indutiomarus, which being done, things again were a little settled. Whilest Caesar was thus employed abroad, in the Citie, this year died his daughter Julia, Pompey's Wife, in Child-bed, and the Infant (whether Son or Daughter, 'tis as uncertain, so immaterial) with her. Hereby was the bond of friendship betwixt them two broken, and their mutual envy, which thereby onely was restrained, now wanted but an occasion to vent it self. But Caesar foreseeing great stirs in Gall, increased his forces, subdued the Nervi, brought under the Senones and Carantes (now changed into Chartres) the Menapii also; whilest Labienus reduced such as inhabited about Triers. Then did he again crosse the Rhine, because of the Conjunction of the Germans with the Galls, and attempting something upon the Suevi to no purpose, turned against the Eburones. Whilest he harrazed their Territories, the Sigambri set upon the Camp of Cicero then absent, which they could not storm, though they caused great consternation amongst his men, and killed many. After this he wasted again the

Cirie.

21. The following year produced great stirs in the Cirie, and those no lesse in Gall. For now were the times so altered, as that Rome could not be found in Rome. Nothing was managed by ancient equity and moderation, all Offices were purchased by Money, or else by Stones, Clubs, or Swords, and the inconveniences of popular Government now grew ripe, the name of a free State, or Commonwealth, covering the greatest injustice, disorder, and oppression of the peoples liberty. The Consuls being debarred by the power of the Tricipitina from leading out Armies, or waging Wars according to the ancient right and custom, made up their markers out of the publick Revenue, or their Offices by indirect practices, and therefore none of honour would seek after the Consulship. Pompey connived at this, hoping that a necessity of affairs would draw upon him the Dictatorship, as some of his Creatures, though not in his name, did not stick to hint. This year especially was there such an horrid contention amongst the Candidares (all or most men of large consciences) as for a long time no Consul could be elected; and this heightened the matter, that T. Annius Milo, one of them, being at great enmity with Clodius, killed him as they met in the way not far from the Cirie. This fact the people ill resented, and naughty, and dissolute persons, under pretence of searching for Milo's friends, committed many outrages in Rome. This turned indeed all men's eyes upon Pompey, as the fittest person to redresse those evils, and whilest they thought of making him Dictator, Cato drew the Senate to this resolution, that he should be made Consul alone, that he might be called to an account for his male-administration if need were, and so he was made sole Consul, without any President at all.

His Acts.

22. First, he sat in judgement alone, and examined Milo's case; he also made inquisition after such as had by indirect means procured Offices. Milo was defended by Cicero, or rather should have been; for the Orator was so terrified with Pompey's Soldiers, and Clodius his friends, that he could not proceed, and is therefore said to have written that Oration afterwards, which is now extant. Milo then was banished, with several others for other Crimes. Pompey having hitherto as it were executed the Office of Dictator, took to him a Colleague, Q. Scipio Metellus, whose daughter Cornelia he had married. These things being heard in the further Gall, and a rumour spread that Cesar who now was in Italy, would be there retained by the motions in the Cirie, many of the Natives conspired for the recovery of their liberty, and chose Vercingetorix for their Captain.

23. Cesar, though in the midst of Winter, and forced to make his way through depths of Snow, returned, and came upon the Arverni at unawares. He took several of their Towns, but besieging one that was situated upon an high Hill, he fought with disadvantage, and was driven off with the losse of 46 Centurions. From this siege he was called by the revolt of the Hedui, and an insurrection of the Bellovaci; and Labiennus, who had prosperously managed his affairs about Paris, joyned with him. Now, most of the Galls being revolted, he first overthrew Vercingetorix, then pursued, and besieged him in Alesia, a Town of the Mandubii, which, when the Galls were not able to relieve, Vercingetorix, according to his own offer, was delivered up, with Alesia, and all their Arms. Then reduced he the Hedui, the Arveni also yielded, with divers others, which being done, he sent the Army away into its Winter quarters. In winter the Galls hatched a new conspiracy.

Cesar therefore departing from Bibracte, wasted the Territories of the Bituriges (about Bourdeaux) and of the Carnutes; subdued also the Rellovaci with others. C. Fabius also reduced some in the mean time, and Caninius having routed several parties, with him Cesar joyned, and besieged Uxellodunum, a Town of the Cadurci, very strongly fortified by its situation. He obtained this Town without striking one stroke, by cutting the veins of a

These things hapned in the eighth year after his coming into Gall, Disappointed. Ser. Sulpitius Rufus, and M. Claudius Marcellus being Consuls, wherein also were began those contentions betwixt him and his adversaries at Rome, that shortly after brake into Civil wars, which proved deadly in the end to the heads of both the factions, and fatal to that form of Government which (though labouring under mortal distempers) was yet on foot.

Wars betwixt

24. Caesar's carriage, especially in his Consulship, had rendred him very distastefull to the Senate. Pompey on the other side, by his fair demeanour had of late gained much upon it, which Caesar being aware of, desired leave to stand for a second Consulship in his absence. This was granted him; but he fearing the malice of his adversaries in case he were reduced to a private condition, further importuned the Fathers that he might have his Government of Gall prorogued, casting about all manner of wayes to keep his Army till he should be Consul. This was hindred by Marcellus the Consul, who had succeeded Pompey; whereupon Caesar laying his hand upon his Sword, said, that that should obtain it for him. This Marcellus was very bitter against him, pressing hard that a Successor should be sent to him; but this was crossed by Pompey, either out of good nature, or policy. Such were designed Consuls for the ensuing year, as were most opposit to Caesar, viz. L. Aemilius Paulus, and C. Claudius Marcellus Nephew to the former Consul by his brother: Curio also, an inveterate Enemy of Caesar, was made Tribune. Yet all these, except Claudius, were drawn aside by money; Paulus by 1500 Talents, and Curio, who was much indebted, by 100000 Sesterces. Marcellus then urging that a Successor was to be sent to Caesar, Curio slyly withstood it, alleging that then ought Pompey also to dismiss his Army; for that his power was equally dangerous to the publick liberty. Pompey outwardly seemed willing, and said he would disband his men; but Curio fell foul upon him, telling him, that promise without performance was nothing; and, that he might seem to stand for the good of the Commonwealth, and not carry favour with Caesar, he desired, that if they both refused to disband, they should, the one as well as the other, be declared Enemies to the State.

Velleius Paterculus. l. 2. c. 48.

25. Pompey exceedingly nettled hereat threatned him; but he ceased not to urge the thing. The Senate could have wished them both reduced, but feared to disband Pompey's Army, looking upon Caesar as the more dangerous person. Pompey sent now to him for the Legion he had lent him, both of them being ordered into Syria to defend the Eastern parts now in danger by the overthrow of Crassus: he sent him this Legion, and another of his own; but there being no need of them in Syria, they wintred at Capua. Those that brought them into Italy did ill Offices for Caesar, and gave out, as if his Army at his return would all revolt, which though very false was believed by Pompey, who thereupon neglected to provide for so dangerous a War as followed. The next year C. Claudius Marcellus and L. Corn. Lentulus were Consuls, and it was propounded to the Senate, whether both Pompey and Caesar should lay down all power. Though once it was carried that Caesar onely should, when the Consul propounded it severally, yet * Curio again putting it to the question, it was carried against both by 348 voices. Hereat the Consuls intraged, left the Citie, and gave Pompey power as from themselves to fight for his Countrey against Caesar, which he seemed not altogether to approve. Now Curio perceiving himself in danger, and that he could do no more service for Caesar, fled unto him.

Curio labour-

26. Curio being called to a Consultation, would have had him presently to invade Italy; but he chose rather first to make an overture of Peace, as 'tis said, writing to his friends to procure, though it were but two Legions with Gall within the Alps and Illyricum, untill he should be Consul, which

though it seemed something reasonable to Pompey, the Consuls would not admit of it. Then wrote he to the Senate a menacing and bitter letter, as it's stiled by * Cicero, (who now was returned from Cilicia his Province, which he governed a year, and for his good service in the field was saluted Imperator, and had a triumph decreed him by the Senate, which these disturbances quite put off, he saying, that so an agreement were made, he had rather follow the chariot of Cæsar) wherein after an honourable mention made of his own exploits, he signified, that he was willing to resign his power, in case Pompey did the like; otherwise he should retain his Forces, and presently come to revenge those injuries which had as well been offered to himself as his Country. At the reading of these last words all cryed out, that War was denounced, and they sent L. Domitius to succeed him in his Government, with four newly raised Legions. For that Antonius and Cassius the Tribunes were of Curio's judgement, the Consuls bade them depart out of the Senate, lest their persons Sacrosanct (as the term was) by their Office, should be violated; who in a great rage departing that night, fled towards Cæsar. So now began this famous Civil War, in the fourth year of the 182 Olympiad, the 705 of the City, 47 before the birth of Christ, A. M. 3956, the aforesaid C. Claudius Marcellus, and L. Corn. Lentulus being Consuls.

27. The Senate did not think that Cæsar would return presently out of Gall, as being unprepared for such an undertaking; and therefore were more slow in their Levies; but he ever judging expedition to be the greatest help in his undertakings, resolved with five Legions to begin the work, and take in the commodious places in Italy, and so did he with admirable speed Ariminum and others. This unexpected thing terrified the Senate, and the People, which called to mind the sad effects of the Civil Wars betwixt Sylla and Marius. Cicero would have had them sent to Cæsar, but the Consuls withstood it. Then departed Pompey to the Army at Capua, whom the Consuls presently followed. The Senators being at their wisend, spent all that night in their house, and at length followed Pompey to Brundisium. Cæsar at Corfinium met Domitius who was sent to succeed him, whom he dismissed, after he had received his Soldiers, that now revolted to him. Then followed he Pompey to Brundisium, who had sent over the Consuls with part of the Legions into Epirus, which he intended to make the seat of the Warre, staying in the Town till the return of the ships, to transport the rest of the Army. Cæsar attempted to storm the place, but he withstood him, till such time as he had shipped his men, and so passed over to Dirrachium.

28. Cæsar knew not well now what to do. For hearing such concourse to be made to Pompey (who drew to his party all the forces of the East) and knowing his old Army to be in Spain his Province, he feared to follow him over, lest he should expose Italy to it, and have an enemy at his back. He therefore returned to Rome, having in the space of 60 dayes got all Italy into his hands without blood, and breaking open the Treasury took out the money wick had layn there ever since the taking of the City by the Galls, being reserved for such another case of extremity. For the Ærarium of Treasury in the Temple of Saturn was three-fold. One wherein the tributes or customs gathered from Citizens and associates was kept, as also booty got by Generals, which was reserved for the ordinary expenses of Warre. Another more private, wherein the Vicesima, or twentieth parts gathered from them that were manumized, were laid up for extraordinary causes. And there was a third yet more private and sacred, wherein money was treasured up for any extremity that might happen from the Galls, and upon no other occasion might it be touched, bitter curses being laid upon him or them that should do or suffer it. But Cæsar did it (though L. Metellus the Tribune did all he could to hinder it) pretending that the People was discharged of the curse, for that nothing more was to be feared from the Galls, whom he had thoroughly subdued.

29. Then went he into Spain, where in a short time he brought all under, though though Pompey had there a strong Army under three Captains, Petrens, Afranius, and Varro, whom yielding, he permitted to depart with all their Forces. At this time he lost two legions in Africa under Curio, and Anconius was overthrown in Illyricum by Dolabella one of Pompey's Officers. But now M. Lepidus the Prætor of the City pronounced him Dictator, and therefore he returned to Rome, where the People being struck with fear, he took upon him the Office, and held the Comitia. But finding it to be odious, he laid it down again after eleven dayes, and procured himself to be chosen Consul, with Servilius Isauricus. Then about the middle of Winter did he order all his forces to meet him at Brundisium, expecting in the City the beginning of January for his entering into the Consulship. When he came to Brundisium, though his forces were not all come together, desiring to set upon Pompey at unawares, he passed over with all he had, viz. five Legions, and 600 Horse, although in the depth of Winter, and without provisions; Pompey now having eleven Italian Legions, and 7000 Horse, besides other supplies out of Greece and Asia. But, those five Legions and two that followed being landed, he took Oricum and Appollonia without fighting one stroke, and then marched streight to Dyrrhachium, the magazin and granary of Pompey. Both of them sate down by the River Apis, Cæsar expecting his other forces, which at length Antony brought over, though the Seas were watched by the other party, and Pompey exercising his men who were raw and unexperienced. Pompey hearing of Antonie's coming, departed with his whole Army to the River Asparagus. Cæsar followed him, and would have fought; but he not stirring out of his trenches, he marched back to Dyrrhachium, which having on one side and Pompey on the other, he was grievously straitned for provisions, and above all things desired to fight. In several skirmishes he had the better; but in another considerable ingagement was shrewdly beaten, and chased to his Camp, which might have been taken, and a period put to the Warre, as he himself confessed, had the Enemy known how to improve the Victory; Pompey neglecting the advantage, either through the advice of Labienus, or his own inadvertency, for that providence had otherwise determined. Though some now advised Cæsar to make use of the shame and anger of his Army, which desired again to be led out to batel, to redeem it's credit, yet he thought it most convenient to depart thence, and so went into Thessaly, whither Pompey followed him, and pitched his Camp on the fatal plains of Pharsalum, not of Philippi, as Florus falsely relateth, and with him Manilius and Virgil.

30. Betwixt that Town and the River Enpeus, was fought that great and famous batel betwixt these two great Captains, who both of them are said to have wept in the heads of their Armies, considering that so many of the same Country and Nation should be slain, brother fighting against brother, to satisfy the ambition of two men. The Armies stood for some time gazing on each other, both being unwilling to begin, till Pompey's Auxiliaries, whom he had commanded to stand aloof off, till such time as the Enemy should be broken, and then give the chase (as unwilling to have them ingage in the batel) being wearied with expectation, began to break their ranks. Fearing they might cause his main body to do so too, though he was unwilling at this time to fight, and managed not his command with wonted alacrity, he caused a charge to be sounded, his word being Unconquered Hercules, and Cæsar's Victorious Venus. The batel was fought with great courage and admirable silence on both sides; but Pompey's Army, though greater by far, being lesse experienced, was at length broken and put to flight, at the beginning of which fight all his Auxiliaries, though great multitudes, ran away as fast as might be, whom Cæsar onely suffered in the pursure to be slain, commanding that all Italians should be spared. Pompey betook himself to his tent, and sate silent, thinking of Ajax, who was thus served in the siege of Troy, till Cæsar bringing his Legions to storm his Camp, he took Horse, and with four in his company rode as far as Larissa, ere he stopped. On Cæsar's part were said to be slain 30 Centurions, and 200 common soldiers; but as others affirmed, 1200.

Pompey flying into Egypt

31. Pompey thought first of flying to the Parthian, then to Juba into Numidia; but being dissuaded by those about him, he resolved upon Egypt, as a Country at hand, powerful, and the King whereof was ingaged to him in way of friendship as his Guardian. Thither when he came and sent to be received, the King being a boy, Achillas, Pothinus the Eunuch, and Theodotus his Schoolmaster consulting about the matter, one would have him received, and another nor, but the last, to shew his eloquence, declared both their ways to be bad, and that he was to be received, and then shyn, subjoining, Mortuum non mordere, that the dead bites not, which saying long after Patrick Grey traiterously suggested to Queen Elizabeth, perswading her to put to death the Queen of Scots, though he was sent from King James this Queen's son to work her deliverance. This was resolved, either out of fear, as they pretended, that he should get Egypt into his power, or because they contemned so great a person now unfortunate, or rather to curry favour with Cesar. Pompey then being received into a little boat, as though to come to the King, who stood on the other side of one of the mouths of Nile with his Army, was treacherously slain, when he could neither flye nor defend himself. He covered his face with his gown, and neither speaking nor doing any thing unbecoming him, with a groan patiently received the strokes. So fell this great man, being in War a most able Captain, and in Peace (except when he stood in fear of a concurrent equal) full of modesty, in the 58 year of his age, and the very day preceding his birth-day, and the third year of these unhappy differences. His head was cut off, and reserved as a present for Cesar; his body was cast upon the shoar for every one to gaze at, and afterwards being washed with Sea-water by Philip his Libertus or Freed-man, (who stood by it till all had looked their fill) he wrapped it in his own coat, and burnt it with the rotten pieces of a Fisher's boat which he there found.

32. Cesar having staid two dayes at Pharsalum, on the third pursued Pompey, lest he should renew the War, and so came to Alexandria, where his head and ring were presented to him. He took the ring, but was grievously offended at the sight of the head, and weeping (which Lucan accounteth but feigned) commanded it to be buried. The news of Cesar's successe was not believed at Rome till he sent Pompey's ring thither. Then was power given him by them there, to determin of his Enemies as he pleased, and to make War where he would without asking leave of the People. They voted him Consul for five years, and Dictator, not for half an one (as was the custom) but a whole year, with the power of a Tribune for his life, which thing was never granted to any before him. He accepted these honours, and entred upon his second Dictatorship. But ere his departure out of Egypt he was put to much trouble and danger. For, there being at that time a difference betwixt young Protony and his sister about the Government, he stood much her friend, which favour she is said to have purchased with the losse of her chastity. His endeavours for her Pothinus the Eunuch, who now feared to be punished for the sedition he had raised about Pompey, interpreted as sinisterly meant towards the King, and thereby raised a dangerous War, which yet though in Winter, was prosperously ended by Cesar, and the young King flying from his Camp was drowned, too many of his followers pressing into and sinking the boat. Cesar then gave the Kingdom to Cleopatra, and to colour the matter, caused her to take as an husband her younger brother but eleven years of age. But she brought the Dictator himself a son not long after, who by his permission she named Cesarion; and had kept him longer with her than nine moneths, or else had followed him to Rome, but that he was necessarily drawn another way by the means of Pharnaces, who now had in-

33. Cesar then went against Pharnaces, and taking Syria in his way, visited the Cities. He restored Hyrcaus to the Priesthood in Judea, though Josephi Anti- Antigonus the son of Aristobulus (who being let out of Prison by him, and sent home, had been poisoned by Pompey's party) sued to him for the Government. He made also Antipater (whom Hyrcaus had sent to joyn with Mithridates of Pergamus with 3000 horse, and who did good service in the Hirtius. Alexandrian War) Governour of Judea. He promoted his own Kinsman Sexius Cesar from a Quaestorship to the Government of Syria, which Scipio A. M. 3958. father-in-law to Pompey had enjoyed the year before. From Syria he sailed V. C. 707. into Cilicia, and thence marched with all speed against Pharnaces, who out of fear sent several times to him about a Peace, but he returned him onely good words, that he might surprize him. At length he gave him conditions, which he neglected to perform, hoping Cesar would be called away, and therefore he fell on, and overthrew him at the Hill Scotini (where formerly Mithridates defeated Triarius) within five dayes after his arrival, and four hours after he had got a sight of his Army, so that writing to a friend at Rome, to note the celerity of this Enterprize he expressed it in three words, Veni, Vici, Vici. Then receiving such places as Pharnaces had seized on, and selling things in Asia, as he passed, exacting much money of the people, he was called home into Italy by stirrs which happed in the Citie.

34. He quieted the Seditions, and the mutiny of his own Soldiers, who flew high in their demands for a dismissal, and a payment of what he had promised them. Then being declared Consul for the following year, for that the year of his Dictatorship was out, he passed over into Africk, where Scipio, Cato, Labiennus, Petreius, and others of Pompey's Captains were with Juba. He got the better in several battels. Juba caused his slave to kill him, and his young Son Cesar led in Triumph, who being brought up in Italy proved an excellent Historian. Cato at Utica stabbed himself, having read over Plato his Phædo of the Souls immortality. The wound not being deep enough he died not presently, but struggling betwixt life and death, cast himself off from his bed, and threw down a Geometrical Table, which making a noise, his son and servants rushed in, and finding him in that condition, his Freed-man, who was a Physician, began to put in the bowels which were untouched, and sowed up his belly. But he coming to himself pushed him from him, and tearing out his bowels, enlarged the wound and died, being a man of wonderfull Justice, Severity, and Magnanimity. Cesar hearing of his death let fall some expressions, which signified a great desire to have got him into his hands, and hinted (as was thought) an intention of dealing mildly with him. Petreius and Scipio also perished in Africk. After these things returning to Rome he Triumphed four times, over Gall, Pontus, Alexandria, and Africk, it being unlawfull to do it over any Roman; although he carried in Tables, a representation of what he had done in the Civil Wars. Then went he once more into Spain against Pompey's sons, to whom several had fled out of Africk, where coming to fight near Munda, his Army was struck with such fear, as it was never nearer running. It had fled, but that he snatching a Target out of a Soldier's hand, went, and engaged the Enemy himself, & had 200 Darts thrown at him, whereat his Officers being ashamed came on, and he got the day, 30000 of his Enemies being slain, with two of their Captains, Labiennus and Varus. Cn. Pompey also, though he fled, was taken, and his head sent to Cesar.

Herein he used the skill of Sossigenes an excellent Mathematician of Alexandria (where he learned this account, though the Alexandrian Months consisted of 30 dayes apiece, and five dayes were added at the end of of every year) in Astronomical Calculations, and of Flavius the Scribe in rectifying the Calendar. Whereas now in the Moneth of February were intercalated 23 dayes, he intercalated betwixt November and December two other Moneths containing 67 dayes: so that this present year had fifteen Moneths and 445 dayes. But this work seemeth to have been done before his last expedition into Spain. After his return he (b) laid down the Conthulship, and bringing in a new mode of creating honorary Consuls for three moneths, made Q. Fabius Maximus, and C. Trebonius, whereof the former dying in the last day of the year, Caninius Rebilus obtained to succeed him for the few hours that remained, whereupon Tully (c) calls him the most vigilant Consul, for that he never slept during his Office. Now were vast honours decreed him by the Senate, (d) as that he should be Dilator in perpetuum, and have the style of Imperator, not in that sense as Generals were wont to have it given by their Soldiers after some worthy exploit, but whereby the greatest Authority in the Commonwealth was signified. For, the Militia was to be wholly and solely at his disposal, as also raising of money: and all sorts of Magistrates, even Plebeian, were to be subject to him, and swear to contradict none of his decrees.

SECT. VII.

From the absolutenesse of Julius Cæsar, to the end of the second Triumvirate, and the absolutenesse of Octavius Cæsar, or Cæsar Octavianus, the space of 15 years.

1. CÆSAR being now Consul the fifth time, with M. Antonius (whom he much favoured, and promoted, for that in his Tribuneship he so much stood for him) to shun (a) envy in the Citie, thought upon making War upon the Geta and Daca, which had made inroads into Pontus and Thrace. About this time young Castor, the son of Castor (by (b) Strabo called Saocondarius) by the daughter of Deiotarus the King or Tetrarch of Galatia (to whom Pompey gave Armenia the Lesse, which gift the Senate having confirmed was taken away by Cæsar, because he took part with Pompey) came to Rome to accuse his Grand-father. He was sent by his father and mother, together with Phidippus a Physician & Deiotarus his slave, who was corrupted by their promises to feign an accusation against his Lord, that he would have killed Cæsar vvhhen he entertained him in his Tetrarchy. Deiotarus, father, and son, vvho reigned together, had at that time four Ambassadors in the Citie, vvho offered their own bodies to Cæsar for the safety of their Masters. But Cicero being mindfull of the friendship and familiarity he had had vvith the old man, made an Oration for him in Cæsars house, vvherein he premisseth, that it vvvas so unusual a thing for a King (a real King; for as for the Kings of Lacedamon, vvho vvvere called to account by the impudent Ephori, they vvvere indeed no Kings, having nothing but the tittle, and therefore this can make nothing against this truth) to be questioned for his life, that before that time it vvvas never heard of. Deiotarus being acquitted by Cæsar, put to death his daughter as she had deserved, together with her husband Castor Saocondarius that noble Chronographer, concerning whom Gerard John Vossius is to be consulted, in his Treatise of Greek Historians.

The month
led July.

(b) M. Antonius procured by a Law that the Month Quintilis should in honour of his name be after it called July. He now restored (c) Carthage and Corinth (which two Cities had both in one year been destroyed) by Roman Colonies sent thither. Now (d) the people had a great desire to be revenged on the Parthian, for the losse of Crassus and his Army, and to him unanimously the War was decreed, and lest any stirs should be in his absence, he was permitted to name all Officers that should be in the Citie for three years. 'Tis thought he would gladly have had the title of King, though, the people being against it, he declined it. For, as he came into the Citie from the Hill Albanus where he had sacrificed, some saluted him by the name of King, which the people took ill, whereupon he said, he was not King but Cesar; and all holding their peace, he passed on sad and grieving. And when one of the multitude put upon a statue a Lawrel Crown, tied with a white Ribband (which was a royal Ensign) the Tribunes commanded it to be taken away, and the man carried to Prison: but Cesar being vexed, either for that the motion of the Kingdom succeeded not, or, as he pretended, that the glory of refusing it was taken from him, grievously rated the Tribunes, and put them out of their Office. At the solemnity of the Lupercalia (which were celebrated on the fifteenth of February) as Cesar sat in the Rostra, Crowned, in a purple Gown, and in a gilded Chair, Antony his Colleague running naked, as the custom was, amongst the Luperci, came to him as a suppliant, and in the name of the People of Rome offered him a Diadem, which being twice set upon his head, Cesar took off, and laid in the Chair. He answered, that Jupiter alone was King of the Romans, and sending the Diadem into the Capitol unto Jupiter, commanded it to be registred, how in the name of the people the Kingdom had been offered him, and he would not take it. This gave suspicion that the thing was done by agreement, and that he desired the title of King; but would be as it were compelled to accept of it.

Cesar seeming to affect the title of King,

3. A rumour was also at this time spread abroad, that the Quindecimviri had found in Sibyll's books, that the Parthians could onely be overcome by the Romans under conduct of a King; and that at the next sitting of the Senare, L. Cotta, one of the Quindecimviri, would move that Cesar might have the title. Some gave out, that he was indeed to be called Dictator, or Imperator, of the Romans, but plainly King of the other Nations subject to their Empire. These things drew envy upon him, and the indignation of the great ones, even of such as he had (as to their particular) well deserved of. And that saying undid him, Sylla nescivit literas, non posuit dictare, utterly thereby cutting off all hope that he would give over the Dictatorship. Being sensible of the envy he had contracted, he desired to haste out of the Citie, but four dayes before the time appointed, he was slain in the Senate-house by a conspiracy of above 60 Senators and Equites. Though his death was portended several wayes, yet he neglected it. 'Tis said, that as he went down to the house that very morning, that the names of the Conspirators were put into his hands, but he folded them up amongst other papers and never read them. The chief of them were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, C. Cassius, and of his own party Decimus Brutus. Coming into the Senate-house, which then was Pompey's Court, thinking of the Parthian expedition, as he sat in his Curule Chair, they fell upon him, and killed him with 23 wounds. So he who had fought fifty battels, and killed 1192000 men, in that Senate, which he himself for the most part had chosen, in the Court of Pompey, and before Pompey's Statue, so many of his Centurions looking on, fell by the hands of most Noble Citizens, many of whom he had to his utmost gratified, and so lay he, that not so much as a friend nor slave came near his body.

Is slain in the Senate-house.

4. So great a man he was that Plutarch * being judge, there was none of the greatest, and most admired Captains, to whom the Gallick War alone did not demonstrate him equal in commendations, both as a General, and as a Soldier. For, whether we consider the Fabii, Scipios, Metelli, his Contemporaries, or those that went before him, as Sylla, Marius, and both the

the Luculli, and even him whose glory for all warlike abilities reacheth to the skies; Pompey himself, the actions of Cæsar excel all their exploits. For, sometimes he obtained greater glory, for the inconvenience of the places wherein he made War, sometimes for the greatnesse of the Countries which he subdued, sometimes for the multitude and strength of his Enemies overthrown, sometimes for the perfidiousnesse and barbarism of the Nations subdued, sometimes for clemency shewed to the conquered, or otherwhiles for his liberality towards his fellow-soldiers; but alwaies in respect of the number of battels, and of those that were slain. For having caried on the War in Gall not fully ten years, he took above 800 Cities, subdued 300 several sorts of People, and having engaged at several times with three millions of men, killed the third part, and took the other alive. So great was the affection of his Soldiers to him, and their care to please him, that whereas otherwise they were nothing better than others, yet being invincible for his credit, they would not refuse any danger. This disposition in them he first bred and then maintained by conferring honours and rewards upon them, wherein he spared nothing; then by undertaking all dangers with them, and refusing no labour. His boldnesse indeed and courage, considering that it proceeded from incredible desire of glory, they admired not so much; but his labour and toil which he indured above his strength did attonish them. For, he was of a thin habit of body, pale and tender, had a sickly head, and was subject to the falling sicknesse or Epilepsie, which first took him at Corduba. But he took not an occasion of lazinesse from his want of health, but by Expeditions, most difficult journeys, slendernesse of diet, and by continuing abroad in the open air, sought to drive away his disease, and keep his body healthful. Most commonly he slept as he was caried in his chariot or litter, so that his sleep was not idle. On the day time he was caried about the Forts, Cities and Camps, with a boy sitting by him, who wrote down what he dictated, and a Soldier with a sword standing at his back. He made so great journeys, that in his first Expedition from Rome, in eight incampings he came to the River Rhodanus. From his childhood he had learnt and practised riding, so that putting his hands behind him upon his back, he would sit an horse in his full speed, which was very much for one that had his disease. Moreover in that Expedition he exercised himself so, that riding, he would dictate several letters to two Secretaries or more. He was a man ambitious of power, and unsatisfied with any thing on this side Sovereignty, but Victory pleased him, not revenge nor cruelty, in which respect Cicero, to note his ambition, and yet acknowledge his goodnesse of nature, compared him to Pisistratus.

5. The conspirators conscious of the greatnesse of the fact, fearing the worst, secured themselves in the Capitol, it being in the Senate strongly debated how it should look upon the thing, and consequently upon them. But for Antonius the Consul (who also resolved when he should be able, to punish it, though now he betrayed no such intention) the fact had been approved of, as done upon an Usurper and a Tyrant, though they had not long before taken a solemn oath for his preservation, and decreed such vast honours to him. Antonius by putting them in mind, that if he were judged deservedly slain, all his acts wereto be nulled, and consequently the assignment of several Offices, which he had of late made to several of them, effected that no more was done than to decree an Amnestie or oblivion for all that was past, for which Cicero much laboured. The offices were confirmed with this reason entered, because it was requisite for the good of the Commonwealth, and the day following the Senate meeting again, decreed Provinces to the murderers, viz. to M. Brutus Crete, Africk to Cassius, to Trebonius Asia, to Clodius Bithynia, and Gall about Padus to Decimus Brutus. After this, Cæsar's testament was opened, wherein he made heirs three Nephews of his Sisters, C. Octavius of three parts in four of his estate (not of half onely, as it's found in Livy's Epitome) and L. Pinarius and Q. Pedius of the other fourth part. C. Octavius he adopted into his name and family, and most of those

As second heirs, if the former should not possess the inheritance, he named Decimus Brutus and M. Antonius. He also in his will gave no small matter to the Romans, to be divided man by man, as Plutarch writeth. This moved the People out of measure to indignation against the Conspirators, Antonius the Consul vehemently stirring up the multitude in his funeral Oration. They were driven to that rage, that after the burning of the Corps they were hardly dissuaded from firing their houses, and they tore in pieces one Cinna whom they mistook for another of that name that was one of them.

6. Now the series of affaires bringeth us to Cesar Octavianus the adopted son of Julius. He was grand-son to his sister Julia, which woman was wife to M. Attilius Balbus, and by him had a daughter that was married to C. Octavius. He was born in the Consulship of Cicero, and lost his father (who governing Macedonia, died suddenly before he could stand for the Consulship) when but four years old. He accompanied this his great Uncle in the last Spanish War, who ever kept him close to him in their travail, and was now sent by him to Apollonia to study, intending to take him along with him in the Parthian War. There he heard of his death, and the inheritance left to him. His Mother and Father-in-Law Marcus Philippus, were unwilling he should take the name of Cesar, as subject to much envy; but after some pause he resolved to the contrary, and assuming the name of Cesar Octavianus, made use of the good affections of his Uncles friends in Greece, who accompanying him to the City, he was met by a vast number of others from Rome. Here, after he had accepted of the adoption, and confirmed it by the authority of the Praetor as the custom was, he went to Antony, whom he expected to have his friend and assistant in prosecuting his Uncle's Enemies. But after some waiting, he entertained him with great contempt, and though he had got a great quantity of Cesar's money, yet he denied to let him have any, fearing he should grow into too much esteem. Cesar hereupon sold his own inheritance to pay the legacy given to the People, which procured him much love, his Uncle's (or Father's, as now he must be called) old Soldiers flocked to him, whom he accepted of out of fear of Antony, who now became every day more odious, both to him, to People and Senate.

7. The Senate suspected Antony as intending to set up himself, and he intended nothing more, for which cause he resolved to have some Province assigned him, wherein he might get power. To curry favour then he propounded to be considered Sexius Pompey, who yet remained of the sons of Pompey the Great (that beloved man) that in requital for his fathers estate confiscated, he might have an allowance out of the publick, and command of the Seas, with that Navy he formerly had. This being received with great applause was enacted; and so Pompey was called back into Sicily, where he afterwards waged a great War against Cesar. Antony perswaded Dolabella his Colleague (a young man whom Cesar having ordained to be Consul after his departure out of the City, when he was dead, took the Office, and inveighing against his benefactor, would have had the day of his death stiled the birthday of the City) though he loved him not, to ask Syria, not of the Senate, but the People, hoping that after him he should not be denied such a request. The difference increasing betwixt him and Cesar, he desired to have the six Legions which lay in Macedonia, and obtained them, deceiving the Senate by a false rumour, that the Getae hearing of Cesar's death, had invaded that Province. He baited them, by preferring a Law against any one's being Dictator. It was his design to bring these Legions over into Italy to awe and command all, and that he might effect this, he preferred by force a Law for changing of Provinces, and thereby procured to his brother C. Antonius Macedonia, which formerly had been assigned to M. Brutus, and to himself the nearer Gall (or Gallia Cisalpina) which before was given to Decimus Brutus.

8. The Senate would in no wise grant this, whereupon he betook himself to

to the People. When he had brought over his Legions, part of them revolted to Caesar, who now out of fear went up and down Italy, gathering Soldiers out of the Colonies his father had planted. With a considerable Army at length Antony marched into Gall, whence he commanded Brutus to be gone, who gave way to him then, but departed to Mutina, resolving there to stay and endure a siege, for that he had some considerable strength, and expected assistance. Here Antony straightly besieged him, which the Senate hearing of, by Cicero's working especially (who now began to speak and write his fourteen Orations, in imitation of those of Demosthenes, called Philippicks) declared him an Enemy to the State, which proved a means for the bringing in and preferring of Caesar Octavianus. For though the Senate cared not at all for him, as being generally of Pompey's faction, yet they resolved to make use of him for his Armies sake, and therefore erected him a statue, made him a Senator, though but nineteen years old, decreed, that he should be considered towards preferment as ten years older, and gave him equal power with Hirtius and Pansa the Consuls, whom now they sent to relieve Brutus. They took Bononia; but Antony being bold, for that he had got the better in some skirmishes, went and met Pansa, whom he overthrew, but returning carelessly into his Camp, was worsted by Hirtius. A little after, a great battle was fought near Adusia, wherein Antony was quite defeated, and fled to Lepidus then Proconsul in the further Gall. Both the Consuls died of wounds; Hirtius in Antony's Camp, and Pansa at Bononia. Brutus being at this time spared by Caesar, thought of departing with his ten Legions to M. Brutus and Cassius, now in Greece, but his Soldiers moved by the difficulty of the journey revolted, the six new raised Legions to Caesar, and the four of old Soldiers to Antony. He then purposing with a small attendance to pass through Gall, was taken at Aquileia, and betrayed by Capenus Sequanus Governour of the Countrey, who sent his head to Antony. Before this, Trebonius another of his Complices in Caesar's death, excluding Dolabella (whom the Senate had judged an Enemy) from Pergamus and Smyrna, was taken by him in the latter place, and after grievous torments, had his head cut off, which the Soldiers kicking about as a foot-ball, did so abuse, as no face was to be seen on it. Not long after the death of Decimus Brutus, Minutius Basilus another of the Conspirators was slain by his slaves, whom he had gelded in a great rage.

9. Now the Senate having no need of young Caesar, slighted him exceedingly, decreeing the honour due to him unto Brutus, whom he had relieved, giving him very bitter taunts, and denying him a Triumph. Being sensible hereof, and how most of them were of Compey's Faction, he began to tamper with Antony by Letters, as also with Lepidus, for a conjunction, and sent 400 Soldiers into the City, in the name of the Army, to demand the Consulship for him. Hereat the Senat straining hard, one Cornelius a Centurion laying his hand on his Sword, said, This shall do it, if you will not. Then called he Antony and Lepidus into Italy, whereat the Senate much startled, and too late blaming their own rigidity, decreed him Consul, and whomsoever he would take to himself. So he invaded the Consulship, a month and five dayes before he was twenty years old, and took Q. Pedius for his Colleague. Then by a Law was fire and water forbidden to all that had an hand in the death of Caesar, and their goods were sold. The Senate was now so changed, either through good advice or fear, that instead of slighting they advanced him above all example. They resolved that after his Consulship he should take place of all Consuls, and though formerly they were displeased with his levying forces being a private man; now they desired him to add to his Army, and decreed to him the Legions of Decimus Brutus. The City was committed to his care, and power given him to act what he pleased, though without the prescript of the Laws, which he retained fifty six years till his death. Not long after came Emilius Lepidus and M. Antonius into Italy, whom he met about Bononia, and after after a three dayes conference entred into confederacy with them; which is famous by the name of the Triumvirate.

10. The terms of this Combination were, That Caesar for the remainder of the year should leave the Consulship to Ventidius, who formerly in the Social War when a Boy was led in Triumph, and after that rubbed the heels of * Mules for his living. That a new authority of three men should be erected to take away civil dissensions; which they three should execute for five years with Consular power (for, the Dictatorship was waved, because of a Law lately preferred against it by Antony) with authority to dispose of all Offices for that Term. That Antony should have as a Province all Gall, except that of Narbon, which Lepidus was to have with Spain; and to Caesar was Africk, with Sardinia and Sicily assigned; other places beyond the Seas being left to another time. They agreed further, that their Enemies should be destroyed, wherein the case of Cicero moved the greatest controversie. For Antony would not meddle except he in the first place should be slain, Lepidus was content, but Caesar stood much against it, yet on the third day he assented an exchange being made; for he yielding up Cicero, Lepidus permitted his brother Paulus, and Antony L. Caesar his Uncle by the Mother's side to be proscribed. Lastly, it was agreed that Lepidus should be Consul the following year, instead of Decimus Brutus, designed formerly by Julius Caesar. He guarding Rome and Italy, the other two were to make War upon Brutus and Cassius, who now (though at first without any decree of the Senate) had seized on Macedonia and Syria. Cassius in Laodicea besieged Dolabella, who being judged an Enemy by the Senate for the death of Trebonius, when the Citie was taken caused his Page to cut off his head, and so ended his life, being a man of no great solidity. He was son-in-law to Cicero: but after the divorcing of Tullia they fell into great enmity, whereupon the Orator proved a back friend to him in the Senate, reigning amongst the Fathers and the People with his Eloquence.

11. The first effect of the Triumvirate was a Proscription of some 300 persons of Equestrian and Senatorial ranks. Though the pretence was to revenge Caesar's death, yet many were murdered for their rich Estates, others out of malice, and some for their convenient Houses and Gardens. Amongst those of greatest note was Varro, who now living to see and feel a second Tricipitina, yet escaped with his life. Cicero the man most aimed at by Antony for opposing him so vehemently in the Senate, upon the Triumvirs their coming went to Sea; but the winds being contrary, and because he could not endure the shaking of the ship, he returned, saying, he would die in his Countrey often preserved by him. Being weary both of his flight and life, he came to a Village a little more than a mile distant from the Sea. Here his servants terrified by several prodigies, partly by perswasion, and partly by force put him again in his litter, and were carrying him back to the Sea, when hearing of those that came to seek for him, he caused the Litter to be set down, and quietly stretched out his neck to Popilius Lenas, whom formerly by his Oratory he had saved from condemnation. He ill favouredly enough cut off his head and hands, which he presented to Antony, and for so doing received a great reward. After the head had been sufficiently gazed on by him and his wife Fulvia (who set on her knees, pulled out the Tongue, and pricking it with Needles, otherwise shamefully shewed her spite) it was to the grief of all men set up in the pleading place, or Rostra. To such an end came this most famous man, the father of Roman eloquence. He was born at Arpinum, on the third of the Nones of January, in the 648 year of the Citie, C. Asilius Serranus, and Q. Servilius Capió being Consuls, the same wherein Pompey the Great was born, on the Calends of October. His father was of Equestrian rank, and issued, as some said, from Tullus Autius, a Noble King of the Volscei. He first deserved the Triumph of the Gown, and the Laurel of the Tongue. And as Caesar the Dictator wrote of him, he obtained a Laurel greater than all Triumphs (though he had one decreed to him for his good service in the field) by how much the more 'tis a greater and more excellent thing to enlarge the bounds of Roman wit, than of Empire. He died on the seventh of December, when he had lived 63 years eleven moneths and five dayes. His brother Quincus and his sons were slain, but his own escaped; for that he had sent him beforehand unto Athens.

And many others.

12. All places in the Citie were full of slaughters. The ordinary rate of one head brought to the Triumvirs, if by a free-man, was 100000 Sesterces; if by a slave, half so much, with the liberty of the Citie. This corrupted many, so as forgetting both duty and natural affection, they betrayed those for whose preservation they ought to have laboured. Yet now many rare, and admirable examples, of the love of wives to their husbands, and of slaves to their Masters, appeared; fewest of Children towards their Parents. Yet Op- pius his Act seemeth to stand for many, who Aneas like carried out his old and decrepit father, and conveyed him to the Sea, sometimes leading, and sometimes carrying him on his back, till they both escaped into Sicily, whence afterwards returning, the people out of a sense of his piety made him Ædilis, and for that he wanted money to set out the usual Games, the Artificers willingly wrought for him without wages, and the Spectators by a contribution made him rich. Of such proscribed persons as escaped, some fled to Brutus and Cassius, who received them kindly; but most unto Sexus Pompey now in Sicily, who sent out Vessels to hover upon the Coasts for them, and furnished them when came over with necessaries. But the Triumvirs wanting great sums for carrying on the War against Cassius and Brutus, by reason that few would buy Confiscated Estates, condemned also, though not the persons, yet the goods of many rich women, as well as men.

The Triumvirs condemn the estates of women to get money.

13. Cassius, after he had got Syria into his power, thought of making an expedition into Egypt against Cleopatra (who now was going with a great power to the aid of Cesar and his followers) but was recalled by Brutus; for that Antony and Cesar (who having attempted something against Ptolemy in Sicily, put it now off till another time) were coming against them with fourty Legions, whereof eight had already passed the Ionian Sea. Therefore leaving Syria to his brother's son with one Legion, he sent some into Cappadocia, who killed Ariobarzanes as one that had conspired against him, and brought him a masse of money. Exacting money with much rigour he came into Asia, and meeting Brutus at Smyrna, they consulted about the Warre. Brutus moved that they should passe over into Macedonia, and there encounter their Enemies; but Cassius prevailed that the Rhodians and Lycians should first be reduced, who refused to Contribute any thing, and were powerfull at Sea. It seeming good not to leave any Enemy at their back, this was performed, and vast sums of money by that, and other means raised. The Xanthians standing out, as they had done in former times against Cyrus and Alexander, were scarce any of them left alive; and the Rhodians had little besides their lives left unto them.

And Cassius and Brutus take extravagant courses for Treasure.

14. After this, both the Armies met at Philippi, that Citie of Macedonia, to which, being built by Philip to restrain the Thracians, as we have formerly shewn, St. Paul wrote his Epistle. Here appeared on either side 19 Legions. Antony and Cesar brought into the field 13000 horse; but Brutus and Cassius 20000. who coming thither first, incamped on an high and convenient ground near the Sea, whence they could have Provisions in abundance. The other party was exceedingly straightned for necessaries, having onely Macedonia and Thessaly open to it, for that Pompey cut off all entercourse from Africk, as Murcus and Enobarbus from Italy, by their Navies. This made Antony desirous to fight above measure, which the Enemy knowing well enough, refused to ingage, till Antony making a way through a Fen to intercept his Provisions, and a work being raised by Cassius against him, this procured a fight, wherein Cassius had the worst on his part, and his Camp was taken by Antony. On the other side Cesar's Wing was worsted, and his Camp also taken by Brutus. Cassius departing to an Hill not far off, expected the event of the fight on his partner's side, and because for the dust he could not discern what horse it was that made towards him, sent Titinius to discover. He being received with joy by those that were bringing tidings of victory, stayed so long, till Cassius, fearing the worst, and that the Messenger was intercepted, killed himself, or caused his Liberius, or Freedman, to cut off his head. Scarcely was it fallen, when Timinus coming, followed him by his own hands, whom as he said, he had killed by loitering.

15. Brutus presently caused his Collegues body to be buried out of sight, lest the Army should be dejected; and then had no mind to fight, desiring rather to starve the Enemy, who now was in desperate condition by want of necessaries, till fearing a defection, for that some had revolted already, or till being forced by the earnestnesse of his Soldiers he led them out to battle. Both parties, though Countrey-men, were so greedy of ingaging, that they neglected to use any missive vveapons, and betook themselves to their Swords, fighting with great animosity, till at length Brutus his side was born down, and put to the rout. He escaped to an Hill, where remaining all night, when in the morning he saw no way of escaping (Antony having made him sure, lest he should renew the War) he set his swords point to his left pap, where the motion of the heart is felt, and forcing it into his breast, expired. This was the end of these two men, by the same vveapons as some write wherewith they killed Cesar, who had given them their lives, and received them into favour after the battel of Pharsalum. While they sought liberty by his death, by that very means they lost that which they accounted such, being indeed no other than a liberty for the common sort to run into extravagancies, and for particular men to abuse their credulity, and by flattery to procure power, which they then would improve (even Pompey himself, as well as Sylla, Cinna, Marinus and Cesar) further than their Commissions extended. With them perished the hopes of that called a Commonwealth, which thenceforth never was more seen. As for the succeeding bickerings which the Triumviri had with young Pompey, they were but inconsiderable in comparison of this War with Cassius and Brutus, who having under their power all the Roman Empire from Macedonia to the River Euphrates, with above 20 Legions, 20000 horse, 200 long ships, and infinite sums of money, so long as they remained, the Commonwealth seemed (though not at Rome) as yet to be surviving.

16. Cesar being indisposed (for he had not his health this expedition, and therefore was not in the first fight) returned into Italy. Antony went into Asia to gather up money for the payment of largesses promised to the Soldiers. Here he squeezed out of the poor Inhabitants that little which was left them by Cassius and Brutus, the followers of whom he also restored as he met with them, except such as had an hand in Cesar's death. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, on whom he presently doated, having formerly had much affection for her when yet a Girl, at such time as he accompanied Gabinus into that Kingdom. Thither he now followed her, having first sent a party of horse to plunder Palmyra, a Town situate near Euphrates, and laid most heavy Tributes and Impositions upon the Provinces. After Cesar had recovered, according to their agreement at parting he set himself to divide Lands to the Army in Italy, which hereby was put into a great combustion, the number of Soldiers being so great, that multitudes of Inhabitants were turned out, and many Towns emptied to give place to those new comers, who committed many outrages, and had not purchased those Lands by any service to the State (as was complained) but by serving to inthrall it to the Dominion of three men. Fulvia the wife of Antony, and Lucius his brother now Consul, envied Cesar this popularity with the Soldiers, and contended earnestly that they ought to settle the Soldiers of Antony, which was granted. But herewith not contented, they resolved to prosecute him with War. She, for that she desired her husband might be recalled thereby from Cleopatra, concerning whom she had too much cause to be jealous of him: and he out of desire to innovate, pretending an indeavour to suppress the Triumvirate, and to reduce the ancient form of Government, and trusting much to the strength of his brother.

17. Much ado was made to reconcile them, but to no purpose. The ancient Possessors of the grounds flocked to Lucius, and the new ones to Caesar, to whom Salvidienus coming out of Gall with great strength, Lucius went to oppose him, but was diverted by Agrippa, and reduced to such straights betwixt them two, (though Ventidius and Asinius, two of Antony's Captains were not far off) that glad he was to betake himself for security to Perusia a strong Town, where he was closely besieged by Caesar and his party. He stood out very courageously, till forced by famine to yield to mercy; then coming out first, and casting himself into Caesar's hands, he interceded for his Soldiers, and desired all the blame might be upon himself: he was received honourably, and his Soldiers were pardoned at the desire of their Enemies. The Town was to be plundered, but by a mad-man, who set his own house on fire and therein perished, it was burnt down to the ground. About this time was the first Eclogue of Virgil written (who now was some 28 years old) during the division of those Lands, as clearly appeareth from it: the above mentioned L. Antonius and P. Servilius Isauricus being Consuls, in the 713th year of the Cirie, and the third of the Triumvirate.

18. After the Perusian War (for so 'tis called) Caesar suspecting Antony's affection towards him; to strengthen himself seized on Spain and Gall, though his Provinces, taking occasion at the death of his Lieutenant, vvhhereby being 40 Legions strong, he vvas able to grapple vwith him if need should require. But having no shipping he was at a losse as to Sea matters, and therefore married Scribonia the sister of Libo, father-in-law to Sex-tus Pompey, from whom he hoped by this alliance if need were to obtain peace. Antony this Spring moved from Alexandria, where he had lived all Winter very loosely with Cleopatra, as against the Parthians, who now under conduct of Labienus had over-run Syria as far as Tyre. Though this Town was set upon by them, and he pretended he would relieve it, yet he did not, alleging a necessity of going to the War against Pompey, who now hindered all Provisions from coming to the Cirie, and thereby caused a great dearth: & he again excused himself why he came no sooner to that against Pompey, because he was retained by the Parthian War. Sayling then into Asia, he had news of the event of the Perusian War, and blamed much his wife and brother; whence passing into Greece he met with her, and his mother Julia, whom Pompey having taken now sent safe to him. Thence he sayled over the Ionian Sea, where Enobarbus delivered up all his Fleet and forces to him; and so they came to Brundisium, where they were kept out by a Gar-rison placed there by Caesar.

19. This made such a breach betwixt them, that Antony blocked up the Town, and procured Pompey from Sicily to invade Italy. Caesar came to Brundisium, where the old Soldiers being unwilling to fight against Antony, the Army laboured to reconcile the Triumvirs, which Cocceius friend to both at length effected with much labour; Pollio on Antony's side, and Macenas on Caesar's, as Delegates making up the breach. All offences were mutually to be forgiven, and for that Marcellus husband to Octavia Caesar's sister was now dead, and also Fulvia Antony's wife for grief that he neglected her, Antony married Octavia. Then was the Roman Empire divided betwixt them, the bounds of their Dominions being Codropolis a Town of Illyricum, all from it Westward being to obey Caesar, and all Eastward Antony. Africk was left to Lepidus, who now was even no body, and having offended Caesar had been confined by him to that Province. The War against the Parthians was judged to Antony, and that against Pompey (who must needs now be suppressed) unto Caesar. Antony sent Ventidius into Asia to restrain the Parthians, who now had made an incursion as far as Ionia. But out of Sardinia did Menodorus Pompey's Admiral the second time eject Helenus Caesar's Captain; whereupon Caesar refused to hearken to Antony, when he moved him to be reconciled unto Pompey. Both the Triumvirs (or rather now the Duumvirs) being come to the Cirie, were received with most lamentable complaints of poor people, ready to starve for want of Provisions, which Pom- pey hindred from coming, from the East by Sicily, from the West by Sardinia and Corfica, which he had in his power, and from Africk by his Navy also, which then was most powerful at Sea. Cesar could not be drawn to make Peace with him, notwithstanding the loud cries and prayers of the multitude, which obstinacy drew him, and Antony (rescuing him) into such danger, as both of them were near stoning. At length being forced to it, and Pompey being perswaded, they met, but Pompey expecting to be admitted into the power and place of Lepidus, the Treaty came to nothing. Yet the pressure of the famine brought them together again, and amongst other things it was concluded, that Pompey retaining all the Islands he had already, and Peloponnesus over and above, as long as they should hold their power; and having liberty to be Consul, and to discharge the Office by any of his friends, he was to leave the Sea open, and pay to the People what corn was due out of Sicily. The proscribed persons, except such as were guilty of Cesar's death, had now all liberty to return. The day following, Consuls were designed for four years. First Antonius and Libo, than Cesar and Pompey, next Enobarbus and Sofius, and lastly, Cesar and Antony, who then (it might be hoped) might restore the Government to the People. Then did Antony and Cesar return, and were most joyfully received. And this year being the 714 of the City, did they procure Herod the Great to be declared King of Judea, in the first year of the 184 Olympiad, Cn. Domitius Calvinus the second time, and C. Asinius Pollio being Consuls.

Ventidius professeth against the Parthians.

20. Antony departed towards the East again for the Parthian Warre, which hitherto Ventidius his Lieutenant had managed with good successe, having got several victories, wherein Labiennus, who brought them into Syria, and Pharnapates, (or Phraates, or Barzapharnes, being called by several names) the greatest of their Captains, with Pacorus son to Orodes the King, were slain. After this he repelled them in Media and Mesopotamia, and besieged Antiochus Comagenus in Samofata, whom he suffered, upon promise of 1000 talents, to send Ambassadors unto Antony, who now drew near, and for that the siege was likely long to continue, by reason of the desperat resolution of the defendants, granted him Peace for 300 talents, accepted but of two Hostages, and those inconsiderable ones; and he gave him leave to put to death Alexander, who had formerly revolted to the Romans. This by (a) some he was thought to do for fear of the Army, which was angry at his ill usage of Ventidius; though others say, he honoured him according to his deserts, who though a man of an obscure extract, now first of all others triumphed over the Parthians. Antony having settled the affairs of Syria, departed to Athens, where he spent the winter with Octavia. But the (c) pence with Pompey continued but a short time. The cause of the breach (what ever secretly was aimed at) was pretended to be, for that Antony being to quit Peloponnesus, would do it but upon this condition, that Pompey should give him satisfaction for such moneys as was due to him from the Inhabitants. But Pompey liked not of any such condition, and therefore rigged a new Fleet, and provided himself of forces, perhaps giving credit to Meirodorus, who would tell him, that the present state of affairs was no true Peace, but rather a cessation of arms. He then renewed his Piracy, which renewed the former grievances, and made the People cry out, that the matter was onely altered from three Tyrants to four. But Meirodorus revolted to Cesar, bringing in with him Corfica, Sardinia, and three Legions, and then Antony was called to Brundisium to consult about the War. Thither he came at the day appointed, but Cesar keeping not his word he staid not for him, either not liking the breach of the Peace, or for that he envied Cesar all that power he saw him have; for still they suspected and grudged each other. But Cesar being provided, set out to Sea, as to invade Sicily, and was beaten back by Pompey, though he took him at unawares, who heard nothing of the revolt of Meirodorus, till also of Cesar's coming. Afterward his ships lying at Anchor, were extreemly battered, and most of the men were cast away.

21. Caesar fortified the Coasts of Italy, for fear lest Pompey should make an invasion, which he, not knowing how to improve a Victory, was never wont to attempt. Then wanting all manner of provisions for the Warre, he sent Mecenas to Antony, who refusing not to joyn with him, this cheered him, together with a Victory got by Agrippa in Aquitaine; many Cities, and private persons also promising aid. Antony came to Tarentum with 300 ships, but whether there was something else betwixt them, or for that he was now furnished, he slighted his help, Caesar excused himself that he met him not, which the other took in ill part, yet sent for him again. For having laid out much upon the Fleet, he intended to exchange it for some Italian Legions, to be used in the Parthian Warr, it being difficult for him to raise men in Italy, which was subject to Caesar, though by their last agreement both were left free there to make their Levies. Octavia coming over to her brother, agreed them, who then made the exchange, and because the time of the Triumvirate set by the Senate was almost out, prorogued their power for five years longer, without any consideration had of the suffrages of the People. So Antony departed into Syria, Caesar deferring his Expedition into Sicily untill the following year.

22. He determined to invade Sicily from three several quarters: Lepidus, Idem. who now joyned with him, was to invade it from Africk, Taurus from Tarentum, and he himself from Puteoli. Pompey resolved to oppose him so many several wayes, but at this time it needed not; for Caesar's Navy was the second time wracked by a Tempest, which so puffed up Pompey, that he stiled himself Neptune's son. But Caesar gave not over the enterprize; for the same Summer having recruited his forces, and mended his ships, he put forth to sea, and then, though on Lepidus his part were lost two Legions, overthrew Pompey's Fleet, but was again worsted, and yet landed 21 Legions, and 2000 Horse, besides 5000 lightly armed. No great or memorable battle was there on Land; but Pompey sent to his Enemy, to know if he would fight by Sea, fearing his Land-Forces. He accepted of his offer, and then finally defeated him, having sunk 28 of his Vessels. The rest were either taken or broken, seventeen onely escaped, and at the sight of this overthrow his Land-forces yielded to Caesar, so that with his seventeen Vessels he fled to Antony, from whom he expected protection, having restored formerly his mother safe to him, when in such a condition. Messana still stood out, but the Garrison at length yielded to Lepidus, who granted to the Soldiers, to draw them to his party, the plunder of the Town equal with his own. Having now by the addition of those Forces 22 Legions, and a strong body of Horse under his command, he pleased himself with thoughts of getting all Sicily into his hands, to which he pretended a right, as first invaded by him; and he sought to hinder Caesar all he could from the possession of it.

23. Caesar expostulated with him for his ingratitude; but to no purpose. Then found he means to draw away all his Army from him, which now was something averse to Civil Warrs, and satisfied of the greater worth of Caesar, being moreover incensed against their General, for making Pompey's Soldiers partakers with them in the plunder of Messana. Yet though his Soldiers would have killed him did he save them alive, but outed him of all power, and banished him; so that thus fell one head of this Tricipitina. Pompey not being persued by Caesar, craved protection from Antony; yet sent to the Parthian, in case he should not be received by him. Then thought he of seizing upon Syria, and the parts adjacent, upon a rumour of Antony's being overthrown; whereupon he was persued by his party, and at last taken and killed at Midaius a Town of Phrygia, as Dio writeth, but as Florus and Appian at Miletus, in the fourtieth year of his age, fourteen years after the death of his Father. Caesar at his return restrained roberies in the City, setting watches therein, and administered things in the ancient way by annual Magistrates. He burnt all letters written in time of War, promising he would restore the Commonwealth as soon as Antony should return, who, he knew, would also lay down the Magistracy, all Civil Warrs being ended. therefore received with luckie acclamations, and had a Perpetual Tribuneship bestowed on him, as invited by this honour to lay down his other power. Concerning this he wrote privately to Antony, who, whilst Caesar was thus imployed about Pompey, had called Cleopatra into Syria, and there given her Phœnicia, Calesyria, Cyprus, a great part of Cilicia, with part of Arabia Nabathæa, and so much of Judæa as brought Balsamum. Then sending her home, he marched into Armenia, where yet he could do nothing (for desire of her) like himself; but ever thought of returning to her, which shortly after he did; but was much troubled in his passage by the Parthians, to whom his Army had revolted, but that they killed such as first passed over to them.

gancies in

24. The year following, and that wherein Pompey was slain, he was solicited by the King of Media in conjunction with him to make Warre upon the Parthian; but was hindred by stirs which hapned betwixt Cleopatra and Octavia his wife, who now returning to him out of Italy, met with letters at Athens to stop her there, he pretending necessary avocations by Warre. Caesar then would have had her come to his house, but she would go to her husbands, where she educated both his children and her own, as became her. Then did Antony return into Armenia, where he caught the King by a wife, and brought him in triumph into Ægypt. Now would he be called Father Bacchus, as Cleopatra Isis, who now was stiled by him Queen of Ægypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Calesyria, Cæsario whom she had by Julius Caesar being her partner in these Principalities. But his own sons by her, Alexander and Ptolomy, he named Kings of Kings; betwixt whom he did not onely part what Provinces he himself had, but also Armenia, Parthia, and Media, and to Cleopatra their daughter assigned Cyrene. These things, together with the disgrace of his sister provoked Caesar, who made report of them to the Senate and People. Hereby he incensed men's minds against Antony, who shortly after went into Media, and entered into league with the King thereof. Caesar at the same time fought against several People of Illyricum, and the next year both provided for the Civil War betwixt themselves.

Caesar and he

25. Antony in way of recrimination to Caesar, objected his putting Leopidus besides the Triumvirate, and taking his Soldiers as those of Pompey to himself, which ought to have been equally free for both; and he challenged his part of the Soldiers raised in Italy. For, Caesar besides what we formerly mentioned, accused him of taking Ægypt as his Province, killing Pompey, abusing Artavasdes the Armenian King, to the great infamy of the Roman State; but above all upbraided him with Cleopatra, and what he had assigned to their children, as also for that he owned Cæsario as begotten by Caesar, though to the Senate he had acknowledged him for his own son. Antony, bewitched by Cleopatra so far as not to be able to rule himself, wrote to the Senate to have those things confirmed, which he had settled upon her and her children. The two Consuls Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius being much for him, were forced to leave the City, and get over to him, who now also having raised great forces, sent to Rome, to drive Octavia out of his house, and if taking his opportunity he had this Summer invaded Italy, he might in all probability have put an end to the quarrel. For, Caesar was not yet provided, wanting money exceedingly, which he now exacted throughout Italy. But this delay herein helped him, that men's minds were more and more bent against Antony, especially after Caesar had published his Testament, wherein he disposed as formerly, to his and Cleopatra's children, and ordained, that though he should dye at Rome, his body should be sent to her at Alexandria: it was also reported, that he meant, if his matters prospered, to give her Rome, and transfer the seat of the Empire into Ægypt. Hereupon the Warre was decreed against her, and he was devested of his Triumvirate, but not declared an Enemy, for fear of those with him. For then must they necessarily have been included in the same capacity, and so driven upon desperate Councils: to them therefore rewards were promised, if they would forsake him; and hereby was he thought rendred more inexcusable, in that being being unhurt he should make War for an Egyptian woman against his Countrey. Then did the one draw all the East, and the other the West to his party. Cesar had ready 250 ships of War, 80000 foot, and 12000 horse. Antony had 500 such like ships, very big and stately, with 100000 foot, and also 12000 horse. The King of the Modes also sent him aid, which being not sent back, and Antony also recalling his forces he had left with him for the protection of that Countrey, the Parthian became Master of that Kingdom, and Armenia also was lost.

Antony worsted,

26. The following year Agrippa being sent before by Cesar, took divers ships coming to Antony with Provisions, and molested him exceedingly upon the Sea, wherewith Cesar incouraged passed from Brundisium into Epirus, to a Promontory whereof that lieth near the Bay of Ambracia sending his forces, he took in Corcyra; so did Agrippa the Island Leucas near to Actium, with Paire and Corinth; Titius also and Taurus routed Antony's horse. Then several persons of note fell off from Antony. Sosius was beaten, and lost his life at Sea, and Antony himself was also worsted by a guard of Cesar's. Being much troubled hereat, Canidius would have perswaded him to send away Cleopatra, and decide the quarrel either in Thrace or Macedonia, for that he was stronger in Land forces. But though his navy had been twice worsted, and he had lost many ships, yet she obtained of him to fight at Sea, providing withall all things as for a fight. For four dayes the Sea was so rough with winds that it hindred them from fighting; but on the fifth they joyned, and then Cesar's ships being light could easily rack about and invade Antony's, which were unwieldly, and of little use. Cleopatra wearied with long expectation, ere it could certainly be known how things would go, with her gilded deck, Purple sayls, and sixty light Egyptian Gallies fled away, which Antony seeing, presently followed, forsaking his men, and running away, who ought to have animadverted upon such as did so. His Soldiers fought most valiantly, notwithstanding the basenesse of their General (who getting into Cleopatra's Gally, went, and sat by himself in a deep silence, holding his head with both his hands) till at the tenth hour they were partly perswaded, and partly constrained to submit, it being confessed that in this fight they behaved themselves like to, and executed the Office of, the best General, and their General played the part of a run-away Soldier. From this victory of Cesar at Actium a Promontory of Epirus, Several * Authors date his Monarchy, which lasted from the second of September whereon the battel was fought, to the 19th of August, on which he died, 44 years wanting 13 dayes. Now was hee himself the third time, and M. Valerius Messala Consuls, in the 723th year of the Citie, the second of the 187 Olympiad; and the seventh of Herod King of Judea, as Josephus gathereth, the 29th before the Era of Christ, A. M. 3974.

Overthrown at Actium in a Sea-fight.

His Land forces yield to Cesar.

27. His Land forces could scarcely believe his flight, having such an Army left to him intire, and for seven dayes were so constant to him, that though the thing was clearly known, they rejected Cesar's messages, but being now over-taken by him, and forsaken of their Leader Canidius, who had posted away after Antony, they yielded, and were taken into Cesar's Army. Then did Cesar go to Athens, where he put to death Cassius Parmensis, one of those that slew his Uncle, and settling the affairs both of Greece and Asia, determined to vvinter in Samus; but was called into Italy by Agrippa to quiet his Soldiers who now mutinied. He sailed then to Brundisium, but the Senate meeting him there, he went no further, and having dispatched his businesse within thirty dayes returned into Asia. Antony for some time lived disconsolately by himself. Cleopatra conveyed ships over into the Red-Sea, intending there to seek her fortune, she had thought also of flying into Spain. They both sent to Cesar, she that her Children might have Egipte granted them, and he that he might be permitted to live privately at Athens. She sent him a Golden Crown and Scepter, with a royal seat, privily to curry favour, and he, though openly he threatned her, secretly promised her safety, and

28. They sent again to him the first and second time, and he gave up to him Turullus a Senator, and one of the murderers of Julius Caesar. He putting the man to death returned no answer, neither the second time, when he sent Antyllus his son to him with much Gold, which he received. But with her he still dealt, sending Thyrus his Freed-man to her to make her believe that he was in love with her, hoping she might kill Antony, and preserve her Treasures, which she threatned to burn if she came into any danger. Now going down into Egypt he sent Cornelius Gallus before him, who seized on Paratonium the Chief Citie on that part near Africk; and Pelusium the other strongest Town towards Syria did Cleopatra betray to him, secretly forbidding the Alexandrians to go out against him. Antony once fought prosperously against his horse, and the second time was beaten; then he sent him a challenge, which Caesar refused, saying, that if Antony so pleased there were 1000 wayes lying open for his destruction. Wherefore, berhinking himself that he could not die with more credit than in battel, he resolved to oppose Caesar both by Sea and Land; but Cleopatra procured, that both his Navy, and horse revolted. Hereupon he returned into the Citie, crying out, that he was betrayed by her for whose sake he had taken up Arms. She being afraid of him departed to her Monument, and sent some to tell him she was dead, pretending fear of Caesar. Upon which message, he resolving to follow her, wounded himself in the belly. The wound not quickly dispatching him, she sent for him up into her Monument, whither he was pulled up by her self, and two women, being willing to live now that she was alive, and hoping he might possibly recover. But he shortly after died, willing her as well as she could to provide for her self, and not grieve for him, but rather rejoyce, in that he had been the most famous of men, as also most powerfull, and now being a Roman was not through lazinesse overcome by a Roman. Such was the end of this man, who through delice of fame became the Author of sad Tragedies to his Countrey, who in the use of his power greatly abused it, and was not onely overcome by a Roman, but also by a Woman, and then so behaved himself, that he could not be excused from lazinesse, effeminate nesse, and luxury, all which things checked that goodnesse of disposition supposed once to be in him, and left Cleopatra little cause to rejoyce for any real glory that might accrue unto him.

Antony kills himself

20. Caesar endeavoured to get Cleopatra into his hands, that he might lead her in Triumph. He easily obtained Alexandria, the Inhabitants whereof he pardoned, but put to death Antyllus the son of Antony, and some others. He viewed the body of Alexander the Great, and out of honour to his memory set on it a Golden Crown, and strewed it with flowers; but touching it he broke off a little piece of the Nose, and refused to see the bodies of the Ptolomies, though the Alexandrians much desired it, saying, he had a mind to see the King, and not dead men. Cleopatra dealt with her Physician to dispatch her, but being terrified by Caesar upon the account of her Children, she gave it over, and did all she could, but in vain, to work upon his affections when he came to see her. Then did she give him an Inventory of her goods, and he promised her fair things, thinking thereby that he deceived her, though he himself was deceived. For the understanding that she was reserved for a Triumph, prevented it by a voluntary death, as is in the History of her Kingdom related. Caesar made Egypt a Tributary Province, and would have conferred the Government thereof upon Arrius the Philosopher, who formerly had taught him, but he refusing the imployment, he gave it to Cornelius Gallus, a man of obscure birth. Caesario the son of Cleopatra by Julius Caesar, had by his mother been sent towards India with a great sum of money, but at Rhodes his Governour perswaded him to return, as now being to expect the Kingdom. Caesar consulting what to do

BOOK IV.
The Roman Empire.

CHAP. I.

From the absoluteness of Octavius, to the death of Tiberius, containing the space of 66 years.

The Grandeur of the Roman Empire.

1.  HE Roman Empire had now swallowed up the Macedonian, with such Kingdoms and States as were at all considerable, and Contemporary with it (whereof though some might retain a shew of liberty, yet were they but in a condition of vassalage) except the Parthian Kingdom, which as yet acknowledged no subjection, and when it did, being forced thereto for the most part by intestine divisions, not long continued in that acknowledgement.

2. This Empire now laboured under it's own weight, and, like to some unwieldy thing, staggered, by reason of the turgency of it's inward burthen, without any extraneous violence: it was grown up to an arthlerick habit, and had already sufficiently manifested the danger of this constitution. For, being all head and no body, it wanted those limbs, which by direction from a superiour sense, could secure it's progress; or indeed being all body, and

under it's own

no head, it was void of that influence which effecteth an orderly motion, and is necessary for the subsistence of life it self. The proper fruits of Popular Government were now grown fully ripe. Every one would command, and none would be ruled, yet every man challenging a part in the Supreme power, none enjoyed it much, and therefore but few were really solicitous for the upholding of it as Popular, any further than some private interests led them. The heady multitude indeed was violently caried on in it's desires after the chief command; but some desired it rather that others might not enjoy it, holding this Principle, to oppose all rising, though excellent persons whatsoever. Others tickled with an humour of ruling, and in intellectuals above their fellows, set themselves to please the rabble by maligning other men, crying up liberty and equality, extolling the justice of the Agrarian, and vaunting of great matters intended to be done by themselves, when in a capacity. Sometimes their boldness and cunning procured their rise, most commonly some capitulations, and otherwhiles mony distributed to the rabble, when the step was great. For after that the Romans passed the Seas, more luxury, avarice, and corruption, than of Victory was brought home. When they came abroad, notwithstanding the repure of their abstinence, they found the same temptations as other men, and made themselves Masters of the manners, as well as the possessions of the conquered. All things were now bought and sold, from the meanest Office to the Consulship, and the lowest privilege to the right of Suffrages.

3. The daily sight of these things corrupted such, as else might have proved just. It seemed a prudent Principle, rather to command than to be commanded; rather to buy than to be sold, and to get something, rather than suffer all things to be lost. The body of the People was now grown large, the Italians being received to the freedom of the City, and liberty of Suffrages. Hence ambitious men had advantage enough to make parties, and to carry things in the Comitia or Assemblies, having once by indirect practices ingratiated themselves. Having obtained commands afar off, they had opportunity to increase their power, through the distance of place, the credit of their conquests, and the affections of their Armies. Power once obtained, is difficultly laid down, both by reason that man's nature is averse to diminution, and for that something may be committed in height of passion, or through convenience, or otherwise, whereof it might not be safe to give an account, as neither to lye open and naked to the malice of revengeful Enemies. The Empire being now vast, several men at the same time might be found in these capacities, so that jealousies and emulations must thence be heightened, and one strive to reduce the other into order. Further, the largeness of Empire afforded multiplicity of places, alwayes of several, and sometimes of contrary interests or humours, which would espouse quarrels accordingly, whence never would be wanting sufficient and convenient matter for publick combustions.

such distempers

As Monarchy could onely
cure.

4. Such was the present State of Roman affairs, and such had been their constitution before the present juncture, which loudly, in the understanding of all prudent men, called for the help of some single Person duly qualified, whose Monarchy could onely put an end to the civil dissensions, by removing the loose liberty of the multitude, which gave occasion to those distempers, by preventing ambitious indeavours of private persons after Sovereignty, which fomented them, and by checking all exorbitant power of particular men, which effectually procured them. Cesar on the one side considering these things, as also being sensible of the power he already enjoyed, and of the danger he might incur by removing himself to a private life; and on the other, weighing the envy and odium he should contract by the establishment of himself, after he had conquered Antony and Cleopatra, and (having entered his fourth Consulship in the Isle Samius) returned to Rome, he asked the advice of his two most inward Counsellors and bosome friends, Agrippa and Macenas. Vipsanius Agrippa, a man of mean Parentage (which Vipsanius manifesting, he changed into Marcus) and no great endowments, except

in what concerned War, though of a well-meaning mind, and a great lover of Cæsar, answered him first, and earnestly advised him to lay down his power, and renue the Government into the hands of the Multitude. His arguments for the most part respected the danger of Cæsar's person, being drawn from the averinsse of the Romans to Monarchy, and enforced by examples of others, who had attempted to establish themselves. Against Monarchy it self he could produce little of moment. He would prove that Popular Government was better for the Greeks, who, he said, did nothing that was notable, till they put themselves into that way. He said, there were others also, the condition of whom pleaded for this Government, yet named none. But he especially instanced in the Romans themselves, who being averse to Monarchy, had done all these great things under that form of rule and domination which was opposite to it.

5. But Macenas, a man, though but of Equestrian rank, yet, of (a) high descent, and (b) extraordinary abilities, desired Cæsar, that if he loved his Country, he would alter, correct and reduce it into a better form of Government. He said, he would not have him deceived with a specious shew of names and words; but considering what should follow, to restrain the fury of the multitude, and take to himself, assisted by excellent persons, the Government; that the most prudent might consult, the best Captains have the command of Armies, and the most robust and poor serve in them. Hereby every one minding his own business, and one affording help to another, none would find any defect, and the true power of the People with liberty and safety would be preserved. For, the power of the multitude, he said, being indeed the slavery of every worthy man, was most grievous, and brought common destruction unto all: but this, wherein modesty should ever be preferred, and mens deserts considered, would make all alike to be happy. He would have him therefore assisted and advised by worthy persons, to order all things needful, to make War, create Magistrates, reward, punish, and make Laws; all others being obedient; so that Warrs might be made with secrecy, and upon occasion, such as were preferred might be chosen, not by lot, or through the prevalence of their ambition, but for their worth. Thus good men might be honoured, and bad punished without disturbance; and so at length things would be rightly carried, when nothing should be referred to the Vulgar, nor openly be consulted of, nor be committed to intruders, nor come into danger through their ambition. In sum, all would enjoy their own, no dangerous Wars nor wicked Seditions being made.

6. But these evils he proved to be common in a Popular Government, wherein the great ones aspiring to the top, and with money or otherwise purchasing the help of the ordinary sort, disturbed all things. He said, they had now had large experience of these things, and that by no other means could they be ended, than by that whereof he spake; whereof this was an evident sign, that for a long time they had been vexed with Warrs and Seditions, by reason of the multitude of men, and greatness of affaires; for that men were so various in Nature and Nations, and induced with such diversity of affections and desires: and because things hereby were brought to that passe, that with difficulty could they be managed. Now that he spake true, he said, the deeds themselves bore mention; for, as long as the multitude of the Roman People was not great, nor much more considerable than their neighbours, the State was in a good condition, and almost all Italy was subdued by them. But after that passing out of Italy, they went abroad into all Countries and Islands, and filled all Seas and Lands with their name and power, no good got they by it: but first of all, at home and within the walls, riots being made, they shook the Commonwealth, and afterwards propagated the same mischief into their Enemies. Therefore their City, like to some great ship of burthen, filled with a various multitude, and destitute of a Pilot, having been for many ages beaten and tossed with grievous waves, now flored, and having no stay, was tossed here and there. He desired him therefore, that he would not still neglect her thus conflicting with tempests

‘ Tempests (for he saw how much water she had already taken in) nor suffer

 ‘ and Governour to his Countrey, not to cast her off; but as by his means ‘ she had a little recovered her spirits, so, for the ages to come, she might re‘ main in safety by the same means. Having used these arguments drawn ‘ from the Things, he took others from the Man, and shewed him his immi‘ nent danger, in case he laid down his power, in the several cases of Pompey, ‘ Marinus and Sylla. Pompey, he said, having devested himself of his power, ‘ was contemned, and being laid at by his Enemies perished, because he could ‘ not recover it. He told him, that his father (meaning Julius Caesar) going ‘ about the same miscarried. The same had happened to Marinus and Sylla, but ‘ that they were prevented by death; though some said also that Sylla killed ‘ himself to prevent his Enemies: ’tis certain, that many of his Laws began to ‘ be repealed whilst he yet lived. In conclusion, he told him, he must expect ‘ many such as Lepidus, Sertorius, Brutus, and Cassius. This is the sum of Mace- ‘ nas his speech in behalf of Monarchy, whereof the beginning is lost, as also ‘ the conclusion of that of Agrippa.

Democratical Government impracticable in one or more Nations, considerable for wealth, and of various interests.

7. These things sufficiently evidence, that it was impossible in an humane way for the Empire to subsist in a Commonwealth so called; and not onely that, but any one considerable Nation, or more (not to speak of one, or a few Cities, or places at present) which must necessarily consist of multitudes of people, diversly qualified, variously inclined, and very unequally possessed of wealth and honours. Such having the Supream power in their own hands must needs foment several humours. The rich, and honourable, must either not meddle, and so out of discontent watch for an advantage to alter things, or if they do, they will not be content with equal employments. When any extraordinary power is obtained, such inforcements as were formerly mentioned will happen, which being driven on by that ambition which is but natural to all mankind, will drive either fear, or desire, into Monarchy. A civil war especially produceth this, and more especially when the quarrel is betwixt single persons; and yet more especially is it enforced by a religious pretence, under which Vizard the greatest deceit hath triumphed, accompanied, or ushered in by a sacrilegious asserting of approving providence, whereby inviolable Majesty, Order, Propriety, and all things excellent have been contaminated, overturned, and trampled on, and yet a structure erected at length out of the materials of those very things, which formerly were onely by the intruders accounted bad, because they stood upon another ground. But not onely in a Democratical way is it impossible for one, or more considerable Nations to be governed, but in an Aristocratical also. For if the wealth and propriety of a Nation be diffused, and not limited in the possessions of a few of the chiefest persons, such would find a continual repugnancy in their subjects, others thinking themselves as capable of power as they. Hence quarrels and implacable enmities must arise, and he who shall be best able will at length command the rest, though he ought to have been their fellow subject, and demonstrate a necessity of Monarchical Government.

An answer to Agrippa's argument drawn from the Greeks.

8. The affairs of the Gracians urged by Agrippa to make against Monarchy do much plead for it, and evince the necessity of it. For after that the multitude in the several Cities had rebelliously withdrawn themselves from that obedience, which both the Law of God, and just title of succession challenged as due to their Kings (who as Thucydides acknowledgeth governed them with Justice and Moderation) how miserably were they enslaved by their fellow Citizens (called by them Tyranni or Tyrants) and forced to submit to Usurpers, who punished them for their disobedience towards their rightfull Sovereigns. Never were there such Tumults, Seditions, Civil Wars, Massacres, and Desolations, as in, and amongst those Cities which called themselves Commonwealths. Such were the extravagancies of the multitude, that the best men were rejected, and bold, impudent, and sawcy fellows domineered, who being corrupted with money, bought, and sold all that was of

consequence, and by their cunning speeches turned, and led the rabble which way soever they pleased. As for what Agrippa urged, that they only did things of moment after that the power came into the peoples hands; those things of moment were amongst themselves, and such as made them miserable, they tearing one another in pieces in the Peloponnesian, and other Wars, breaching nothing but rage, malice, and revenge against one another. Nothing of consequence did, or could they do against the Barbarians, as they accounted all besides themselves, till reduced under the Monarchy of Alexander they became instruments in his hands. Common danger engaged them against Xerxes, whose multitudes destroyed themselves; but had it not been for the meer wisdom of Themistocles, want of Order, of Government, and discretion, had ruined them all in departing into Peloponnesus, and foolishly applying themselves to the fortifying of the Isthmus. Though they several times assisted the Ionians in their rebellion, yet still at length were their endeavours defeated. Cimon indeed got several victories, and did notable exploits in a piratical way, but what effects produced they? The most that was effected at land was by Agessilaus, but he having not done much was recalled, for that many Cities having been allured with Persian Gold (which never failed to corrupt the Councils, overthrow the projects, and disturb the affairs of these petty States, by taking off the great Leaders of the rabble) had conspired against Sparta. But what great matters they could do against Monarchy appeared; in that, first Philip, then Alexander his son, and their Successors, easily subdued, and kept them under. As for their Colonies, each one usually followed the fortune of its Metropolis; little but tumults, banishments, and Massacres do we hear of, or of private mens getting the power over them, for that wanting rightfull, and successive Princes, they lay open to the cheats of their fellow Citizens. The particular cases of Coreyra, Samus, Syracuse, and others demonstrate this, and therewith the danger, and infirmity of Antimonarchical Government.

9. But in particular, such were the several constitutions of these Cities, that Aristotle himself liked none of them, as appeareth in his books of Politicks. The Cretian Commonwealth had its extravagancies, and if a Government may be judged from the carriage, and disposition of the people, in the opinion of Epimenides one of their own Poets, it was most naught. Lycurgus by taking away the just, and Hereditary power of the Kings of Sparta, and contrary both to nature and loyalty dissolving the Government of his Forefathers, made but way for many inconveniences in the too great power of the Senate, and otherwise; but especially for the tyranny of the Ephori, five fellows chosen yearly out of the rabble, who domineered with unparalleled insolence over all. Solon's constitution, after so many changes and alterations wherein no rest could be procured from the time they forsook Kingly Government, gave no such settlement, but that Pisistratus presently after cheating the rabble over and over, very easily made himself Master of Athens. Their Ostracism frighted all able persons from meddling with the Commonwealth, as also did the Petalism of Syracuse; whereupon their affairs went down the wind, till they were forced to recall the banished, and change still from one constitution to another, never being at quier, for that the multitude tyrannized in their assemblies. As for the learning of the Greeks whereof they so much boasted, they had it either from the Egyptians or Caldæans who were subject to, and from the beginning flourished under, Monarchy: and Pisistratus who was a Monarch (though of his own making) made the first Collection of books, and thereby brought learning into Athens and Greece. Finally, the Greeks in their Wars were forced to make use of single persons; and at home in their greatest necessities did they fly to them, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus mentioneth the Harmostes of Lacedæmon, the Archus of the Thessalians, and the Æsimones of the Mitylenæans, whom he compareth with the Dictator of the Romans.

10. For the Romans, 'tis a meet mistake of Agrippa. Their affairs never more

more prospered than under Monarchy, if we consider the small beginnings of the City. Romulus did exceeding much for his time, and so did his successors in their several wayes, with so small a power as such a Colony could produce, insomuch as revengeful and furious Brutus acknowledged, that no better way of Government could be found out than what they had chalked out to them. The faults in it seem to have been his something too much indulging at his first constitutions a popular humour which might bring him to his end afterwards. Then Servius to curry favour with the rabble, that they might maintain him in his illegally procured power, diminished the Regal authority, and that of the Senate, which gave the multitude such a scope, as after could they not be reduced into any order. After him Tarquinius the heir of Priscus might go about to recover this power (for, a little charity may be allowed us, for one who lived in so dark and remote times, and whose actions were onely recorded by his Enemies, seeing we have formerly related his story as we find it) and thereby might incur that prejudice which, together with the fault of his son, and the implacable malice of Brutus, procured his banishment. This may be added as an ill accident, that Romulus dying childlesse, the Kingdom came to be elective, which thing must at length bring great inconveniences; so that experience now hath taught such Kingdoms to continue the Government to particular Families. But Brutus his giving to his Consuls full regal power (though they were two, and Annual) and putting the sword fully into their hands, together with his acknowledgement of the good government of all the former Kings, do more than make us suspect his spleen to have acted him most in the change of the power, especially the consequences considered. For, the power of the Consuls being shortly after diminished, or rather enervated by Valerius (who by flattering of the multitude got the name of Poplicola) the common sort got head, and confounded all things, nothing but changes, and re-changes hapening, till at length they quite outed the Patricians of their power, giving them leisure to repent their joyning with Brutus, and brought things to that ruine and disorder formerly mentioned, as compelled them to turn about, and by their Lex Regia (hereafter to be spoken of) to devolve all their power upon a single Person.

The disorders and tumults arising from their Antimo-
vernment.

11. Such and so many were these seditions and tumults, that thrice the common sort departed from the Patricians out of the City. And no sooner was the War against their King ended, but the stirs begun; and these very stirs have we proved from Dionysius, to have procured immediately the setting up of another King in effect, for half a year's continuance, viz. the Dictator, to which Officer they were forced to flye in all difficulties. Now it sufficiently appeared, that the want of a King hindered the promotion of their affaires, for, ever when any work was to be done abroad, nay when the Enemy was even at the gates, would the multitude mutiny, and with so much adoe at length could be drawn out, that businesse was retarded, and thereby their affairs not a little impaired, the Monarch being wanting, who should have kept both orders in subjection and awe. The weight of Usury and oppression was the first pretended cause of these stirs; but from it the multitude passed on from one thing to another, never resting till it had got all Offices of dignity, power, and profit, into it's own hands, as hath been at large made out. To effect this, they would one while have Consuls, and another while Tribunes Military, having formerly made Decemviri for the making of new Laws; so that within the space of 134 years, they had 37 changes in the Government, wherof (to make it clear) fifteen were from Consuls to Tribunes Military, and from Tribunes to Consuls, the two grand ones from Kings to Consuls, and from Consuls to Decemviri, and twenty Dictatorships, besides Interregnums many an one, whereby for five dayes the chief power was in the hands of their Interreges. Thus was the Government tossed to and fro by the multitude, and little was done abroad, by reason of these confusions, nay the City was taken by the Galls, and razed, all but the Capitol, through the cowardise of their Tribunes, who also being in number three or more, by their their several opinions confounded their Armies, and shewed the truth of that speech of Agamemnon in Homer. And this is worthy observation, that when the contention arose about the Consulship, which the Commons would have equally with the Patricians; so incredible were those confusions, that for five years the Tribuni Plebis (those great incendiaries) suffered no supreme Magistrates at all to be created.

Οὐκ εὖ γὰρ πολυκοιρανίη, ὦρε.

Great conquests were made by single persons.

12. All the great conquests afterwards were made by single persons, who abroad had alone the command of Armies. And so far was this present kind of Government from being instrumental to them, that it manifestly hindred and obstructed all good proceedings. For, when a Consul's year was out, then must he be recalled, and a successor sent him, though he was in never so fair a way for the conquering of any Nation, which at length began to be understood, and then was their command continued to them, under the name of Proconsuls, after which time it was, that the great matters were performed; before this the Generals being glad to shuffle up a Peace, lest they should be defrauded of the credit of ending the Wars by their successors. The main cause of the growth of their Empire (under the all-disposing Providence of God) was the valour and virtue of their Captains and Senators, at that time when Pyrrhus set upon them; the courage also of the Soldiers was extraordinary, so that (as Pyrrhus spoke of himself) a King, whose command and conduct would have been constant and uncontroled, might have done greater wonders with such men. But as for the Government, so far was it from contributing to justice or virtue, that, even in these times, which their Writers so celebrate for these things, the multitude having by the Hortensian Law wrested this power from the Senate, to oblige all whatsoever by their Plebi-scita, decreed aid to be sent to the Mamertines, though against all equity and conscience, the Senate having utterly refused to assist those thieves, murderers, intruders. But the multitude was told of great profit which would accrue to all men in particular, and therefore profit must bear down right, and forces must be sent into Sicily to get footing there, to enrich these vertuous and temperate men: and hence is to be fetched the rise of the Carthaginian Wars (which with what injustice they were managed on the Roman part, hath been seen) and indeed this was the original of all their conquests. The main things performed were done by such, as rather awed the people, than were awed by it, though to obtain their commands, they corrupted the multitude with money. Marius, Sylla, Pompey, and Caesar, after they had successively ingrossed the power, made the greatest conquests. After the overthrow of Carthage especially, scarcely any great command was obtained, but by some great promises under-hand, some new attempts of innovation, or money distributed to the Tribes. So weak, imperfect, and vicious was the Government.

Hence appeareth the excellency and necessity of Monarchy.

13. These things evidence the excellency of Monarchical Government above the rest; a necessity of it in any considerable Nation or Nations, and in Cities which extend the freedom of Suffrages to their Subjects or Associates, and are considerable, for number, power, and interest. Single Cities have for some time subsisted otherwise; but if we view those that have been mentioned in this Work, some of them we shall find to have been kept in that way by such strange discipline, and principles of equality and levelling, as are even repugnant to Nature, and destroy that lawful use of such things as were ordained for man's comfort and delight. Such was the constitution of that of Sparta, which yet secured it not from the tyranny of the Ephori, and when but the use of Gold, Silver, and other things, very lawful in themselves, came up, the Lacedaemonians were sensible of their slavery to such harsh constitutions, and the Government tortered. Again, in others that were left more to their liberty, we see how impossible it was for the People to use it, but for their own destruction; so that for any one place to subsist without such miseries and disasters, is near to a miracle. Monarchy, though it may have it's defects (as all things managed by meer men) yet in it self includes more order, certainty, and security, it's force being commonly turned outward. It's that which is most agreeable with primitive prudence, when men were not arrived at that ambition and wickedness, which later times have produced. All Nations at first had their Kings from the very first foundation, as is clear in the case of the Greeks, and others; so that they voluntarily submitted to them, at the first leading out of Colonies from the East, being their Captains; and thence we may see that the Government is natural, flowing from paternal rule, and proceeding from that superiority which Masters of Families, and Heads of Kindreds might well challenge over others. It's most suitable to the Government of the Universe, which is in God alone, who therefore acknowledgeth Kings for his Vicegerents, and calleth them gods, promising they should be nursing Fathers to his Church, and taking no notice herein of other Governments. Hence our Kings owe account to him alone, are Sacrosanct (which term the Romans gave to their very Tribunes who were inviolable, it being death to injure them in the least, and therefore we may well apply it to Kings) and that perpetually, and are intrusted by him with a Prerogative, which is necessary for the good of their Subjects. For all power flowing from them, it's contradictory for authority to challenge it self, as unnatural and violent, for a derived stream, to oppose the current of the Fountain.

And authority of it.

Mecenas his advice to Cæsar for the ordering of his affaires.

Magistrates of Senatorian dignity.

14. But (to return from this requisite digression, whereby an answer is given to Agrippa's arguments, and Students are directed to make the right and natural use of History) after that Mecenas had pressed Cæsar with these urgent reasons, to take the Government upon him, he gave him directions for the management of his affaires. First he advised him to regulate the Senate, placing and displacing according to the worth of persons; and to have a special regard to Nobility and Gentry, to gratify them with imployments. To admit none into the Equestrian rank before eighteen years of age, and none into the Senate till 25, before which time the Romans were never accounted of full age. When these had born the Offices of Quæstor, Ædilis, and Tribunas plebis, then being thirty years old, he would have them made Prætors, all which at first were to be Romans alone, lest he should seem suddenly to change the customs of his Country. All these Magistrates he would have of Cæsar's making, and not this power to be left in any case to the Senate, or People. He counselled him by all means to diminish their ancient power, which else might procure trouble and alteration; but leave them their whole honour and dignity. The way to this was to make them execute their Offices in the City, and not suffer them then, nor presently after, to have any Military command, but for some time to live privately. He would have these Magistrates, to celebrate games, and exercise judicial power in all cases, except that of murder; for some Judges were to be chosen from amongst the rest of the Senators, but the chief power to remain in these. Then he said, a certain Governour or Mayor of the City was to be made out of the most principal men, who had born these Offices, to joyn with the rest in governing the City, to receive appeals, and judge capital causes, except some afterwards to be spoken of, both in the City, and 31 miles round about. Another of the same rank was to be chosen, who should make inspection into the stock, estates and manners of Senators, and Knights or Equites, both those of under age and others, and as well of women as the other Sex, to correct such things, as being not worthy of punishment, yet being neglected might occasion great inconveniences; and refer the greater matters to Cæsar himself, who was to bear the name of Censor, and the other being a Patrician, and the next in dignity to the Mayor, but that of Subcensor. These two Officers might be, for life, except they committed some fault, or by old age or sickness were rendered unserviceable; for no damage could thence arise, the one having no Soldiers, and the other but a few, and who should execute his Office before Cæsar's eyes, for the most part. The other Magistrates, would fear to do any unjust thing, being presently to be reduced into a private condition, and others to succeed them in their power. He added, that the Provinces were onely to be committed to men of Prætorian rank; the rest being Proprætors in order once and again, should arrive at the Consulship, (if they well exercised their former Offices) and then be preferred to greater commands.

15. He further advised him to divide Italy, for 94 miles round about the City, and all the rest of conquered Countries after such a manner, according to People, Nations, and Cities, as if they were to be governed by single men with absolute power. In each of these Soldiers were to be placed, over whom was to be set one person of Consular dignity, and two more of Prætorian rank, from those there lying appeal to the other, in all cases, except when Officers of the Army were to be animadverted on, who were to be punished by none but Cæsar himself, lest they should thereby be brought by fearing some one more, to attempt something against the Prince. All those who had any command out of the City, were to have their salaries set as was suitable to the employment, for that they could not live of their own, and it was not convenient they should spend what they list, as they did at present. They were not to hold their employments under the term of three years, nor longer than five, for in so short a space they could but learn the interests of places, and how to behave themselves; and longer commands made men but proud, and provoked them to attempt new matters. And one great command he said, was not to be given them presently after another, for this would amount to as much, as if they had one continued to them; but after they had been reduced to a private condition, and therein lived at home. Thus much for Senators.

16. From amongst the Equites, he would have him chuse out two of the most excellent, and make them Captains of his Guard. For to commit that trust to one would not be safe, and to more than two, would not want trouble. Being two in number, if one should be treacherous, the other would preserve him. They were to be such as had been trained up in the Wars, and much exercised in Offices, and to have the command not onely of his Guard, but of all Soldiers in Italy, so as to punish and reward them, except Centurions, and such as belonged to Senatorial Magistracies. These Captains of the Guard ought to have their Deputies, and hold their places for their lives, as also the Mayor of the City, and the Subcensor. Besides, out of the next rank of Equites, one should be chosen for Captain of the Watch, and another to take care for provision of Corn, but these for a limited time. The care of the Treasury, Exchequer, and other matters, as well at Rome as throughout Italy, was to be committed to those of Equestrian rank, who were to have salaries suitable to their condition, being poorer than Senators. He told him the reason why he would have these Offices committed to them, was, for that it was inconvenient to have both the sword and money in the same hands, and better that publick businesse should be managed by many, both that more might reap benefit from it, and learn experience; and hereby his Subjects would love him more, and he would have a sufficient number fit for employment. One Eques would be sufficient at Rome for gathering money, and one in each Province, who might have assistants out of the Equites, and Cæsar's Liberti or Freed-men. For he told him it was convenient to joyn those with them, that his servants might get something, and he receive certain intelligence how matters should go. Now if any Eques (or Knight, if we may so call him) should grow so famous by businesse, as to be thought worthy to be received into the Senatorial rank, his age ought not to be any obstacle: and sometimes some Officers of the Army were to be received into the Senate, provided they had never been ordinary Soldiers, but from the beginning Centurions at the least.

17. He further advised him to educate all of Senatorial and Equestrian rank, whilst they were boyes, at School in humanity, and when grown up, in fencing and riding, by Masters hired publickly in both places. Forasmuch as it is the part of an excellent Prince, not onely that he do well himself, but to take care that all else do so. This would be effected, not by permitting them to do ill, and then correcting them, but teaching them beforehand such things. And he added, that he needed not to fear, that such as were so excellently educated, would attempt innovation; forasmuch as such as were not cultivated by any discipline, but dissolute in breeding and carriage, were heretofore to be suspected, who easily would commit the most wicked and abominable things, both against themselves and others.

The Militia and money.

18. Forasmuch as by reason of the largeness of the Empire, and nearness of Enemies, it was necessary to have a standing Army, he would have levies made out of the purest and lustiest young men, who being continually exercised and trained up in Military discipline, all others were to be forbidden the use of Arms. Then for money, which he shewed to be necessary for carrying on of affaires, in all Governments, as well as under Monarchy, he advised him to make money of all publick things gotten in War, and let it out upon moderate interest: to look well to the Mines, and impose Tribute upon all Subjects, it being reasonable that all should contribute to the expense of that, which tended to the protection and good of all. But there was no danger he said, but men would be willing to pay, seeing most of them should receive it back with advantage; either, by bearing Offices of Magistracy or Government, or serving in the War, especially when they understood that Caesar himself lived soberly and frugally, not improving the publick expence to any private excess.

adorned.

19. For the rest, he would have him adorn Rome with all magnificence, and set it out with all sorts of solemnities, to make it in great reverence and esteem abroad. No Nation was to have any power in its own hands, nor meet in any publick Assemblies of debate, for that would procure disturbance, for which reason neither was the Roman People, he said, to be permitted either to come together for passing of Judgement, to the Comitia, or any other Council, for the enacting of any thing. No City or People was to be suffered to use any excess in buildings or in games: none to use any peculiar coin, weight, or measure. None were to send any peculiar message to him, except the matter required his inspection, but have recourse to the Governor of the place, who was therewith to acquaint Caesar. Ambassadors either from Enemies or confederate Kings or States, were to have audience from the Senate, that the power seeming to be in the Senate, they might see how many Enemies they should have if the case so required, and matters being dispatched by consent of the Fathers, the Majesty of the Empire would be the more established. All of Senatorian rank he would have impeached before, and judged by the Senate, that Caesar might escape the envy of condemnation, and others by so formal proceedings, might be kept in awe. As for any scandalous words against himself, he told him he should neither hear any accusation, nor punish them. For it was not good, he said, that he should believe, that any one would injure him, who hurt nobody, but did good to all; for, saith he, bad Princes onely do this, whom their guilty consciences make credulous. Neither is it fitting to take those things ill, which if true ought not to have been done, and if false should be neglected and dissembled: for that many by punishing them, minister greater occasion of worse discourse. His sense therefore of scandalous words was this: that he ought to be higher than all injury, and neither himself to fancy, nor make other believe, that any one durst be so lawcy, but that the same opinion of veneration was had of him, as of the eternal gods. If any plotted his destruction, he would neither have him himself to judge, nor sentence him, but refer him to the Senate, and if he were convicted, to punish him as lightly as might be, that his crime might gain belief. But he here excepted such, as having command of Armies, made open insurrections, who were not to be formally arraigned, but punished as Enemies.

How Traitors
to be punished.

The Senate
so be made use of.

20. These things, and most of the rest which concerned the Commonwealth, he would have him propound to the Senate, wherein all the members

bers should have equal power of voting, except any of them were accused. If the party indeed were not as yet a Senator, or but of the rank of a Quaestor, all might have voices; but it was against reason that he, who never had been a Tribune of the People, or Edile, should passe sentence upon him that had born these Offices, or that those should do it upon one of Pratorian rank, or such an one upon a Consular person: but it was fitting enough that those of Consular Dignity might judge all the several sorts, and the rest their equals or inferiours. Caesar himself was to be Judge in all Appeals made from the greater sorts of Magistrates, his Procurators, the Governour of the Citie, Subcensor, Chief Justices, Overseers of Provisions or Proveditors, and Masters of the vatches: for none ought to have so absolute a power, but that appeal ought to lie from him. Of these he ought to take Cognisance, as also of the causes of Equites, Centurions, or prime Officers, when the controversie is about life or reputation. For these Cases ought to be referred to him alone, and for the fore mentioned causes none other ought to Judge them. Yet to the hearing of them he might nominate some of the principal men of Senatorial or Equestrian rank, or of Consular, or Pratorian Dignity, that he and they having had hereby experience one of another, he might imploy them in other matters abroad. In the Cases of greatest consequence he would not have him ask their opinions openly, lest favouring their friends they might not speak freely their minds; but their opinions were to be written down, and then presently blotted out, which secrecy would procure them to use all freedom. He advised him in his affairs of Causes, Letters, business of Cities, and Petitions of private men, and in other things of Government, to use the assistance of the Equites. To refuse to hear no mans advice, and to look at the Will, and not at the successe, both of Councillors and Soldiers; as, neither, to envy the glory of military men. For, many fearing the envy of Princes and States, have rather chosen to lose than gain in the Wars, to provide for their own safety. Wherefore he would not have him (whom especially the event, either as to profit or disprofit would concern) in word others, and indeed, to envy himself.

In what Cases Appeals ought to lie to Caesar.

Military men not to be envied.

Rules for Caesar's General carriage.

Deserving persons rather to be rewarded above than below their merits.

21. He desired him speak and do such things, as he would have his Officers to think and practice, for this would more easily teach them their duty, men being led more by example than precept, and the actions of Princes being especially pried into, and more imitated than their threatnings feared. The lives of others he should look into, but not greatly enquire: what Crimes by others were detected he ought to punish, but dissemble such as had no accuser, and know how to correct mildly, which in some cases doth more good than rigorous proceedings. Then as for rewards, he told him, he was to require deserving persons rather above than below their merits; for this was the way to win upon them, and to make them virtuous. He then advised him not to admit of any extraordinary honours from Senate or others, for this would be needlesse, chargeable, and dangerous. He bade him by virtue seek for immortality, not by Temples built unto his name. The gods he told him he was ever, and all over to worship, according to the custom of his Countrey, and compel others so to do: and to punish Authors of strange religions, not onely for reverence to his gods, but also because such things draw men to the use of forein customs, whence conspiracies, and bandyings arise, which are no whit agreeable with the Government of a single person. Neither was he to suffer any Magicians, and to have a care of Philosophers also, who by their foretellings often raised Seditions. He was to be studious of peace, content with present enjoyments, and yet to be ready for War upon all occasions. Though he must use Intelligencers and Spies; yet he ought not to be too credulous, and not indulge his servants, or Dependents too much, for all their failings would be impured to him. He was to fight inferiour and private men, encourage arts, and profitable occupations, as to punish idle, and vicious persons; not to suffer contentious, or animosities to grow, nor peculiar names to be assumed, med, nor any other thing whence discord might arise. He was to keep an equality in his granting requests as much as could be; and therefore not to suffer any to ask him what he should not grant; but to endeavour that none should petition for any thing forbidden. In sum, he advised him never to abuse his power, and not to think this a diminution of it, if he did not do all that he might: but by how much the more he could do what he would; by so much to take care to will all things that became him. He bade him alwayes consider whether he did well or ill: whether by such an action he procured love or ill will, that he might do and forbear accordingly. He told him, that though he heard no body blame him, yet ought he not to conclude, that therefore he did well; nor to expect that any should be so mad as openly to upbraid him. This no man would do, though most extremely injured. Nay, many, saith he, are constrained openly to commend those by whom they have been wronged, lest they should be thought to blame them. But 'tis the duty of a Prince not to guesse at the affections of others from their words; but from those things which 'tis most probable that they think of.

his advice.

22. These, and other like things he would have him do; for many things he said he passed over, because all could not be spoken at the same time. One thing he would say, which was the sum of all, either said or to be said. If he would do all those things, which if he were a subject he would have his Prince do to him, he should in nothing offend, prosper in all things, and lead both a safe, and most happy life. For how could not all but look upon him, and love him as a father, and preserver, when they should see him modest, of unblameable life, and excellent both in Peace and War; when he should neither disgrace nor injure any one, but carry himself humbly: not exact money from others, whilst he himself flowed with wealth; not afflicting others whilst he was luxurious; not punishing others whilst he himself was loose and licentious; but in all things as it were sharing with them? Therefore relying on that defence which would be great in thy self if thou hurtest no man; believe me, saith he, thou wilt have no body, neither hate thee, or devise any thing against thee, which being so, thou must needs lead a pleasant life. For, what can be more sweet, what more happy, than for one with virtue to enjoy all humane good things, and to be able to confer them upon others? In conclusion, those, and other things heretofore spoken being considered, he bade him yield to him, and not contemn Fortune, which had preferred him, picked out from amongst all others, to be chief. Now, if taking in reality to himself alone the Sovereign power, he feared the name of a Kingdom as odious he might omit that, and order his matters under the other of Cesar: if he desired other titles they would give him that of Imperator, heretofore given to his father: they would adorn him also with some other venerable note of honour, so that he might enjoy all the Privileges of a Kingdom without the envied name thereof.

23. Meccius concluded with these words, whose advice Cesar followed, though he greatly commended them both, for wisdom, copiousness, and freedom of speech: yet he did not presently set upon all those things which he offered, lest if on a sudden he should attempt to change the constitution of the State, he might fail in his endeavours: therefore some things he changed out of hand, other afterwards: and some things he left to be perfected by his Successors, which he thought might be better settled through the advantage of time and opportunity. He used also the industry of Agrippa in the prosecution of these designs no lesse than if he had advised him to this course. In this same year, and his fifth Consulship, he took the name of Imperator; not in that sense wherein anciently it was wont to be given for victories obtained (for so he had it given him often both before this and after) but in respect of chief Command, or Authority, as it had been decreed to his father Julius, and his sons, and posterity. Then was he made Censor with Agrippa, and amongst other things belonging to that Office, purged the Senate, into which which many Equites and unworthy Plebeians had crept during the Civil Wars; and increased it to the number of a thousand. Two persons, viz. C. Cnilius and C. Furius he put into the rank of Consulares, because being designed Consuls they had been prevented by others. He also ranked certain families amongst the Patricians, because most of those had perished in the Wars. He commanded that no Senator without his leave should passe beyond Italy, which is at this day observed, saith Dio, it being unlawfull for any of that rank to travel, except into Sicily, or Gallia Narbonensis, whither any that have Estates in those Provinces may go without leave, because those Countreys are in quiet, and destitute of Arms. Caesar also considering that many Senators and others trusted him not, lest they should attempt new matters, he gave out that he had burned all the Letters found in Antony his Coffers: and indeed some of them were lost, but most of them he very carefully kept, and afterwards made use of them as he had occasion. He sent for Antiochus Commagenus, who had treacherously killed his brother, sent on an Embassy to Rome, and put him to death, being condemned by the Senate.

24. Caesar in his sixth Consulship, together with M. Agrippa his Colleague made a Lustrum 41 years after the last Celebration of one (by Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius) and herein were cessed 4063000 Polls of Roman Citizens. He celebrated Games also, which had been decreed in memory of his victory at Actium, and it was ordered they should be renewed every fifth year, four Colleges of Priests taking care of them, viz. the Pontifices, Augurs, Septemviri, and Quindecimviri by courses. He caused other sorts of Games and Exercises to be made at his own cost, borrowing money; ordered that two persons of Praetorian rank should yearly oversee the Treasury, gave to the people four times as much Corn as they were wont to have, to some Senators he gave money, some of this rank being so poor, that they could not bear Offices belonging to them. All engagements and debts to the Exchequer he made void that stood good before the battel at Actium, except what concerned buildings. He suffered no sacrifice to be offered to Egyptian gods within the Pomarium, took also care for repairing of Temples. And because many unjust things had been ordained during the late Seditions and Civil Wars, especially in the Triumvirate, he made them all void by one Edict, and caused them to cease from his sixth Consulship. Being in the eyes and mouths of all for these things, he considered how he might increase his reputation, and confirm his single power by the consent, and without the constraint of the people. Being then Consul the seventh time, when he had prepared every Senator before-hand, whom he knew to be well affected towards him, he came to the Senate-house, and there read a set speech which he had written down firly for this purpose.

Maketh a Lustrum.

Preending in a set speech to the Senate, a desire to lay down his power.

25. 'Herein he first exceedingly magnified with much affected art, the things he was about to do, and then signified, that though he had such opportunity to establish himself as no man ever had more, yet did he now devest himself of all power, & restore all unto them, Arms, Laws, and Provinces: and not onely such things as he had been untrusted with, but he gave them besides what he himself had further acquired. This then his gift he much illustrated by his self denial, shewn as well formerly as at present, being very sorry that ever there had been occasion for the Commonwealth to use him. He spake of the justice and prudence of this resignation, and boasted of the glory of it, which he avowed to exceed the Conquests of Gall, Mysia, Egypt, or Pannonia, the victories over Pharnaces, Juba, or Phraates, the expedition into Britain or the passage of the Rhine, and all the difficulties of the Civil Wars. He demanded if any could be found that excelled him in greatnesse of mind, who had so many Cities, Nations, and Soldiers at his back, and whom none durst oppose? Horatius, Mucius, Curtius, Regulus, and the Decii, who ventured their lives for glory were not comparable to him, for as much as by this resignation he exceeded both them, and all others in glory. And shewed hence that the gallantry of spirit found in the ancient Romans was not extinct. Having discoursed much in this vein, he concluded with his advice to the

the Senate how to manage publick affairs, telling them, that if they followed it they would be happy and thankful to him, who rescuing them from seditions, had brought them into that estate: but if they did not punctually observe it, they would make him repent of what he had done, and cast themselves again into manifold Wars, and great dangers.

26. Cæsar having read his writing, the minds of the Senators were marvellously affected. Some there were who knew his design, and therefore agreed with him; the rest either suspected his intent, or believed him. Of these some admired his craft in concealing his purposes; others were troubled at his design: some at his cunning; and others at his refusal of the Government. For there were some who hated the Popular form as turbulent, and approving of the change, were well pleased with Cæsar's administration. Yet the product of these several affections was the same; for neither they that believed he spake as he thought, could rejoyce; those that wished he were reduced to a private condition, being yet fearful how things would go; and they that desired he might keep his power, being sorry for the losse of their hopes. Neither could they that believed him not reprehend him, because to some will, and to others courage was wanting. No man yet, whether he believed him, or believed him not, durst commend his speech, for that some liked it not, and others feared to do it. Wherefore having often interrupted him whilst speaking, when he had done, they all besought him with many words, that he would alone undertake the Government, and by many arguments compelled him at length to accept of the Sovereignty. Then that his person might be preserved, they presently decreed the pay of his Guard to be double to that of other Soldiers.

Divideth the Principalities bethixt the Senate and himself.

27. Cæsar by this artifice pretending that he would lay down his power, effected that it was confirmed to him, by Senate and People. Yet that he might seem to be Popular, he said, he would not govern all the Provinces, nor obtain perpetual power over such as he should take care of; therefore the weaker, because they were more quiet, he left to others: the most powerful which had appearance of most danger (having an Enemy near at hand, or likely to be turbulent) he kept himself, under pretence that the Fathers might enjoy their power safely, and he himself undergo labour and dangers; but by this device he rendred the Senate really helpless, and weak, and engrossed to himself the Militia. To the Senate and People was left Africk, Numidia, Asia, Greece, with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete, Libya called Cyrenaica, Bithynia, with the neighbouring Pontus, Sardinia, and that part of Spain called Hispania Belica. Cæsar kept the rest of Spain, all Gall and Germany, as also Cælesyria, Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Egypt. Over these Provinces he assumed the Government but for ten years, within which time he undertook to reduce them into order, adding with a certain juvenile kind of boasting, that as soon as ever he could quiet them, he would quit his power. Then did he set over the Provinces of both sorts, men of Patrician dignity, but over Egypt one of Equestrian rank onely, for the causes above rehearsed. To Senators he allotted by themselves Africk and Asia; and the rest of the Provinces to Prætorians. He forbad either to take this employment within five years after they had born Offices in the City. They held their Governments but for a year. And as soon as successors were sent them, they were presently to depart the Provinces, and not loiter in their return, but come to Rome within three moneths. The distribution of the Provinces was made on the Ides of January, as may be gathered from Ovid, who thought also that Cæsar Octavianus had the Surname of Augustus given him the same day, which indeed was the fourth day after, as appeareth from Censorinus.

28. For, the Provinces being divided, and all things settled, it was debated in the Senate, whether he ought not to be called Romulus, because he had founded the Empire; but the other more venerable name of Augustus, propounded by Munacius Plancus, at length seemed best; for, sacred places and Temples consecrated by Angurs the Romans termed Augusta. Cæsar

Sirnamed

far though he much desired that of Romulus (saith Dio) yet perceiving he should be suspected of affecting the Kingdom, omitted it, and was sirnamed Augustus, as greater than the nature of man could make him. For those things are called Augusta, which are most worthy of honour, and most sacred; wherefore the Greeks expresse it by Σεβας, as if thou shouldst say Venerable. Thus Cæsar alone got the whole power into his hands, having both money (for though he had his own separate from the Treasury, yet did he use this at his pleasure) and the Militia in his own hands. When his ten years were out other five, and when they were expired five more, and these ended, ten more, and ten more after them were added; so that he had his authority still continued for his life; for which cause his Successors, though they had the power setled on them for life, yet at the end of every ten years, solemnized as it were the renewing of it. As soon as Cæsar had but made his Oration about resigning his command, and distributing the Provinces, many honours were conferred on him, as that Laurel should be planted before his gates in the Palatium, and upon those trees Oaken garlands hung, as for him who was a perpetual Conquerour of Enemies, and preserver of Citizens. The house of the Emperour also was wont afterwards to be called the Palatium or Palace; not for that it was ever so decreed; but because Cæsar lived in the Palatium or Palatine hill, and there was his Prætorium; his house also received some dignity from the Mount it self, because Romulus there lived: therefore though the Emperour, saith the Historian, live elsewhere, yet is his house called the Palatium or Palace. But after he had done those things which he promised, then was he called Augustus by the Senate and People. From this day forward began the sovereign power and authority to be in the hands of one man, which the Greeks called Monarchy. Yet the Romans derived the Epoche of their Augusti from the Kalends of January of this year, as Censorinus writeth, who compareth with the 265 year of this Æra, the 283 of the Julian ordination. This seventh Consulship of Augustus Cæsar, and the beginning of his Monarchy, fell out in the 727 year of the City, the second of the 188 Olympiad, the thirteenth of Herod the Great, 25 before the birth of Christ, A. M. 3978, he himself, as it's said, the seventh, and M. Vipsanius Agrippa the third time being Consuls.

Senate and People transferred upon him.

29. On this manner all the power of the People and Senate was transferred upon Augustus, saith Dio. For this notable translation and change in the Government there was a Law made, which is famous by the name of Lex Regia, after which it's convenient to make a little enquiry, for the better information of Students in this great affair. A Law may be so (and is so) called, either for that a King made, or preferred it, or because it was made and enacted concerning a King or Kingly power. In the first sense, such Laws as were made by Romulus and his successors the ancient Kings of Rome, are by Lawyers called Leges Regia, whereof Dionysius Halicarnassensis hath recorded many, and of which several have been already mentioned in their due places; and in the (a) Code is yet extant a Law called Lex Regia, concerning the burial of a woman with child, so called, because enacted by some ancient King. But in the later acception is to be understood this Law, whereby Regal (and that absolute) power was conferred upon Augustus by the Roman People. The Law it self is not now extant in terms; nor exemplified in any Author still remaining, yet it is mentioned by Justinian in his (b) Institutions of Law, who there writeth (speaking of several sorts of Law) that what pleaseth the Prince, hath the vigour of a Law; forasmuch as by the Lex Regia, which was made concerning his power, the People granted to him, all it's command and authority. In the (c) Pandects he also mentioneth it, well-nigh in these very words; in a third (d) place also expressing it to the same purpose, that by an ancient Law called Lex Regia, all the right and all the power of the Roman People was translated into the Emperours authority: therefore it is otherwise called Lex Imperii, and Augustum privilegium. As for Commentators upon both Institutions and Pandects, with other parts of the

By a Law

Civil Law, nothing is more acknowledged by them all, as they have occasion.

A different manner of expounding it.

The Reason.

30. But as for the interpretation of this Law, some difference there hath been amongst Expositors, who lived since the Civil Law was restored in the West. For some there have been ever since that time, who rightly understood all manner of power and authority, to be so by the Roman People transferred upon the Prince by that Law, that they affirmed the People thereby deprived and made destitute of all power and authority. Others thought power and authority indeed was given to the Prince to make Laws, but so that by this concession the power of the People was in no sort diminished, and the force of Plebiscitums and Senatusconsultums, as well future as past, was the same as formerly; so that Prince, People, Senate, and Commons, had equal authority in this matter: both these opinions being held, as appeareth from Accursius, Hostiensis, and others. But the later of them seemeth thence to have risen, that they mistook this Lex Regia (called also corruptly Lex Remmia) for the Hortensian Law, or rather thence, as a late (a) learned man judgeth, that the Professors and Students of the Civil Law, which was newly restored, were fearful, lest by asserting the true power of the Emperours, they should give offence to such People and Cities, as then lived in a course contrary to such a prerogative, and thereby injure their newly restored profession. And hence might that most known controversie arise, concerning the power of the Prince, from this Law, betwixt the Martinians and Bulgarians. But as for that conceit about the Hortensian Law, it was enacted by Q. Hortensius the Dictator, in the 468 year of the City (not the 422, as that same learned man hath it) and the 284 (not the 330) before the birth of Christ, upon the third separation of the Commons, and 259 before the enacting of the Regal Law. The purport of it was, that all Quirites or Romans should be bound by the Plebiscita, or the Decrees of the People. Hence, as we formerly observed out of Pomponius, concerning the Original of the Roman Laws, the authority of making Laws was the same, though the fashions differed, although the same thing in effect, was done long before the Hortensian Law, viz. by L. Valerius and * M. Horatius the Consuls, who got it enacted by a Law in the Centuriata Comitia, that what the Commons resolved on in their Tribes, or Tributa Comitia, saith Livy, but in their Curia or Curia Comitia, saith Dionysius, should bind the whole People, which thing we having formerly omitted in it's own place, here supply, having yet * observed, that a Law was also preferred by Q. Publius Philo the Dictator, 111 years after the other, to the same purpose, and 211 before the Lex Regia.

* Lib. 2. c. 4. sect. 2. par. 46.

The Hortensian Law strangely wrested by some.

31. Now strange it is, that Accursius and others, should wrest any thing of the Hortensian Law, and apply it to the Lex Regia, or rather make them all one, as he doth, expounding the Regia thus; Scil. lata ab Hortensio mirabili Oratore, although he acknowledgeth, as necessarily he must, that the Hortensian Law made onely expresse mention of the power of Senate and Commons. It's not easie to guesse what he meant by so strange a conceit; but this interpretation is made of it by * one as able to judge as any, that as the Hortensian Law concerning Regal Right, that is, the Right of Regiment or Government, gave to the People and Senate (of which two orders or estates then the Roman body politick consisted) equal power and authority; so when the Prince came to be joyned as a third party, in like manner an equal power should be granted to him, as to the other two, and that from the sence of the same Law. And those of this opinion interpret Justinian (who saith concerning the Plebiscita, that from the Hortensian Law they began to be of no lesse value than Laws, and also the same of the Senatusconsulta; that because the People was so increased, that it could not easily meet together for making of Laws, that therefore the Senate was consulted) as though the same power remained to Senate and People still under the Emperours as before. They strangely disputed also, whether the power so granted by the People to the Emperour, might not be revoked, as that which is given to sus, admit persons into the Equestrian or Senatorian rank, and remove thence according to their pleasure. And in as much as they are inaugurated in all Priesthoods, admit Priests into the Colleges, and ever one of them (if there be two or three Emperours at one time) is Chief Priest, it is that they may have all religious things and sacred in their own hands. As for the Tribunitial power, which every eminent Emperour was wont to have, it enableth them to interpose against any thing that may be done contrary to their pleasure, and they are thereby Sacrosanct, or Inviolable, so that if any one injure them by the least, not onely deed, but word, they may put him to death without processe as Piacularly Criminal. The Emperours count it unlawfull to be Tribunes, because they are Patricians, but they receive Tribunitial power as large as ever any enjoyed; and as renewing it yearly with the annual Tribunes, the years of their reign or power, are counted accordingly. These things, as they were established in the Popular Government, do the Emperours, together with the names, take unto them, that they may appear to have nothing but what was freely conferred on them.

34. But they have another privilege (so Dio proceedeth) which never was universally granted to any Roman. For the Emperours are loosed from the Laws; by which thing alone liberty is given them to do those which we have related, and all other things. After this manner, with these names which were used in the Popular State, they receive all the power of the whole Commonwealth, and the Kingly also, shunning onely the name. For, the titles of Caesar and Augustus add nothing of peculiar power unto them: but the one signifieth the succession, and the other the splendour of their Dignity. As for the name of Fathers, though it giveth them such right over their subjects, as Parents have over Children; yet at first it was given onely for honour, and to admonish them to hold their Subjects as dear as Children, and these them as Parents. These are the titles which the Emperours according to the Laws and Customs use even in our dayes and in our age, all these are at the same time given to them, except that of Censor; but in times past they were severally according to the Laws decreed to them. The name also of Censor, some of them according to the ancient custom have received, and Domitian bore it all his life; but now it is not so. For, the Emperours of our time having the thing it self, are neither chosen to the Censorship, nor bear the name of the Office, except during the Censur. But * thus the Commonwealth was changed an Attestation to that truth we formerly asserted against Agrippa.

35. The same night that Caesar received the surname of Augustus, a considerable sign (as it was accounted) of his confirmation hapned. For Tiber so overflowed, that all the lower parts of Rome were Navigable, which the Fortune tellers interpreted to signifie his great advancement, and that he should have the whole Citie in his power. Now many sought to flatter him, but the indeavours of Sextus Pacuvius (or Apudius) exceeded all, who being Tribune of the People, after the custom of the Spaniard, consecrated himself to him, and caused others to do so. Having now obtained the Government by consent of the people, he set himself more effectually to look after it, and made several Laws. Yet did he not all on his own head, but propounded many things to be debated in publick, that if any were displeased he might amend them: he desired all, freely, and openly, to deliver their opinions, and being moved by their reasons changed something: but he especially de-desired to be advised by the Consuls, or his Colleague, if he himself bore that Office. Of the other Magistrates he made choice of one out of each sort, and out of the Senate fifteen chosen by lot, who were for six months to be his Counsellors; that hereby he might seem to communicate his designs to the rest. Some things he brought down to the whole Senate; but he thought it fitter to consult with a few persons at leisure about the greatest affairs. He called also these men sometimes to decide causes: although the Senate still heard certain matters, and gave answer to the Ambassadors of Kings and States as formerly. Although the Comitia, or Assemblies of the People were sometimes held, yet nothing was done but according to the pleasure of Augustus. He partly named Magistrates, and left others to be created by the People; only taking care that no unworthy persons by indirect practices advanced themselves. This was the general course of Augustus his administration, saith Dio.

He reduced the Spaniards, and shutteth

second time.

36. The year following Augustus made an expedition into Spain, which never had been well quieted since the Romans first set footing there; but now the Cantabrians and Asturians were not onely ready to defend their own liberty, but endeavoured also to lay the yoke upon their neighbours. Yet he reduced, and brought all under, and being then at Tarrason, came Ambassadors from India to beg his friendship. Returning home, he shut the Temple of Janus the second time, having formerly so done after his Triumph over Antony, and his return out of Egypt, which shutting was the third from the foundation of the Citie. But after his return out of Spain it continued not long shut. For Ælius Gallus made War against the Arabians, and piercing far into their Countrey, had subdued all Arabia Felix, but that he was betrayed. At the same time also Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, sent her Captains to invade Egypt, but they were repulsed by Petronius Governour of that Countrey (for Cornelius Gallus having bespattered Augustus, and for that being condemned by the Senate had killed himself) who also pursued them, and taking divers Towns, forced the Queen to beg peace, and returned enriched to Alexandria. Augustus some time after went into Greece, and thence into Syria, whither the Parthian now affrighted, sent the Ensigns taken at the overthrow of Crassus, and flight of Antony; and now again did the two Kings of India, Pandion, and Porus, send Ambassadors with presents. As he returned home, Virgil the Poet met him at Athens, who now out of a desire to finish his Æneidos had resolved to withdraw himself out of the way into Greece and Asia; but meeting here with Augustus, in whose especial favour he flourished, he was drawn back with him, and viewing Megara in a very hot season contracted a distemper, which was so much increased with sayling, that growing still worse, he died at Brundisium within a few dayes after his landing, in the 52th year of his age, on the 12th of September, and the 735th year of the Citie, C. Sextius and Q. Lucretius being Consuls.

37. Augustus his first wife was Scribonia, which had been married to two persons of Consular Dignity, and by one was a Mother. Of her he begat his daughter Julia, but within a short time divorced her, as he pretended, because of the perversity of her disposition. Then did Nero, who had followed L. Antonius to Perusia, but afterwards was reconciled, freely yield unto him Livia Drusilla, though he had had one son already by her, named Tiberius, and she was big with another, which being born three months after she had married Caesar, was called Drusus. By Livia, Augustus had no Children but abortive. His daughter Julia he married to Marcellus, his sister Octavia's son, and after his death to Agrippa, making him put away his wife, the daughter of Octavia; for in a consultation Mæcenat took the liberty to tell him, that he must either marry his daughter to Agrippa, or take away his life, there was no third way, he had made him so great. By Agrippa she had three sons, Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa Posthumus, and two daughters, Agrippina and Julia. The three sons were adopted by their Grand-father, but the two former died before, and the later was killed by Tiberius after:

Being sent into Pannonia (of which Hungaria is part) he killed the Natives by the rumour of his coming, and returning into Campania, died shortly after. Then was Tiberius compelled to marry Julia, although he had already to wife Agrippina the daughter of Agrippa. 38. The same year that Drusus died (by a fall from his Horse, as Livy wrote, who intended his History just so far) Augustus being High-Priest (which Office he took not upon him till the death of Lepidus) amended the Calendar, corrected formerly by his adoptive Father. For in those 36 years there had been made an intercalation of twelve dayes, whereas there ought to have been but of nine, therefore he commanded that the twelve years following should passe without any intercalation at all, that so the three dayes might be swallowed up. Now he named August after himself the moneth Sextilis, because in it he entered his first Consulship, and had the first ensigns of Victory and Power, rather than September wherein he was born. Not long after did Tiberius, rather by craft than force of Arms, again subdue the Germans, who maintained a most difficult Warre. After his Triumph he withdrew himself into the Island Rhodes, either because of Caius and Lucius, or by reason of the intolerable dishonesty of his wife Julia; for she was so abominably wanton, that her father at length banished her into the Island Pandataria, and very imprudently in his anger, revealed her naughty carriage in way of complaint to the Senate, of which indiscretion being afterward sensible, he would often say, that if either Agrippa or Mæcenas had lived, no such thing had hapened to him. 39. Agrippa, as we said, having quieted Pannonia, died after his return into Campania, in the 743 year of the City, three years before Drusus. Pliny telleth, that they were first called Agrippa, which were born with the feet forward, as if a man should say, born hardy, or with much adoe. And in this manner, (saith he) as they say, M. Agrippa came forth of his mother's womb, the onely man almost known to have brought any good fortune with him, and prospered in the World, of all that were in that sort born. Yet he was much pained with the Gout, and passed all his youth, and many a day after in bloody Wars, and in danger of a thousand deaths. Unfortunate he was in his children, and especially in his two daughters the Agrippine, who brought forth two children pernicious to the whole Earth, namely C. Caligula and Dominus Nero Emperours. He died in the 51 year of his age, tormented and vexed with the adulteries of his wife, and oppressed with the intolerable servitude in which he lived under her father. Four years after him, and the year after Drusus, died Mæcenas, the other favourite of Augustus, and the great Patron of Learned men. He was in as great grace with Cæsar as Agrippa, though lesse honoured: for he contented himself with the Equestrian rank; neither could he not obtain greater things, but he would not. He had great power with Augustus, which he improved to the allaying of his passion, and doing good offices for others, as one example shews above the rest. On a time, as Augustus sat in Judgment, and was about to sentence many to death, he perceiving it, and not able to come at him for the croud, wrote these words, Rise up at last Executioner, in a table, and cast them into Cæsar's lap as some other matter, who having read them, presently departed without condemning any. Neither did this offend Augustus, but he was glad that he had one who would be so free with him, and curb that arger, which either his inclination or the urgency of business moved him to. (a) Cilnius was the ancient name of his Family, and Arresium in the Tyrrhenian Coasts the place of it. (b) Pliny telleth strange passages A. M. 3993.

passages of him, as that he never was without an Ague, and for three years before his death, never slept a quarter of an hour together. In the same year (which was that wherein Augustus mended the Calendar, and called the moneth Sexilis after himself) Horace the Poet also died, in the 57 year of his age. His familiarity with Caesar and Mecenas is sufficiently known. His life is written by Suetonius.

40. Augustus having again quieted all Nations, and shut the Temple of Janus the third time; having ordained a general taxation throughout the Empire, that he might know the State and worth thereof; having also refused the name of Dominus or Lord with great earnestness, which he forbade even his Children and Nephews by an edict to use towards him, the Lord and Heir of all things came into the World, in the fulness of time, revealed by the Angel Gabriel to the Prophet Daniel, for the fulfilling of the promises made concerning the seed of the woman, which should break the serpents head. Great difference there is in assigning the year of the World wherein our Saviour was born, by reason of the difficulty of computation arising from the several versions of the Scriptures, the intricate and uncertain successions of the Judges, the variety of the forms of years, and the several reckonings as to parcels of such as are related in Scripture. A great help for the regulation of these things is afforded from prophane Histories. But it beginneth but with Cyrus, whose History, as to the restoration of the Jews, presenteth us with the first certain note of conjunction (he being so named both by holy and prophane Writers, but not Nebuchadnefar) and yet the duration of his reign is also uncertain. Yet as from all these opinions weighed together, a good account may be given in another place, more proper for the length of it, as to the year of the World, so the Evangelist teaching us, that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Christ was about thirty years old, it must needs follow, that Augustus reigned fifteen years after his birth; so that if we count (as some do) the reign of Augustus from the death of Julius Caesar, it lasted 57 years, and then must Christ be born in the 41 of it. But if we follow them (as the order of this Work doth) who with more reason fetch the beginning of his Empire from the death of Antony, and the conquest of Egypt, then Christ's birth fell into the 28 year thereof; and according to the computation which we most approve into the 4603 year of the World, the 752 of the City, and the third year of the 194 Olympiad, wherein Cæsar Augustus himself the thirteenth time, and M. Plautius Silanus were Consuls. Although Cyrenius (who was Consul ten years before, and is called elsewhere P. Sulpicius Quirinus) might not formally be President of Syria (which Office as others say, was now obtained by Quintilius Varus, who succeeded Saturninus, who as yet was not departed out of the Province) yet being set over this taxation by Augustus in that place, this title might well be given him, though he then governed Cilicia, as Herod is by Josephus said to be constituted Procurator of all Syria, though it had it's Officers, who were to act by his assistance and direction. Herod had now reigned 37 years and odd moneths, and being deluded by the Wise Men (whom he willingly suffered to search out Christ, that he might destroy him) killed all the children in and about Bethlehem of two years and under; which cruelty was but agreeable with his disposition and constant practice. Here, that we may describe his affaires, we must make a little digression, and take them where we formerly left them.

41. After he had obtained the possession of his Kingdom, he put to death 45 of Antigonus his friends, having procured him to be beheaded, as we formerly shewed. Then did he prefer to the High-Priesthood one Ananel an obscure man, neglecting Aristobulus the son of Aristobulus the King, and brother to his own wife Mariamme; and Antony desiring to see this youth, for the fame of his beauty, he fearing the Roman might advance him, to stay him at home, gave him the Priesthood, and excused his neglect to send him, by the inclination of the Jews to rebellion. Perceiving him then to be in extraordinary favour with the Jews, and that his mother Alexandra (which he kept very close because of her restless spirit) plotted the escape of her self and son into Egypt, a year after, as he was swimming, he caused him to be drowned, and though Cleopatra accused him hereof to Antony, yet by presents he made his Peace. In the Civil Wars he sided with Antony, who having forces sufficient, desired him to chastize the Arabians, that denied the Tribute imposed on them. This he did, and though at first his attempts miscarried, yet in another battel he quite overthrew and brought them under. After the overthrow of Antony, he had little hope that his own matters would go well. He murdered Hircanus, who onely survived of all the males of the Royal Family, and whom he had recalled from Babylon, whither he was carried by the Parthians. He took the advantage of the old man's intent to flye into Arabia, through the importunity of his daughter Alexandra, who promised him great things, if Herod should miscary under the power of Augustus. Then providing as well as he could for the worst, in case it should happen, he went to Rhodes to visit Caesar, from whom he concealed not the love he bore to Antony, but with notable courage declaring it, withall signified that he was ready to serve him as faithfully, which so wrought upon the magnificent Prince, that he liked him extremely, and confirmed him in his estate. After Caesar's return out of Egypt into Syria, he entertained him, and as he thereby procured the reputation of a noble and heroick spirit, so also an addition to his Kingdom. Yet was he unfortunate at home, having commanded several times, that if any thing hapened in his absence, they should make away his beloved wife Mariamne. She hearing of it used him frowardly, whereat being intraged, he was thoroughly perswaded to put her to death by his sister Salome, which envious woman feigned certain accusations against her. But after the deed was done, having extraordinarily loved her, he fell even mad, and thereby into a great sicknesse, so that casting off all Government, he departed to Samaria, then called Sebaste, in honour of Augustus.

42. Alexandra in the mean time endeavoured to get the strong places of Jerusalem into her hands, wherewith he being acquainted, ordered her to be put to death, and then returning to the City, grew exceeding cruel and distasteful. The prejudice was increased by his making Games in honour of Caesar, and hanging his Theatre with Trophies, which the People sorely distasted, as being by their Religion principled against Pictures. Ten men conspired against him, but were discovered and put to death. Not long after he redeemed his credit by liberality in a great dearth, and married the daughter of Simon, whom he preferred to the Priesthood, having displaced Jesus the son of Phabes. Then did he employ his time and treasure in sumptuous and royal buildings, as that of Casarea amongst the rest, formerly called the Tower of Straton; and he built a Temple to the honour of Augustus, who had again enlarged his Dominions, and bestowed a Tetrarchy at his desire upon his brother Pheroras. To the People, which was ready to mutinie, because of his idolatry, he released the third part of their Tributes to please them, forbad all their meetings, punished severely such as were obstinate, and bound the rest to him by an oath. After this, taking down the old Temple of Jerusalem, he built another much more stately and magnificent (being a Work of most admirable beauty) in the space of nine years and six moneths, during which time, it's said, that it onely rained on nights, lest the Work should be hindred. In the dedication he sacrificed 300 Oxen, and the rest of the People according to their abilities. He made a Law, that thieves which broke walls should be sold for slaves, out of the Kingdom. Which the People ill resented, as against their Religion, which not onely provided otherwise concerning thieves, but would be broken also by these men, who must necessarily serve Idolaters. Now he himself fetched from Rome Alexander and Aristobulus his sons by Mariamne, whom having sent thither to be bred, Augustus had kindly entertained. These youths were feared by Salome and Pheroras, as intending to revenge their mothers death, and therefore they resolved they must not live, especially she that was encouraged by the success the had had against their mother. And they presented her with an opportunity of accusing them, seeming indeed not to be well affected toward their father, desiring the Kingdom, and exclaiming greatly against the authors of their mother's death. Herod troubled hereat, called to Court Antipater his son, begotten when he was a private man, that opposing him against them he might make them more carefull of their behaviour. But thereby were they more incensed, and Antipater making use of his time got more and more into his father's affections, who commended him in especial manner to Caesar (though he had not a thought at first of making him his Heir) and sent him to Rome to procure the Emperour's favour.

43. Antipater improving his father's displeasure against his brothers, effected that he carried them to Augustus then at Aquileia, and grievously accused them of an intention to poyson him. Yet the young men by their tears, and Alexander's refutation of the calumny, so moved Caesar, that he reconciled them; and for that Herod had given him 300 Talents, and been very liberal, as his custom was to be in all places, unto the people of Rome, he bestowed on him half of the profits of the Mines in Cyprus, and gave him liberty to leave which of his sons he pleased his Successor, or if he would, to distribute his Kingdom amongst them all, which Herod presently would have done, but Caesar would not permit it. In his absence the Inhabitants of Trachonitis a considerable part of his Kingdom rebelled, and were reduced by his Captains. After his return he made a speech to the people, and named to succeed him first Antipater, and then his sons by Mariamne, which naming a Successor beforehand, when the inheritance is uncertain, hath ever wrought great inconvenience to both parties. After he had opened David's Sepulchre to search for Treasure, (as John Hyrcanus had done before him) where he found none except very costly Attire, and Ornaments of Gold, 'tis observed that his family fell into a very sad condition, nothing being heard but complaints & accusations one against another. The greatest part of Antipater's malice fell upon Alexander, and the Court hereby was filled with tortures and slaughters. Herod suspecting all, and trusting none, put many to death, and those of his most intimate friends, and committed Alexander to prison, being captivated by so great a fear of an untimely death, that he was almost ready to run mad. These things were diverted by the rebellion of the Inhabitants of Trachonitis (which Countrey Caesar, having taken it from Zenodorus, gave unto him) who again revolting, were protected by Syllaus an Arabian, that being to marry his sister Salome was rejected, because he would not turn Jew. Saturninus and Voluminus Presidents of Syria, resolved he might by force of Arms chastize these Rebels, whereupon he entred Arabia, and having formerly destroyed their families, which they left in their Corn Countrey, took a Castel they held there. Syllaus now being at Rome accused Herod unto Caesar, as having wasted all Arabia, and he so far believed it, that he twice denied his Ambassadors audience. The Rebels and Arabians hereupon did him much injury, which he was glad to put up for the present, but sent Nicholaus Damascenus to plead his cause.

44. He first joyned with the Ambassadors of Aretas King of Arabia, in accusing Syllaus, thence came to lay open his forgeries against Herod, to whom Augustus was thoroughly reconciled, and had given him Arabia too, but that he received from him other Letters, containing another complaint against his sons. For whilest he was thus out with Caesar, the former stirs were renewed in his house by means of Eurycles a Lacedemonian, who winding himself into Alexander's acquaintance, betrayed him first to Antipater, and then to Herod himself. He denied all accusations, except that he intended with his wife to fly to Archelaus King of Cappadocia her father; but Caesar being consulted, as we said, willed Herod to call a Council at Berytum with the Roman Presidents, Archelaus of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends and Nobility thereabouts, and do as he should be advised. He called all but Archelaus, and in an Assembly of 150 men declaimed most furiously against his sons, not producing any proof at all, further than that they intended to fly, and not suffering them to be present to answer for themselves ; He onely required the suffrages of the Assembly to countenance his private resolution, which the major part giving (though Saburninus and his sons gave an indifferent sentence) he acted by fury, and unnatural madnesse, caused them to be strangled at Sebaste. Antipater, after the death of his brothers, quickly plotted the destruction of his father, and for that he was hated by all men, procured some esteem by his gifts, and drew Pheroras into the conspiracy, to the issue of whom the Pharises promised the Kingdom. For refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, they were fined by Herod, to whose Kingdom they prophesied destruction, and happinesse to the family of Pheroras, because his wife payed their fine. Herod getting out these things by the means of Salome, put the principal of the Pharises to death, with others, and urged his brother Pheroras to put away his wife, which he refusing to do, he banished him his Kingdom. Pheroras then departing into his Tetrarchy, died shortly after, being visited by Herod, who buried him honourably at Jerusalem. Antipater standing in fear of his father, wrought by his Creatures at Rome to be sent for by Cesar. But this availed nothing ; for in his absence all came out, which confirmed Salome's words (to which the King in this matter had given but little credit, knowing her to be too free in accusations) and brought vengeance upon him, notwithstanding all his craft, for the murder of his brethren.

45. Pheroras his wife being accused of poysoning her husband, her maids were tortured, and in their pain gave some suspicion of the conspiracy, which was more cleared by one Antipater that had the ordering of Antipater's affairs, who confessed that his Master had compounded a poyson, and delivered it to Pheroras to be given to the King in his absence, and that it was kept by Pheroras his wife : She confirmed the same, declaring that the poyson was bought in Egypt by Antipater's procurement, that it was committed to her charge, and how, that when her husband was sick, and Herod came out of kindnesse to visit him, being overcome with his love he forbade her to give it him. Amongst the accessaries was Herod's own wife, the daughter of the High-Priest ; she was put away, her father deposed, and Mathias the son of Theophilus preferred to his place ; Herod also her son was put out of the Kings Testament, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to him after his death. In the mean time Bathillus the Freed-man of Antipater returning from Rome was tortured, and confessed that he had brought with him a poyson to deliver to Pheroras, wherewith the King might be certainly and speedily dispatched in case the other should fail. Antipater returned ignorant of these passages, for that almost every one was his Enemy, and before his father and Quintilius Varus, though he sought to cover his wickednesse, all things were made plain against him, whereupon he was committed to close prison. Shortly after Herod himself sickned, and became exceeding reasty and wrathfull, as well for these things as for that he thought the people was glad of his misfortunes, having at the instigation of the Doctors of their Law cut down an Eagle of Gold of great value that stood over the Portal of the Temple. But his sicknesse more and more increased.

He sickneth.

46. His disease was strange and fearfull. For he burned with an inward heat, which pierced and tormented him in his bowels. He was also vexed with a ravenous and insatiable appetite, and an Ulcer in his Entrails, with a strange and furious Colick. His feet were swoln with moisture, and a shining kind of slegm, his stomach being no lesse afflicted. His body rotted, and was full of crawling Worms, which afforded an intollerable stench ; besides, he was held with a filthy and troublesom Priapism, a strong Convulsion of his Nerves, and shortnesse of breath, being generally judged thus to be punished for his infinite impieties and sins committed against the Majesty of God ; & doubtesse his intention to kill Christ, with the innocent blood of the Infants cried loud. cholick humour seized on him, which rendred him unfociable, and displeased with all men. Perceiving now that he should die, and supposing that the Jews would much rejoyce in his death, he shut up many of the chiefest of them in the Hippodrome, and gave in charge to his sister Salome, and her husband Alexas, that as soon as he was dead they should cause them all to be killed, that a lamentation might accompany his funeral. Before his death he received Letters from Cesar, who gave him leave to deal with his son as he saw occasion. Antipater yet believing that he was dead, plotted how to escape and seize on the Kingdom, but his Jaylor with whom he dealt revealed it to Herod, who commanded one of his Guard instantly to kill him; and to such an end came he for the murder of his brethren, and the sad Tragedies he had raised in his father's house. Herod having attempted to kill himself, died some five dayes after his son, in the 72 year of his age, 27 after his getting possession of the Kingdom, and 29 after he had been declared King by the Romans; 'tis uncertain how long after the birth of Christ, but as is supposed not above two years, in the first of the 195 Olympiad, the 754 of the Citie, Cains Cesar, and L. Emilius Paulus being Consuls. Salome and Alexas before his death was throughly known, to their great honour discharged those that were locked up in the Hippodrome.

47. Herod not long before his end renewed his Testament, wherein he ordained his son Antipas Tetrarch of Galile and Perea, having before this appointed him his Successor in the Kingdom, for that he was incensed against Archelaus and Philip, by the means of Antipater. Now he made Archelaus King, gave the Province Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Peneade to Philip, left Salome very well, and gave great Legacies to Cesar and Livia his wife. Archelaus at first was much cried up by the people, but afterwards the multitude calling to mind the death of Maibias, and his Confederates whom Herod had slain for breaking down the Eagle, fell into a Sedition (many flocking out of the Countrey to the Passeeover) and demanded justice against divers of his Officers; but this tumult was settled by the slaughter of 3000 about the Temple. Then went Archelaus to Rome, not daring to take upon him the title without the leave of Augustus, to whose disposal his father had referred his Testament. Many followed, and spoke against him, being affected better towards Antipas, the Jews also sent their Ambassadors, with whom joyned 8000 of their Countrey-men then living at Rome, in a Petition to Cesar, that they might be joyned to Syria, and live under Roman Governours without any King. At length Cesar came to this resolution, to give half that Dominion, which Herod enjoyed, unto Archelaus, viz. of Idumaea, Judaea, and Samaria, with Casarea, Sebaste, Joppe, and Jerusalem: the other half he divided betwixt Antipas and Philip. The former had the Countrey lying on the further side of Jordan and Galile, with 200 Talents of annual revenue. Philip obtained Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis with 100 Talents. Archelaus had 500 Talents of yearly rent out of his Countrey. Whilest these things were in hand at Rome, grievous Seditions tore the Jews in pieces at home; for they being now destitute of a King, several took upon them that title, Sabinus, who superintended the affairs of Cesar there, gave the occasion, by pilling the people, which now at the feast of Pentecoste gathering together from all quarters, sought to shake-off that yolk. After great slaughters, at length all was quieted by the coming of Varrus from Antioch, who left the first Legion in Garrison at Jerusalem.

48. The succession being settled by Augustus, a young man, and a Jew, born at Sidon, counterfeited himself Alexander the son of Herod by Mariamne, affirming, that both he and Aristobulus were delivered by a friend, who had it in charge to see them executed, others being killed in their rooms. He deluded thousands of Jews inhabiting Melus, as also them at Rome, by whom he was received as their King. But he could not deceive Cesar, who made him confesse the forgery, and because he had promised him pardon, if he would acknowledge the deceit, for that he had formerly laboured with his hands, he condemned him to the Gallies, and put the man to death who had perswaded him to turn counterfeit. As for Archelaus, he tyrannized for ten years, and then being acculed by the Jews, Augustus sent for him to Rome, where his cause being heard, he banished him to Vien-na in Gall, and confiscated his goods. After this Cyrenius being sent into Syria to succeed Varus, valued the goods of each Inhabitants, and seized the estate of Archelaus. This cesse or valuation of their estates, gave occasion to a great Sedition, by the means one Judas a Gaulonite, Sodoc a Pharise, and his confederate, alleging that this description was no other than a manifest token of their servitude, and exhorting all to maintain their liberty, to no purpose. For Judea now having no more Princes of it's own, was governed by Deputies, of which Coponius being the first, was shortly after succeeded by M. Ambivius, and he by Annius Rufus.

49. Augustus (that we may return to Roman matters) adopted his two Grandsons Caius and Lucius, having got them to be called Principes Juvenum, and designed them Consuls. It hapned that the Armenians cast out Artavasdus, whom he had placed as King over them, and were in this Sedition assisted by the Parthians. This troubled him exceedingly; for he grew old himself, and his adopted sons were too young on the other hand. Yet sent he Caius with Proconsular power to compose these troubles, giving him for a greater grace Lollia Paulina to wife, the daughter (or niece) of M. Lollius, who went with him as his Governour. Tiberius met him at Samus, but was slightly looked on, being little better than a banished man. But Caius falling out with Lollus, who had incensed him against him, he had leave to return home, in the eighth year of his retirement, Augustus giving way to it, through the importunity of Livia, but denying to do any thing without the consent of Caius, and then recalling him with this condition, that he should not at all meddle with affairs of State. As for Caius, he prospered at his first entrance into Armenia, but not long after received an hurt in a rash and unadvised conference, after which he grew listlesse and sluggish, and this distemper was increased by flatterers, so that he desired to stay in the East, and lead there a private life. His Grandfather vehemently urged his return, with condition also, that then he might do what he pleased, so that unwillingly journeying for Italy, he died at Limyra a City of Lycia. His brother Lucius going into Spain, was dead eighteen moneths before, after whose decease Augustus would have adopted Tiberius: but he (if we believe Paterculus an egregious flatterer of him) fearing the envy of Caius, vehemently withstood the attempt. But now both of them being dead (and it's thought helped away by his mother Livia for his sake) he was adopted, together with Agrippa Posthumus, who had been born of Julia after Agrippa's death. And lest he should attempt any new matters, he was constrained to adopt Germanicus, one of the sons of his brother Drusus, though he had a son of his own called also Drusus, in the 757 year of the City, Sexius Aelius Lerus and C. Sexius Saturninus being Consuls, the fifth after the birth of Christ.

duceth Germany.

50. Tiberius was presently sent into Germany, where three years before a famous War had broken out; and with him Velleius Paterculus the Historian (formerly a Tribune in the Army) in quality of General of the Horse, as succeeding his father in his places; and for nine whole years was he, as he telleth us, *the spectator of Tiberius his heavenly actions, either in that place, or as Lieutenant, and as far as the meannesse of his faculties could reach, an assistant in them. This Summer he passed over the River Viurgis, and reduced divers Nations; but in the next even all Germany. For, the Roman Army was led 400 miles upwards from the Rhine, as far the River Elbe which runneth by Sens, now the seat of an Archbishop, and a people then called Hermundurians, and was met there by the Fleet, which having sailed through the Brittish Sea (till then unknown and unheard of) having conquered many Nations, and brought infinite provision of all things there joyned with it. Now nothing was left unconquered, except the Marcomanni, who under conduct of Marobodunus quitting their former seat, had settled themselves upon these grounds surrounded by the Herminian Wood, and through his ordering were raised to a considerable and emulous greatness. Tiberius intended to set upon them the next summer; but was diverted by the rebellion of all Pannonia and Dalmatia, which not satisfied with the benefits of a long Peace, and grown in strength, drew into society all the Nations about them, and flew to arms, to the number of 800000 fighting men. Idem ibid. c. 109, 110. A.D. 8. V. 760.

51. Augustus himself was much affrighted at this rebellion, and well he might, for the Rebels having raised 200000 foot, and 9000 Horse, all select men, they ordered that part of this Army should make for Italy it self, under expert Captains, that part should break into Macedonia, and a third band be left at home to defend their own. Levies therefore were carefully made, all the old Soldiers recalled from every quarter, and such men and women both, as were found within the cisse of Freed-men, were compelled to find Soldiers, the Prince himself being heard to say in the Senate, that except they took good heed, within ten dayes the Enemy might face the walls of Rome. Tiberius was appointed General, and amongst other Officers Paterculus went his Quaestor; Germanicus also is said to have deserved well in this Expedition. Though the War at first was full of difficulties, and the more through scarcity of provisions, yet was it in the space of three years concluded by Tiberius. Pannonia first submitted, Baro and Pinetus their most famous Leaders being taken off, for the one was made a prisoner, and the other yielded himself. And though the Dalmatians were hard to be overcome, through the difficult situation of their places, the fierceness of their natures, and their wondrous abilities in matters of War, yet not long after they were reduced, being almost totally ruined. During these troubles abroad, Agrippa the other adopted son of Augustus lived as a banished person, being by him confined to Planasia an Island near Corsica, for his great folly and rudeness, though he was not found guilty of any notable crime. To Tiberius a Triumph and other great honours were decreed for reducing Illyricum, but he put off the Triumph as very unseasonable, the City being now in great heaviness for the losse of the Legions, and Varus in Germany. Dio l. 55. Paterculus l. 2. c. 110, 111. Tacitus l. 1. c. 3. Sueton in Tiberio c. 20.

52. Quintilius Varus formerly President of Syria (which being rich he entered poor, but left it poor coming away rich, as one expresseth it) was sent into Germany, which he governed with great negligence and security, as not considering that he lay in an Enemies Country, but administering Justice as if he had been in the Forum at Rome. Against him thus secure did the Germans conspire at the instigation of Arminius, son to Sigimerus Prince of that Nation, and a young man of excellent parts. The plot was revealed to Varus by Segestes, but he refused to give any credit to the relation. They left no room therefore for a second discoverer, but intangling the best Army the Romans had (both for discipline, valour, and experience) amongst bogs, woods, and ambuscadoes, cut in pieces three Legions, with as many wings, and six cohorts. Varus killed himself, Volumnius his Lieutenant most basely leaving the foot, ran away with the horse; yet he overlived not those whom he had forsaken, but died a betrayer of his Country. Lucius Asprenas who commanded two Legions under his uncle Varus, preserved his party in so great a calamity, and by coming down in a seasonable time to the lower Wintering quarters, settled the wavering minds of such People as inhabited on this side the Rhine. L. Seditius the Camp-Master, and others with him, being shut up in Alifone, and besieged by innumerable forces, when they wanted necessaries, brake through and came to their own party. This disaster fell out in the 762 year of the City, Q. Sulpicius Camerinus and C. Poppaeus Sabinus being Consuls. Paterculus ut supra. c. 117, 118, 119, 120. Tacitus Annal. l. 1. Dio l. 56. 53. Augustus was out of all measure troubled at so dishonourable a losse, so that counting it as full of danger as disgrace, he appointed warches about in the City, prorogued the commands of Presidents over the Provinces, that by them who were experienced and well known to the people, they might the better better be kept in order, and he vowed to celebrate Games in honour of Jupiter, if the Commonwealth should recover it's former and better condition. Nay he was struck with such consternation, that for several moneths he never cut the hair of his head or beard, and sometimes would he knock his head against the dores, crying out in a kind of distraction Quintilius Varus restore the Legions: he also observed the day of the defeat, as unluckie and dismal every year. He sent Tiberius into Germany, who settling the affaires of Gall, passed over the Rhene, and wasting the Country defeated all he met. Perceiving the former miscarriages to have happened through the negligence and temerity of the General, he took good advice, though at other times wont to act things on his own head, and exacted Military discipline according to the most ancient strictnesse thereof. For two years he managed this War, being once in danger of his life, and then returning to Rome, triumphed three times; whereas if we believe Velleius, who served under him, he deserved seven. The year following Germanicus Caesar, after the end of his Consulship, was sent into Germany. Tiberius was well rewarded. For Augustus procured him equal power with himself over Provinces and Armies, which he held for two years, and then arrived at the Monarchy of the Roman Empire.

54. Augustus in the year preceding his death, when his fourth ten years Government was now expiring, unwillingly, as he ever pretended, accepted of the fifth, and prorogued to Tiberius the Tribuneship for other five years. The year wherein he died he made his third Census with Tiberius his Colleague, and in this Lustrum were found 4137000 polls of Roman Citizens. Celebrating the Lustrum in the Campus Martius, and with great concourse of People, an Eagle flew about him several times, and directing her flight to a Chapel near adjoining, sat down over the name of Agrippa, at the first letter. Which considering, he commanded Tiberius his Colleague to make those vows, which it was the custom to make for the following Lustrum. For though the tables were written and ready, yet he refused to undertake that which he should not perform. About the same time, the first letter of his name on his statue in the Capitol was stricken out by a Thunderbolt. The Fortune-tellers answered, that he should onely live 100 dayes longer, which was signified by the letter C; and must be reckoned amongst the gods; for A E S A R the rest of the name in the Hebruscan language signified a God. In the mean time he wrote a breviary of his actions, which he commanded to be cut in brasse, and set before his Mausoleum. Then sending Tiberius into Illyricum to settle matters there, he followed him as far as Beneventum; but returning back indisposed by a Diarrhea, he came to Nola, whither he also recalled Tiberius, and had long discourse with him in private. His last day being come, he called for a looking-glasse, caused his hair to be combed, and his wrinckled cheeks smoothed up. Then asking his friends if he had not acted his part well, upon their answer yes, he said Plaudite; and so died in the imbraces of his beloved wife Livia, bidding her remember their Marriage and Farewel. He died in the same Rome as Octavius his Father had done, and on the same day (August 19) on which he entered his first Consulship, having lived 76 years all but 35 dayes, in the 767 year of the City, the second of the 198 Olympiad, the 57 after the death of Julius Caesar; and the fifteenth after the death of Christ. Sextus Pompeius and Sextus Apuleius being Consuls. He was the founder of the Roman Monarchy, his Uncle having been rather the chalker of it out. Having obtained it with the destruction of many, he managed it with great prudence and moderation. His publick demeanour was with modesty, and his private with temperance, altogether void of luxury; for though his fortune was high, his fare was but mean, and his apparel suitable, being made of cloath wrought in his own house by his wife, sister, and daughter. He was most unfortunate in his first marriage, through the incredible wantonnesse of his daughter Julia, which died at Rhegium in confinement not long after him. And he was not much happier in his second marriage, except his dearly beloved Livia was much wronged.

eth.

For

For 'tis reported that she (fearing Agrippa Posthumus might be received into favour again, whom Augustus had lately visited) set him forward to his long home, by poisoning some Figs as they hung on a Tree, from which she knew he was wont to gather that kind of fruit.

55. Tacitus maketh it a doubt whether Tiberius found him alive or dead, for Livia kept all things close, gave out words sometimes as if he recovered, secured the High-ways, denied all access to the house, and sent for her son (her self) when he had scarcely entred Illyricum; so that by their practices Agrippa Posthumus was first taken out of the way, and all things necessary being provided, the very same report gave information that Augustus was dead, and Tiberius possessed of the Sovereignty. For he had secured it to himself by strength, though he played the dissembler most egregiously, refusing the Government so long as till the Senators fell down at his feet, and besought him to accept of it, whom he answered with ambiguous words, and at length complaining that a miserable and intollerable servitude was imposed on him, received it as by constraint, and yet so as he seemed to signify that he would again relinquish it. Indeed there was cause for him to say, as he did, that he took a Wolf by the ears. For Clemens the slave of Agrippa had got a considerable party together under pretence of revenging his Lord's death: Scribonius Libo secretly plotted his own advancement, and the Legions both in Germany and Illyricum mutined, the former chusing Germanicus for their Prince, who earnestly refused to accept of their offer, and at length quieted them with much ado, as Drusus did the other in Pannonia, they being frighted into obedience by a total Eclipse of the Moon, which fell out on the 27th of September, five hours after midnight. Clemens was apprehended, and Libo not effecting any thing was in the second year accused to the Senate. Tiberius in the mean while looking carefully to himself, notwithstanding these motions obtained the Supream power, betwixt which and his rule with Augustus for two years there was this difference; that his former command extended onely to the Armies and Provinces subject to Augustus, but this to the Citie it self Mistress of all. Formerly he had Tribunitial and Censorian power; but now he became Monarch, and was loose or exempt from all power of Laws, as Augustus before him. For he had not together with him when living so equal authority as afterwards L. Verus had with M. Antoninus the Philosopher, which two first governed the Commonwealth upon equal terms; but such like as Antoninus Pius had with Adrian, who also adopted him, and made him his Collegue in the Proconsular power as to Provinces, and in the Tribunitial power at home. And therefore Suetonius telleth us, that Tiberius first assembled the Senate by virtue of his Tribunitial Office onely.

56. Tiberius at first carried himself (as ever in some cases) very cunningly, cloaking with marvelous dissimulation those enormities which afterwards appeared. For some time he counterfeited incredible patience, stooped too low in his complementing of Senators and Magistrates, rejected all high titles and honours (not enduring the name of Dominus or Lord) and consulted the Senate continually, not doing little or much without its consents; nay, suffering somethings therein to be carried against his mind; he was also at first very temperate in his diet, and exact in reforming manners, by degrees falling into his natural humour. From the beginning he was much afflicted with the fame of Germanicus, his brother Drusus his son by nature (begotten of Antonia the younger, daughter of Antony the Triumvir, by Octavia the sister of Augustus, concerning which Antonia, Pliny reporteth that she never spate) and his own by adoption, who now prosperously carried on the War in Germany. Within two or three years a very plausible occasion presented it self for the calling of him back from those Legions which were so much at his devotion. For it hapned then that the Parthians were in great commotions about their Kings. Phraates had 27 years before for his own security sent four of his sons as Hostages to Rome, through the procurement curement of his wife Thermusa an Italian woman, which having been formerly his Concubine had then a son by him, and that this her son might obtain the Crown, got the rest to be sent out of the way, and then they two murdered the King. This Bastard called Phraataces reigned; but being hated by the people for his parricide, was not long after slain, and then was set up one Orodes of the family of the Arfacide, who being also hated for his cruelty came to the same end. Then sent the Parthians for one of the Hystages, and Vonones the eldest was dismissed by Tiberius. But they counting it a disgrace for any to reign over them, who (as they termed it) had been a slave to Cesar, rebelliously cast him off, and called in Artabanus, who then reigned in Media, and was also one of the Arfacide or the blood royal of Parthia. He at his first entrance was repulsed by Vonones; but the second time overthrew him, and got possession of the Kingdom. Vonones retiring into Armenia sent to Tiberius for aid, who, for that Artabanus threatened hard, and the principal of the Armenians were of his faction, did not think fit to make War upon him: therefore Vonones yielded himself to Creticus Silanus, who governed Syria, and Artabanus set Orodes one of his own sons over Armenia. At the same time Antiochus King of Commagena dying, a contention arose betwixt the Nobility and Commons; the former would have the Countrey reduced into the form of a Roman Province, but the people were for a King. Now also Philopator King of Cilicia being dead, his subjects were divided upon the very same grounds. Syria also, and Judea being weary of their burthens, desired a diminution of their Tributes.

57. Tiberius now perswaded the Senate that the abilities of Germanicus were requisite for quieting the East, whereupon the Provinces beyond the Seas were decreed to him, with larger power than had been granted to any that governed them, either by lot or the gift of the Prince. Germanicus was often importuned by Tiberius upon this ground to return, yet intent upon his business he first subdued several Nations in Germany, and by the overthrow of Arminius obtained great glory, which was something obscured at last by a shipwrack. It was the design of Tiberius to expose him unto danger and treachery; therefore he removed Silanus his friend, and put Cn. Piso a forward man into his room, to whom he gave in charge some secret thing as many believed. Germanicus, being thus expelled to compose the affairs of the East, as one truly termeth it, placed Zeno the son of Polemo King of Pontus over Armenia. Q. Veranius a Knight had the oversight of Capadocia, which was made a Province; for Archelaus the King thereof courted not Tiberius enough when he was at Rhodes, and therefore was called to Rome, and there kept till his death. Q. Servus also was set over Commagena. Artabanus sent to Germanicus about renewing the league, and good correspondence, desiring that Vonones might not be kept in Syria, nor suffered by his Messengers to sow discord amongst the people, offering him also leave to come to the bank of Euphrates; to which he answered, as became the State and himself. This year died Livy the Historian, who was born at Padua; and also Ovid the Poet, having remained a banished man in Pontus several years, whither the displeasure of Augustus confined him, either for that he had seen him do some unseemly thing which he would not have known, or for publishing his wanton books concerning Love, as he hints himself. This was the 771 year of the City, the 19th after the birth of Christ, Tiberius Augustus the third, and Germanicus Caesar the second time being Consuls.

Who dieth of a lingering disease at Antioch.

58. Germanicus the year following made a voyage into Egypt, to view it for the rarity of its Antiquities, for which he was chidden by Tiberius, as going without his leave. Thence returning into Syria, he was most shamefully, and without any measure affronted by Piso, and at length died of a lingering disease at Antioch, being thought to miscarry by the fraud of Tiberius, and the Ministry of Piso, who plainly said, that he must either displease Father or Son. But the fruit he reaped in pleasing thus the Father was but unpleasing; for returning to Rome the year following, he escaped narrowly tearing in pieces by the people, and being condemned by the Senate killed himself. For Germanicus there was an universal mourning, not onely in Rome and the Provinces, but also amongst Barbarians and Enemies themselves. He was a person excellently accomplished, and of a most sweet disposition, whereby he became the love and delight of the people, and Augustus long debating with himself whether he should not leave him his Successor, at length caused Tiberius to adopt him, who, 'tis thought, being restrained by fear, and reverence of him, after his death broke out into such courses as made the other more mislead and glorious. By his wife Agrippina (the daughter of Agrippa and Julia) he died father of three sons, viz. Nero, Drusus, and Caius; and of as many daughters. He died in the 34th year of his age, and that which followed his second Consulship, M. Junius Solanus, and C. Norbanus Flaccus being Consuls.

His issue.

59. Three or four years after was Tiberius punished in his own kind by the poisoning of his own son Drusus, and that by his greatest favourite Ælius Seianus. This man being the son of Seius Strabo a Roman Knight, when very young followed Caius the Nephew of Augustus, and afterwards by divers Arts wound himself into the affections of Tiberius, who used him as his most inward Counsellour, or Minister of State, and erected to his honour his statue of brasse in the Theatre. Now he thought of no lesse than the Empire it self, as a step to which, he poisoned Drusus the son of Tiberius, having brought Livia the young man's wife to a compliance with him by his filthy dalliance, and corrupted Lygdus the Eunuch to betray his trust. Drusus had the year before the Tribunitial power conferred on him; but for that he was none of the most towardsly was little regarded by his father, who as soon as his Funeral was over, returned to his wonted employments, forbidding any longer vacation upon his account. The Inhabitants of Ilium sending their Ambassadors something too late to condole his death, he answered, that he also was sorry for the death of Hector their excellent Countrey-man. Tiberius after this commended the two sons of Germanicus, Nero and Drusus, to the Senate, which done, Seianus began to strike at them, though at first through the sides of their mother, labouring to bring them all into suspicion and hatred. This first advantage he took was from the prayers of the Priests, who made vows for their health, as for that of Tiberius; for he took it hainously that they herein should be made equal to him. Then did he provoke them, and never ceased till he caused them to be declared Enemies by the Senate, after which he starved them to death, using also their mother most injuriously, for that she was not sparing of her tongue in reprehending and upbraiding him. Now was Tacfarinus, who had maintained a tedious war in Africk, slain by Dolabella. As for Tiberius by the perswasion of Seianus he withdrew into the Isle Caprea, and thence forward minding nothing gave up himself to all sorts of enormities.

60. For, casting off all care of the State, being out of sight, he returned to his natural disposition, not looking to the supply, either of Army or Provinces; suffering Armenia to be seized on by the Parthians, Mesia by the Dacians and Sarmatians, and Gall to be wasted by the Germans. He instituted a new Office for the management of pleasures, unto which he preferred a Knight, T. Calpurnius Priscus: he held such in greatest esteem, & bestowed Offices on men that were most for his turn that way, being given up to such beastliness as is incredible, and not to be mentioned. He was excessively covetous, both as to getting, and keeping what was unjust. He was so undutifull to his mother, as he refused to come at her, when living, and when dead, he neglected to bury her; neither would he perform her will, but persecuted her friends; but she was justly rewarded (though as to him unjustly) having over and above other wicked practices been suspected to have had an hand in the death of Germanicus. So cruel, and filthy he became, that he verified the Character given him when but young, by Theodorus Gadareus his School-master, that he was πυλὸν εὐμαχτὶ πεφυραμένον, or Dirt mingled with blood. lots, he scarcely left two or three of them alive, Seianus being found out, and punished justly for his wickedness, amongst others that were innocent. He spared not the familiar friends of his mother, nephews, Agrippina or Seianus. No day either holy or prophane was free from slaughters. Every offence little or great was Capital. Many were condemned with their wives and children. Rewards were proposed to informers, and all testimonies taken for true. Simple death he accounted nothing, and therefore invented painful waies; especially after he knew how his son Drusus died, he neither spared any person nor sort of torments. Caius the son of Germanicus he cared not for, as suspecting him, and Tiberius his grandson by Drusus he despised, as conceived in adultery.

He being now Governour of Judea, Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, his brother Philip Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias of Abilene; Annas (who, formerly having had the Office, though displaced by Gratus, yet for his authority still carried the name) and Caphas (otherwise called Joseph, whom lately Gratus had placed in the room of Simon, by him deposed also) being High-Priests, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius entering, John Baptist began to preach and baptize in the resemblance and spirit of Elias. Amongst others he baptized Christ himself, of whom he was the forerunner. His ministry is thought to have commenced on the tenth day of the seventh moneth, which was Penitential, and so great a Fast, that the soul which did not afflict it self, was to be cut off from amongst it's People; and was also Expiatorie, wherein the High-Priest (the Type of him before whose face John was sent) entred into the Holy of Holies alone, with blood expiating the sins of the People, this being also the same day wherein by trumpet the Jubile was proclaimed.

62. Jesus now about thirty years of age, being baptized of John in Jordan (and ownd for the Messiah and son of God, by the descending of the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove, and resting upon him, as also by a voice from Heaven) was led of the Spirit into the Wilderness to be tempted of the Devil. After his temptation he returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. Going into Galilee he received Andrew and Simon his brother, the day following called Philip of Bethsaida the City of Andrew, and Simon surnamed Cephas or Peter by the Lord. On the third day being invited to a marriage in Cana of Galilee, he turned water into wine, this being his first miracle, and by it his glory was manifested, and his Disciples believed in him. Afterward he went down to Capernaum with his mother, his brethren, (or kinsmen) and disciples, where they abode not many days. Then came he to the exercise of his Ministry, the acts whereof are distinguished by four Passovers. Amongst the four Evangelists which describe them, Matthew alone hath neglected the order of time, which is constantly observed by the rest, except in the History of John's casting into prison, as Luke hath recorded it.

63. Jesus having ascended to Jerusalem at the time of the first Passover, cast buyers and sellers out of the Temple, wrought miracles, and instructed Nicodemus in the mystery of Regeneration, and Faith in himself. Leaving then Jerusalem he went into Judea with his Disciples, where abiding, he baptized by the ministry of them; John then baptizing in Ænon; for he was not yet cast in prison. A certain question arose about purifying betwixt some of John's Disciples and the Jews. John instructed now his Disciples concerning Christ the last time, as they told him of his acts with some emulation, and not long after he was cast into prison, for reprehending Herod the Tetrarch his incest with his brother Philip's wife. Jesus hearing of his captivity, and that the Pharisees took notice that he baptized more by the hands of his Disciples, departed out of Judea (where he had remained some eight moneths) and came into Galile. In his passage through Samaria he discoursed with a woman at a Well near unto the City Sychar, the Inhabitants of which by her means he brought to the acknowledgement of himself, four moneths before harvest, or the Passover, about the middle of the ninth moneth called Ab. Having stayed two dayes at Sychar, he proceeded, and returned the second time into Galile out of Judea after his baptism, being received with great respect by the Galileans, who had seen what he did at Jerusalem. Preaching in their Synagogues here, he also healed at Cana, the son of the Noble-man that was sick at Capernaum, which was his second miracle in Galile. Having wrought miracles at Capernaum, he went to Nazareth, where he had been brought up, and expounding the Prophet Esay concerning himself, they first admired, and then cast him out, and would have thrown him down headlong, but he passed away through the midst of them.

64. Leaving then Nazareth, he taught at Capernaum, where they were astonished at his doctrine, and cast out an unclean spirit that was first commanded silence. Departing out of the Synagogue into the house of Simon and Andrew, he cured of a Fever Simons wive's mother. At Sun-set he healed sick folkes brought to him, and cast out Devils, first put to silence. In the morning he went out into a desert place to pray, and the multitudes endeavouring to detain him, he answered, he must also preach in other places; and coasting through Galile, he preached in their Synagogues, and cast out Devils. Then taught he the People out of Simon's ship on the Lake of Genesareth, and helped them to a miraculous draught of fishes, whereupon Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John, being commanded to follow him, he maketh fishers of men. Then going through all Galile healing and teaching, his fame spread through Syria, and multitudes flocked to him. In a certain City he healed a Leper, which though forbidden, yet noised his fame, and such companies now followed him that he could not enter the City, but taught without in desert places, and prayed. After a few dayes he returned to Capernaum, and teaching in his own house he healed the Paralyticke, who was let down in a bed, and forgave him his sins before the Pharisees. Thence going towards the Sea he taught, and passing by called Levi or Matthew, then sitting at the receipt of custom, by whom being feasted, he defended his disciples against the Pharisees, for eating with Publicans and sinners, and for not fasting. And it came to passe, that on the second Sabbath after the first (that is, on the second Sabbath of the new year, instituted after their return out of Egypt, and beginning with the moneth Nisan or Abib) Jesus passing through the Corn-fields, defended his Disciples, who plucked and ate ears of Corn, against the Pharisees, and explained the Doctrine of the observation of the Sabbath.

65. After these things there was a Feast of the Jews (that is, the second Passover of his Ministry) and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, where on the Sabbath-day he healed one who had layn 38 years diseased at the Pool of Bethesda, for which thing, and because he had called God his Father, the Jews went about to kill him, and he opposed against them his most divine apology. Departing thence, in the Synagogue, on another Sabbath, he healed a man that had a withered hand, for which the Pharisees and Herodians presently sought to kill him. Jesus knowing this, departed to the Sea, where teaching the People, he commanded a little Vessel to wait on him, because the multitude crouded him. In these dayes he spent a whole night in prayer upon a mountain, and when it was day, made choice of twelve, whom he called Apostles. Going down into the plain he healed the sick, and coming home, such was the presse, that they could not ear, whereupon his friends came to take him, supposing he had been besides himself. When he had seen the multitude he ascended into the mountain, and his Disciples coming to him, there he preached his long Sermon, first speaking to the Apostles, and then to the multitude. Having ended all his words in the audience of the People, he entered into Capernaum, and healed the Centurions servant ready to die. The day following he raised from the dead the widow's son in the City Naim, whence his fame was spread abroad. Then sent John his Disciples from prison to him, to ask whether he was the man, or they must look for another, who being departed with an answer, Christ took occasion to speak of John, and upbraided the Cities, acquiescing in the Will of his Father as to the revealing or hiding the things of salvation. Then Simon the Pharisee inviting him to dinner, a woman that was a sinner washed his feet with her tears, which defending against Simon, he forgave her her sins. And it came to passe afterward, that he preached through every City and Village, his Disciples being with him, and certain women ministering to him, amongst which was Joanna the wife of Chusa, Herod's Steward. Then healed he a man possessed with a dumb and deaf Divel, and defended himself against the Pharisees, who said, that he cast out Divels by Beelzebub Prince of Divels. To the Scribes and Pharisees demanding a sign, he onely giveth that of Jonas, and his mother and brethren asking to speak with him, he declareth who are his nearest relations. On that day going to the Sea, he taught the People from the ship in the Parable of the Sower and others. On this same day when it was evening, he would they should passe to the further side, and having dismissed the multitude, when in their passage a great Tempest arose, he chiding the winds stilled the Sea, and saved his Disciples then in danger. Coming unto the further side into the Country of the Gaderens, or Gergasens, which lyeth over against Galile, two Demoniacks met him, exceeding fierce (whereof Mark and Luke mention but one) out of which he casting the Divels, permitted them to enter into the Swine. The Gaderens hereupon desiring him to depart out of their Coasts, he (having dismissed the man who desired to be with him, and upon refusal, preached throughout Decapolis what things Jesus had done for him) returned by ship unto the further side, and so to Caper-naum his own City.

66. And it came to passe, that when Jesus was returned, the People gladly received him; for they were all waiting for him. And being by the Seaside, he answered the Disciples of John, inquiring why his Disciples fasted not, seeing they, and the Disciples of the Pharisees fasted often. Whilst he spake, he was besought to heal the onely daughter of Jairus; and as he was going down, a woman that had had an issue of blood twelve years, was by touching the hem of his garment made whole. Passing thence, he cured two blind men, whom he charged with threatening to say nothing of him; but in vain. As they passed away, a man possessed with a dumb Divel was presented unto him, whom he healed, the company admiring, and the Pharisees blaspheming. Then going about to all the Towns, he taught and healed, and coming into his own Country was contemned again by his Country-men, as he taught in the Synagogue on the Sabbath-day, they calling him Carpenter, though they admired him. Going about the Villages he taught, and pitying the multitude because the Harvest was great and the labourers few, he bade his Disciples pray for labourers into the Harvest. Then sent he out his twelve Disciples two and two, commissioned with power to preach and heal. Having made an end of commanding them, he went and preached in their Cities: and the twelve went about the Villages, teaching and healing every where. Now about this time was John Baptist beheaded, through the procurement of Herodias, which being told unto Jesus by his Disciples, who buried him, after the return of his own, he went with them by ship into a desert place called Bethsaida. The multitude hearing of it, got thither before him, where he taught and healed them. And Jesus went up into a mountain, and there sat with his Disciples, and the Passover was nigh. It being late, he having compassion on the multitude, fed the number of 5000 men (besides women and children) with five barley loaves, and two small fishes, whereof twelve baskets full of fragments were taken up. When they would come and take him by force to make him a King, he caused his Disciples to passe over to the other side opposite to Bethsaida, and towards Caper-naum. Having prayed in a mountain apart, he came towards his Disciples, and and walking upon the Sea, when they had now rowed 25. or 30 furlongs, and were troubled with a contrary wind. They being affrighted at him, he made known himself, and saving Peter (who had desired he would bid him come to him on the water) when he was sinking, he passed over with them. Coming into the Land of Ganessa, they brought all sorts of diseased persons to him, desiring they might touch but the hem of his Garment, which as many as touched were made whole. The day after his passage came the people which he had left on the further side to Capernaum to seek him, where in the Synagogue he preached concerning the bread of life, asserting himself to be it against the murmuring of the Jews. Many now of his Disciples departed from, and walked no more with him. And though the 12 refused to depart, yet he declared that one of them was a Devil, meaning Judas Iscariot, who should betray him, being one of the twelve.

The third Passover.

67. After the third Passover of his Ministry, the Scribes and Pharisees that were come from Jerusalem came to him, and complained that his Disciples ate with unwashed hands, to whom he answered concerning their abolishing God's commands by their Traditions, and taught the multitude what he declared to his Disciples, that not what enreth in, but what cometh out defileth a man. Departing into the Coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he cast the Devil out of the daughter of the Syrophanician woman, because of the greatness of her faith. Passing thence to the Sea of Galile through the midst of Decapolis, he healed a deaf man, who had an impediment in his speech, and ascending into a Mountain healed many. In those dayes a great multitude having stayed with him three dayes, he fed them to the number of 4000 men, besides Women and Children, with seven Loaves, and a few little fishes; and seven baskets full of fragments were taken up. Taking ship presently he came into the parts of Dalmanutha, or the Coasts of Magdala. The Pharisees asking a sign, he sighed deeply in his spirit for that these Hypocrites could discern the face of the sky, and not the signs of the times; and refusing to give them any other sign than that of Jonas, he left them, and returned by ship to the further side. His Disciples having forgot to take bread, and brought but one loaf with them, he bids them beware of the Leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod; and expoundeth his meaning to be of the Leaven of Doctrine. Coming then to Bethsaida, he cureth a blind man by degrees without the Town. Passing thence into the Towns of Casarea-Philippi, he asked his Disciples concerning the opinion which men had of him, and then what they themselves thought, to which for themselves Peter answered, that he was the Christ, which thing he forbade them to declare, foretold his death and resurrection, called Peter Satan for checking him about his sufferings, and foretold his transfiguration, which after some six dayes was fulfilled. The day following coming down, he cast out a Devil out of the Lunatick, which his Disciples could not eject. Passing thence, they journeyed through Galile, which he would not have known, and taught his Disciples that he must die, and rise again, which they understanding not were troubled, and afraid to ask him. Being arrived at Capernaum, the Lord paid Tribute-money, and taught his Disciples humility by the example of a little Child, speaking also against offending one's weak brother, and forgiving one another seventy seven times by the Parable of the Kings two debtors. John telling him that they had seen one casting out Devils in his name, he said he was not to be forbidden, and again spoke against offending weak ones, and bade them beware that no Member offended them. After these things Jesus walked in Galile, for he would not walk in Jury, because the Jews sought to kill him. Now the Jews feast of Tabernacles (the Sconopagia) was at hand. His brethren, or Kins-men willed him to go up that his Disciples might believe in him; but he refused to comply with them therein, who themselves believed not, and went up after them, not openly, but as it were in secret.

68. When the time was come that he should be received up, he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. The Samaritans not receiving him he checked his his Disciples, who would have had fire called down from Heaven upon them. Several in his passage desiring to follow him, he gave answer to them all. After these things he sent out 70 Disciples before his face, two into every Citie and place where he would come. And in the midst of the feast when the multitude was busie in inquiring about him, he came, and taught in the Temple. Some were sent to lay hold of him. On the last, and great day of the Feast, when he spake of faith in himself, a great difference arose, and the Messengers that were sent to apprehend him, with Nicodemus, defended him against the Pharisees. Departing into the Mount of Olives, he returned early in the morning, and refused as a Judge to condemn the woman taken in Adultery. In the Treasury he spake much concerning many truths, concluding with before Abraham was I am; whereupon the Jews took up stones to cast at him; but he hid himself, and passed away through the midst of them. Passing by, he saw, and cured a man that was born blind, who for vindicating him was cast out of the Synagogue. He then preached concerning the true Shepherd, Sheep, and Door, as also of Thieves and Mercenaries, which caused a dissention amongst his hearers. The 70 then return with joy, and a certain Lawyer asking him what he should do to inherit eternal life, he sendeth him to the Law, and to declare who is our neighbour, speaketh the Parable of the man that fell amongst Thieves. After this he was entertained in the house of Martha, which ministred to him, while her sister Mary hearing his word was preferred before her. And it came to passe that after he had done praying in a certain place, one of his Disciples desired him to teach them to pray, as John also taught his Disciples, therefore he prescribed the second time the same Lords prayer, adding arguments for constancy and firmnesse of faith. He cast out a Devil which was dumb, & proved against the blasphemers that he did it not by Beelzebub. While he said these things a certain woman said, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that gave thee suck, to which he answered. The multitude gathering about him, he said, that Generation sought for a sign, but no sign, but that of Jonas the Prophet should be given it, saying, that the Queen of the South, and the Ninevites should condemn it in judgement. Dining with a Pharisee who had invited him, and wondred that he washed not, he spoke against their Hypocrisie, and denounced also woes against the Expositors of the Law. He bade his Disciples beware of the Leaven of the Pharisees (Hypocrisie) and not fear those that could kill the body. He refused to be a Judge betwixt a man and his brother about the inheritance, and thence took occasion to speak against anxious cares of the World, bidding them be ready against the uncertain time of their Lords coming.

69. There being some that told Jesus of the Galileans, the bloud of whom Pilate mingled with their sacrifice, he took thence occasion to presse repentance, and spake the Parable of the barren Fig-tree. On a certain Sabbath healed a woman that had a spirit of infirmity 18 years, which act he defended against the ruler of the Synagogue, and compared the Kingdom of God to a Graine of Mustard seed, and to Leaven. Journeying towards Jerusalem to the Feast of the Dedication he taught through the Cities and Villages, and answered that question whether few shall be saved? To certain Pharisees, vwho bade him be gone for fear of Herod, he gave a couragious answer. Being invired to eat in the house of one of the chiefeft Pharisees, he healed one of the Dropsie, defended it, and spake the Parable of those that vvere invited to the feast, instructing the Pharisee vwho had invired him. One of the Guests, saying, that Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God, he took occasion to speak the Parable of the great Supper, and the excuses of such as were invited. To the multitude following him he preached concerning the denial of life it self for his sake, propounding the Parable of one who was to build a Tower, and the King going to battel. Upon the Publicans and sinners their coming to hear him, the Pharisees murmured, and he spake to them the Parables of the lost sheep, the goat, and the Prodigal Son. To his Disciples he also spake that of the unjust Steward, which applying, the Pharisees who were covetous derided him, whereupon preaching against them, amongst other things he spake the Parable of the Rich-man and Lazarus. Speaking to his Disciples against offences, he also teacheth that we must forgive our offending brother. The Apostles desiring him to increase their faith, he speaketh of the power of that Grace, and by the Parable of the servants sheweth, that when we have done all we can we are unprofitable servants, having done but what we ought. Passing through Samaria and Gali'ce, towards Jerusalem, he healed the ten Lepers, whereof one onely returned and praised God. To the Pharisees asking him when the Kingdom of God should come, he answereth, and declareth to his Disciples, that the day of the son of man should be like to those of Noah and Lot, but he must first suffer many things. To incourage his Disciples to pray, he spake the Parable of the unjust Judge, and to some that thought themselves righteous and despised others, that of the Pharisee and the Publican.

70. At the Fest of Dedication, when it was Winter, Jesus walking in Salomons Porch, to the Jews, who bade him tell them plainly whether he was Christ or not, he answered, that He and his father are one, whereupon they taking up stones to throw at him, he defended his Divinity by his works, and the Scriptures, and escaped when they sought to take him. Passing beyond Jordan into that place where John baptized, he taught and healed, many believing on him, and answered the Pharisees, tempting him, that it is unlawfull for a man to put away his wife, except for Adultery. Now admitted he Infants, though his Disciples rebuked such as brought them, and as he was passing thence to come into the way, he answered the young Rich man that asked him what he should do to inherit eternal life; and bade him sell all he had, and give it to the poor, then to follow him. Hearing that Lazarus was sick, he abode in the place where he was two dayes, and then coming to Bethany, after he had been dead four dayes raised him from the dead. Hereupon Caiphas Prophecyng that he was to die for the people, they resolved to put him to death, which he understanding, went into the Citie Ephraim, and there taught. Ascending towards Jerusalem, he went before his Disciples, who were amazed and afraid. He now told them of his sufferings, which they did not at all understand; and the sons of Zebede asking to sit on his right, and left hand in his Kingdom, he gave them a repulse, and improved it to the teaching of them all humility. Coming near to Jericho he healed a blind man. In Jericho he called, and was entertained by Zachens, and passing thence restored sight to two blind men, whereof one was Bartimans; when they drew near to Jerusalem, they thinking that the Kingdom of God was near, he spake the Parable of the King, who going a journey committed ten Talents to his servants to be improved till his return. The Passover being now at hand, many went up to Jerusalem to purifie themselves, and Jesus six dayes before it came to Bethany, where they made him a Supper. Lazarus sate at Table with him, but Mary anointed his feet, and wiped them with her hair. Many of the Jews came not onely to see him, but Lazarus also, upon whose account, for that many believed on him, the Chief Priests consulted also to kill Lazarus. Going towards Jerusalem, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives (on the 29th of March) he sent his Disciples for the Asses Colt whereon he rode to Jerusalem. When he came near the Citie he wept over it, foretelling its final destruction. Out of the Temple he cast buyers and sellers, where the Children cried Hosanna, and many believed on him, the great ones studying how to kill him. Certain Greeks who were come to the Fest desiring to see him, he preached concerning his passion, and had a voice from Heaven answering his prayer, which some thought to be of an Angel, and others of Thunder. It being late, he went to Bethany with the 12. Notwithstanding, the multitude had seen so many works, yet they believed not, that the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled. Yet many of the Chief Priests believed on him, but durst not confesse him for the Pharisees. Jesus cried, and spake concerning faith in himself.

71. The next morning as he returned he hungred, and cursed the barren
Fig-

Fig-tree. He cast buyers and sellers again out of the Temple, and suffered nothing to be caried through it. Whilst he taught concerning Faith in himself, the Chief-Priests consulted how to kill him, fearing the People. At evening he went out of the City, and returning in the morning, they found the Fig-tree withered; whereupon he took occasion to preach concerning the power of Faith. As he taught in the Temple, the Chief-Priests, and Pharisees, and Elders, asked him by what authority he did these things? to whom he answered, with another question concerning John's authority, spake the Parable of the two sons, asking them, whether did the will of his father? and that of the husbandmen, who killed the heir of the vinyard, applying them to these men, who now studied how to apprehend him, but feared the People. Again, he spake to them the Parable of the marriage of the King's son, and the excuses of the invited, with the want of the wedding garment. Then the Pharisees sent some to intrap him in his talk, who asking him whether it was lawful to give tribute to Cesar? admired his answer, and left him. On that day the Saducees asked him concerning the woman married to seven husbands, whose she should be at the resurrection? to which having answered, and asserted the resurrection, a Lawyer tempted him, asking him which is the greatest Commandement? Having answered him, he asked the Pharisees whose son Christ is? and no man could answer him any thing, nor durst thenceforth ask him any more questions. Then speaking of the Scribes and Pharisees, he pronounced eight woes against them, and upbraiding Jerusalem with her cruelty and obstinacy, foretelleth her destruction. Sitting over against the treasury, he saw a poor widdow cast in two mites, and going out to his Disciples, who admired the structure, he foretold it's ruine. His Disciples asked him on the Mount of Olives when these things should be, concerning the sign of his coming, and the end of the World, he answered largely, advising them to watch, for they knew not what hour their Lord would come, illustrating his doctrine by the Parable of the Ten Virgins, and the talents committed to the servants to traffick. And he described the last Judgement by a severing of goats from the sheep. By day he taught, at night he went to the Mount of Olives, and all the People came in the morning to hear him in the Temple. When he had ended these sayings, he said to his Disciples, You know that after two dayes is the Feast of the Passeover, and the son of man is betrayed to be crucified. The great ones assembling in the house of Caiphas the High-Priest, consulted how to kill him; but they said, not on the Feast-day, lest there be an uprore amongst the People. Jesus being in Bethany in the house of Simon the Leper, a woman poured oyntment upon his head, which he defended against his Disciples, foretelling his burial. Then entred Satan into Judas, who offered himself, and covenanted for money to betray him.

The Fourth
Pascover wherein Christ the true Passeeover himself was offered.

72. In the Fourth Passeover Jesus himself, Our Passeover, was offered, and an end thereby was put to all Sacrifices, which were but types of this. Some think that he did not this time eat the Paschal Lamb, but onely unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, such as were used by those that could not come up to the Sacrifice, being in another Country. For a (a) learned man distinguisheth betwixt πάσχα ἑσθίουον and μνημονεύτην, which later was performed by those that were a far off, in memorial of the thing, it being unlawful to kill the Lamb any where out of Judea. Now Christ would not sacrifice, because he himself was now to be offered. That he did not do it, appeareth, because as soon as he came into the house he sat down: and this many of the ancient Greek Fathers did believe. These words of Christ, with desire I have desired to eat this Passeover with you before I suffer, the same learned man expoundeth as meant, that he hastened to that Supper because the time of his death was at hand, which would take from him the liberty of celebrating the πάσχα ἑσθίουον. It being granted that he kept the Passeover a day before the Jews observed it, (b) another contendeth that Christ kept it on the true day, and that the Jews receding from the Law, put it off till the following day, or the 15 of the moneth Nisan, being the Sabbath, Sabbath, lest they should be debarred of working for two dayes together. But the other opinion is more probable, which holdeth that he anticipated it, being as the true Passover, to be offered up on the true day of killing the Passover, which fell out on the day preceding the Sabbath, and not on the Sabbath day. It clearly appeareth in Scripture, what things our Lord did and suffered for unworthy sinners, after he had eaten this Supper, though the order of the former passages concerning his preaching be obscure, and therefore we have more largely described them. Being betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Chief-Priests, and by them delivered up to Pilate the Governour, he being convinced of his innocence and their malice, sought how to deliver him, till they told him, that if he did it he was not Cæsar's friend; whereupon fearing to be accused to Tiberius, of protecting one who affected the Kingdom, he condemned him, and delivered him to the Soldiers to be crucified. This was about the sixth hour, or a little after noon, at what time a great darknesse arose, for that the Sun was obscured, and continued till the ninth hour, or three of the clock. Then Christ to shew the bitterness of his torment cried (yet) with a loud voice, Eli Eli Lamasabachani, and receiving the vinegar, after he had commended his soul into the hands of his Father, gave up the ghost. Thus he who was in the form of God, and counted it no robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation, and suffered death, even the (most ignominious) death of the Crosse for ingrateful men.

A. D. 33.
Ol. 202. an. 4.
V. C. 787.

73. Some think that the darknesse which hapened at our Saviour's Passion, was onely in the Land of Judsa. But others, finding that the Evangelists mention * the whole Earth, conclude that this Eclipse was Occumenical or Universal, Luke expressly saying, that the Sun is self (the eye of the whole World) was darkned. Some conceived that the Sun was darkened by the interposition of the body of the Moon, whereof (a) Dionysius the Arcopagite (as he calleth himself) was an eye witnesse, at what time he and Apolophanes the Philosopher being at Heliopolis, observed the Moon suddenly to cast her self before the Sun (though it was not the time of conjunction) and again from the ninth hour to the evening, opposing her self to the middle line of the Sun. If so, it was an extraordinary miracle, the Moon being now at the full (as (b) Augustin observeth it to have been ever at the Passover) and consequently at the greatest distance from the Sun, out of which respect others seem to have held, that the Sun was darkned, not by the interposition of that luminary, but the retention of his beams. That the darknesse was universal, appeareth from the records of Heathen Writers, which, as (c) Orosius saith, besides the Evangelists, mentioned the greatnesse of the Eclipse. And (d) Tertullian writing to Pagans saith, You cannot make this wonder suspected, seeing your own Calendars have remarked it, and your selves retain the testimonies thereof in your own registers. Amongst Greek Authors, Phlegon (e) Trallianus the Freed-man of Adrian the Emperour, in his Work of Olympiads or Chronicle, which consisted of sixteen Books, clearly spoke of this Eclipse, writing in his thirteenth Book, that in the fourth year of the 202 Olympiad, the greatest Eclipse hapened that ever was known; for, at the sixth hour of the day it was night, so that the Starrs were seen in the Heavens.

74. That Christ was put to death in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate (a) Cornelius Tacitus writeth, an Author guilty of Ethnick ignorance, and prejudice. But (b) Josephus the noble Jewish Historian giveth him an honourable testimony, writing, that At the same time there was one Jesus a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man. For he was a worker of wonderful works, and a teacher of those which willingly receive the truth. He had also many followers, not onely Jews but Gentiles: and he was believed to be Christ. And whereas by the malice of our Princes, Pilate condemned him to be crucified, yet notwithstanding they who first loved him have persevered. For he appeared to them alive the third day, the Prophets having foretold in their writings, these, and many other wonderful things concerning him:

him: and to this day the People from him called Christians hath not ceased. This he relateth, after he had spoken of that Sedition which hapened because of Pilate his bringing in of Cesar's Images. Some from amongst our selves have not given credit to this relation, thinking it to be foisted in by some Christians, for the greater honour of our Religion. But as the pia fraudes supposed to have been used by the Primitive Christians, are rather increased than otherwise, by some, who either pedantically, and out of ostentation seek for applause from the prejudice of their own cause (as one hath done of late in reference to the matter in hand) or as out of a melancholick and distrustful humour question the evidence of the truth; so is there no reason that this testimony should be condemned amongst them. For Josephus maketh mention of John Baptist, giving him large commendations, and relateth also that he was beheaded; though he assigneth the cause to have been but of jealousy of him, and lest he should make some commotions through his popularity, which likely enough might be some cause, especially the malice of Herodias considered, which woman would not be wanting to fill his head with suspicion, although the main reason was his reproving of the incest. He also maketh mention of James the brother of Alphaeus, whom he calleth the brother of Jesus Christ, how he was put to death at Jerusalem, saying, that all good men were sorely troubled at it, and clearly expresth himself dissatisfied in it, writing, that Ananus, who commanded the murder to be done, did ill, and this he saith not onely because the Judicial power was taken away from the Jews, as is evident from the course of his words.

be true and not feigned by Christians.

75. It is hence clear enough, that Josephus was not in the number of those whom Herod Agrippa could have pleased in the killing of the other James the brother of John; and truly amongst the Jews, such as were not extremely malicious against Christ, were something inclining to him, if we consider the temper of that People. It cannot therefore be said, that Josephus was so inveterately despightful against Christ and Christians, that, as some have thought, he utterly passed over the story of Christ upon that account. This Principle would have induced him to rail rather than to be silent, to bespatter the Christian generation, rather to say nothing, or rather to seem displeased at their sufferings. It's true, he was with the younger Agrippa, but almost a Christian, and therefore we rather follow the translation of Jerome, which rendereth his words credebatur esse Christus, than to take them as Eusebius and Rufinus have them, and as they are found in the present copies, ο χριστός οὗτος ἦν, Christus hic erat. But some there were amongst the learned sort of Jews, who knew not really what to blame as to Christ, nay they believed in him, onely they desired still to * keep the Law, such were their renaciousnesse as to it. It's true, they stumbled at the meannesse of his outward condition, and expected a Messiah to reign at Jerusalem. But Josephus lived to see Jerusalem utterly destroyed, and thereby an occasion for such an advantage taken away; and affliction maketh men more seriously to consider things; so that he might be favourable enough towards Christ himself, though as to the Law he might still be pertinacious, as many of them were. Eusebius writeth, that the Verses of Sibylla were accounted by some as feigned by the Ecclesiasticks, but not a word of this matter.

* Acts 15.

76. The Jews had great expectations of the coming of the Messiah, at that very time when the Lord Jesus was upon Earth. They knew that the Prophecies of old respected that season: they understood well enough the weeks of Daniel, and that the Scepter was departed from Judah, when they had no Judiciary power as to life and death left amongst them. This expectation was so great, that it possessed the whole Eastern part of the Empire, though it was understood in the same sense onely, as by the carnal sort of Jews, amongst whom how many counterfeits do we read of, which at that time presumed upon it? Hereupon, though Christ came in an humble way, yet his Miracles caused a reverence and esteem of his person, nay they durst not but think well of him as the Messiah (how long dost thou make us so doubt?) till confounded by the spiritualnesse of his preaching, offended at his opposition of their Traditions, and Pharisaical Tenents (as contrary to their Law, which they thought must necessarily indure for ever) and especially moved (the greatest of them) by their corrupt interests of profit and applause (which made them deny him, though they knew the resurrection, and to sin against their own consciences, and the holy Ghost) they rejected, and put him to death. That saying amongst the Talmudists, and ascribed to the house of Elias (whom some will have to be John Baptist) is commonly known, viz. that the World should continue 6000 years, whereof 2000 belong to Tohu or Inane (that is the void space of time betwixt the Creation and the Law) 2000 to the Law, and 2000 to the Messiah; that then it should be destroyed. Now as the first division lighteth well, if the Tohu be taken as ending at the birth of Abraham, the father of the faithfull (or those in Covenant with God) so the second endeth much about the birth of our Saviour (reckoning as to both those accounts the years of the Patriarchs, according to the Hebrew Text) and pointeth out the time of the Messiah. Suidas mentioned out of Theodosius a noble Jew, that before Christ did rebuke the Scribes, they marvel-ling at his wise answers and questions made him one of the Priests, and entered his name, Ἰησοῦς ὁ υἱοῦ θεοῦ καὶ μαρίας, Jesus the son of God and of Mary, otherwise he being of the Tribe of Judah could not have been suffered to preach at Nazareth and Capernaum as he did.

77. But (that we may improve those things as to Josephus) it doth appear, that not onely before Christ gave them offence, and that before he died, some had honourable thoughts of him, but also after his death they accounted him the very Messiah, though they would not part with their old way of worship. Their Talmud, like to Augeas his stable, is full of filth, amongst which but a few Granes of Corn do appear. It was not finished in lesse time then 100 years, being written with this design, to contain all the sayings of their Elders which were not expressed in Scripture, and was compleated (such a Fardel as it is) about 500 years after Christ. Yet speaking of that place of Zechariah (Chap. 12. vers. 10.) And they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, after it hath reprehended a certain exposition of it, addeth, Peace be to him who hath said that these things are to be understood of Messiah the son of Joseph, who is slain. There is nothing in the whole Talmud more worthy of observation. For so we have him whom both the blessed Virgin her self, and Nahaniel calleth the son of Joseph, and whom the Jews put to death, to be the true Messiah, and to have been born about the 4000 year of the World.

78. There are not wanting Testimonies concerning the truth of Christ, and his Doctrine from the Heathen. Rhodiginus and Volateran deliver it as a matter of credit, that there was an Altar in Egypt Dedicated unto a Virgin that should bring forth a Child, and Postellus, that there was another intitled Primogenito Dei, to the first begotten of God. Upon the Star which appeared at his birth (which some think the same mentioned by Pliny, and called Stella crinita sine crine) many meditating turned to the truth, as Cheremon amongst the Scoicks, and Challadius amongst the Platonists, who thereupon went into Judea, and became Jews. It is also reported that the Romans called their Temple which they had built to Bacchus for victory, Templum pacis eternum, the everlasting Temple of peace, because the Oracle at Delphi told them it should stand dum peperit virgo, till a Virgin brought forth a Child; but as soon as Christ was born it fell. The Oracles generally fell in the reign of Tiberius, when the time of Christ his preaching was come, who was the eternal word of his Father. Plutarch of this subject wrote a Tract, searching much as a Philosopher what the cause of this strange change should be. After his acute search after sundry causes, and accurate Philosophical disputes, he refers it partly to the absence of the Demoniacal spirits, which he thinks might die, or remove from place to place, either banished by others more potent, or upon some other dislike: and partly unto the alteration of the soil wherein Oracles were seated, which yielded not exhalations of such Divine temper as in former times it had done; for, without a certain temperature of exhalations, or breathing of the earth, he thought that spirits could not give their Oracles, more than a Musician can play without an Instrument. Accordingly he expected, that Oracles should either come in use again in Greece, or else burst out in some convenient soil. But where have they thus burst out? Christianity chased them away wherever it came, and put those spirits to silence, which were afraid of the Christians in the primitive times, so, as those holy men could make them confesse they were Devils, and chase them out of such bodies as they had possessed, for the truth whereof Tertullian in his Apology appealeth to the consciences of the heathen themselves, and therefore he would not in so publick a defence produce an untruth which must have been notoriously known. Therefore the silence of the Oracles was not from any of those causes (which to one that hath opportunity are in themselves easie to be confuted); the truth was, the time was come wherein the strong mans house was to be entred, his goods spoiled, and himself bound; now the Prince of this world was to be cast out: Satan fell like lightning from Heaven upon the approach of that true light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

The great Pan that died was Christ
the true shepherd.

79. That notable story which Plutarch bringeth for confirmation of his opinion, concerning the Mortality of those Damoniackal spirits, maketh exceeding much for our purpose; if we consider the time thereof. Thamous the Egyptian Master, as he sayled, was requested by an uncouth voice uttered three times from land, to proclaim the news of Great Pan's death as he passed by Palodes. Thamous, whose name was unknown to his Passengers, till he answered to it at the third call, was resolved to have let all passe as a fancy or idle message, if the wind and tide should grant him passage by the place appointed: but, the wind failing him on a sudden, at his coming thither, he thought it but a little losse of breath to cry out aloud unto the shoar, as he had been requested, Great Pan is dead. The words, as Plutarch relateth, were scarce out of his mouth, before they were answered with a huge noise, as it had been of a multitude, sighing, and groaning at this wonderment. Now, if these spirits had been by nature mortal, as the Philosopher thought they were, the death of their Chief Captain could not have seemed so strange: but that a far greater than the greatest of them, by whose power the first of them had his being, should die to redeem his Enemies from their thralldom, might well seem a matter of astonishment, and deep sorrow unto them. The circumstance of the time will not permit us to doubt, but that under the known name of Pan was intimated the great shepherd of our Souls, who had then laid down his life for his flock; not the feigned son of Mercury and Penelope, as the Wise-men foolishly resolved Tiberius, who having had the truth of the story confirmed to him by ear-witnesses, called a convocation of wise-men to resolve him who this great Pan lately deceased should be. The Scriptures set forth unto us the true cause, why both the wild goatish Pan, and all the rest of that Hellish crew should at that time howl and mourn, seeing by our great shepherds death they were become Dead in Law; no more to breath in Oracles, but quite to be deprived of all such strange motions as they had seduced the ignorant World with before. All the Antick tricks of Fannus, the Satyrs, and such like Creatures were now put down; God had resolved to make a translation of his Church; and for this cause the Devils were forced to dissolve their old Chapels, and seek a new form of their Liturgy or Service. These passages are pregnant enough, though we allege not what Nicephorus reporteth, that the Oracle at Delphi (perhaps not just then extinct) said that this Pan was Παῖς Ἑβραῖος, an Hebrew Child; and though we omit what Suidas writeth, that Augustus sending to Pythia to inquire who should succeed him, had answer, that an Hebrew Child, Lord of the Gods, had commanded him to be gone down again to Hell, and therefore he must no more enquire there. Whereupon Augustus erected an Altar in the Capitol Primogenito Dei, To the first born of God.

80. But amongst other testimonies of the Heathen concerning Christ, that of the Sibyll's must not be omitted. These women were indued with extraordinary gifts of Prophecy, as certain previous pledges, that the Gentiles should also drink of the true, heavenly, and eternal Fountain. Like to those was Balaam the Midianite, an Idolater, yet called a Prophet by the Scriptures, who amongst other things foretold that a Star should rise out of Jacob, and a Scepter from Israel. There were many of these Sibyll's as we have already shewn, and several of them Prophecied of Christ. Their sayings were made much use of by such ancient Christians as had to do with Pagans, and Heathen Philosophers. (a) Justin Martyr telleth such, that the old, and every ancient Sibylla, of which Plato, Aristophanes, and others have made mention, spake of one God, and against Idolaters, as also of the coming of our Saviour Jesus Christ, plainly, and manifestly, and of his works. (b) Clemens also writeth of Hydaspes an ancient King of the Medes, who clearly foretold that the son of God should come. Concerning the Verses of Sibylla Erythraea many have written, and many of them are produced by Eusebius in the Oration (c) of Constantine to the Clergy, the Acrosticks whereof make up these words. * Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεός, &c. Jesus Christus Dei Filius, servator, crux, and foretell the last Judgement and Authority of Christ. There are others also cited by (d) Lactantius, which speak of Christ his coming into unjust hands, his being stricken on the head, and wearing a Crown of Thorns; the giving of him Vinegar, the renting of the veil of the Temple, and his being dead three dayes. Now some were of opinion of old, that these were feigned by Christians, as appeareth by what Constantine (or Eusebius for him) subjoyneth. But there are many that give no credence, such he, thereunto, although they confesse that Sibylla Erythraea was a Prophetesse: yea, they suspect that some of our religion not ignorant in Poetry, made these Verses, and that they are falsly inscribed, and reckoned among the Oracles of Sibylla: seeing they contain very profitable sentences, both to restrain the licentiousnesse of immoderate pleasure, and so perswade to a modest continency of life. But the truth of this matter doth manifestly appear, for our men have with great study so accurately compared the times, that none can suspect that this Poem was made, and came forth after Christs coming, and therefore they are convinced of falshood, who blaze abroad that these Verses were not made by this Sibylla. For it is manifest that Cicero, having read this Poem, did translate it into Latine, and joyned it to his works, who was afterward put to death by the Triumvir Antonius, and Antonius was overcome by Augustus, who reigned six and fifty years: Tiberius succeeded Augustus, in whose reign our Saviour came into the World, and the mystery of religion began to flourish, and the people were changed. Of which I suppose the chief of the Italian Poets hath thus sung.

81. He meaneth Virgil, whose Poem he reciteth concerning the Golden dayes foretold by Sibylla Cumæa (by which name the Romans called all the Sibylls, because of the old Cumana or Cumæa, whose Verses were burnt in the Capitol, in the 671 year of the Citie, and were supplied by other fetched from Erythraea, and elsewhere) as also concerning a Child that was to be born. He ascribeth to this Child such Divine things, as none can doubt, but that he must be above a man, whom Sibylla described by such expressions. Now that such Verses could be feigned by Christians none can affirm, but the grossly ignorant, who know not that Virgil died several years (viz. 18) before Christ was born. Neither can it be thought he feigned it on his own head, although we cannot say with Constantine or Eusebius, that he did thus mystically involve, and cover the truth, lest the Emperour should be offended with him for writing that which was contrary to their Laws, and Statutes established, concerning their Gods; or that we do believe that he foresaw the happy and glorious mystery of our Saviours coming: but that he might avoid their cruelty, and speak his audience in the accustomed manner. Some of late also have rejected the Poems ascribed to these women as feigned by Christians, because they seem to speak more plainly of Christ, than the true Prophets do, and exhibit rather an history of Christ already come, than a Prophecy of his coming.

coming. They think it contrary to the Word of God, to think that these profound mysteries should be more clearly propounded to the Gentiles than to the Jews. This also much moveth them (for we will confesse the utmost) that they perceive many of the antients in the most primitive times, to have counted it the choicest work they could perform, to help the heavenly truth by their fictions, whereby the new doctrine might more easily be admitted by the Pagan wise men. And as they cannot but most grievously reprehend this thing, so not sufficiently can they admire the judgment of those Fathers, who with such facility received these writings, and as doubt not to produce testimonies from them, to underprop the heavenly truth.

But in vain.

82. But it is answered by way of utter denial, that there were many in the Primitive times, who sought to establish the truth by fictions and lyes, and by challenge made for them to produce any one lye or fiction made or used by the most ancient Fathers, though for a good end. Certainly they which in their disputations with the Pagans, appeal to the testimony of the Sibylls, deserve great commendations for their prudence. And hence may it be proved, that those testimonies were not forged, because they in all conflicts more willingly had recourse to them than to any other. For, can we imagine them fools, with whom these Fathers had to do? They were as cunning and knowing as the best; they were Philosophers, Rhetors, Professors of Arts, States-men, and most commonly such as enjoyed the greatest honours. Where is it objected by any of these in the most Primitive times, that these testimonies were feigned by Christians? This answer would have been easie and ready; and such as would instantly have stopped the mouths of Primitive Saints. But the wisest and bitterest of the Enemies of Christians, do not make any such reply, in the most antient times, knowing well enough these Oracles, to which the Romans had ever recourse, and which were known sufficiently to the whole World, through which it ran for current, that in the Books of the Sibylls was held forth, that one should reign who came out of the East. The clearnesse of these testimonies concerning Christ, can make nothing against them; for Esa as spake not more evidently of Christ than Balaam, who said, that a Star should rise out of Jacob. Who dare prescribe to God a manner of prophesying? as if it were not free to him to speak plainly or obscurely to Jew or Gentile, or as if there were not in the Scripture most clear predictions concerning Christ. But grant that the Sibylline Oracles are clearer. Ought not those things which are predicted to the Gentiles concerning Christ to be clearer, because they wanted Moses, and the rest of that learning, which should direct them unto him, that what here was wanting might be supplied by the perspicuity of these Oracles? Although we ought not to judge of these Oracles, by that light which at present appeareth. For, what things are most evident to us after the accomplishment, were most obscure when they were predicted. If any one had feigned them, he would have made them industriously more obscure, that they might seem written before the things were done, and like to those Prophecies which are contained in the Scriptures. These Heathen Prophets spake sometimes clearly, according to the intention of God, who overruled them; but often abruptly. It's thought they prophesied as of old Balaam's Ass spoke, and not otherwise did Hydaspes and the Sibylls speak clearly of the coming of Christ, the Holy Spirit moving them, and governing their tongues. It appeareth (a) from Iustin Martyr that it was forbidden upon pain of death to read Hydaspes, Sibylla or the Prophets, lest the People should attain to the knowledge of good things. To these (b) Clemens bringeth in St. Paul himself referring the Greeks: Take ye also the Greek Books, acknowledge Sibylla that she manifested one God, and things to come. Take ye also Hydaspes, read him; and you shall find the Son of God more clearly and openly described.

83. To omit what might be (and by others hath been) produced out of * Heathen Writers concerning the blessed Trinity (for we may easily admit, that God, who was ever the God of the whole World, and designed to do the Gentiles good also in the knowledge of himself, might give to them such hints of the truth, as afterwards might be improved for their welfare) we shall come to the last testimony concerning Christ, and that such an one, as will reduce us to the course of our design. After that Christ was risen from the dead, and had sent his Disciples about to preach and work miracles for the conversion of the World, Pilate who then governed in Judæa, reported his Passion and Resurrection to Tiberius and the Senate, with the miracles done by him, or by them in his name, and how the multitude of believers daily increasing, he was accounted a God. Tiberius hereupon reported the matter to the Senate, with his favourable suffrage, that Christ might be accounted a God. But the Senate because they were displeased that they had not first moved it, refused to canonize him, and by an Edict commanded that Christians should be banished the City; especially by reason that Seianus the great minister of State most obstinately contradicted this Religion. But Tiberius by another Edict threatened death to the accusers of Christians. These things thus related by (a) Orosius, are also witnessed by (b) Eusebius, Tertullian, (a) Lib. 7. c. 4. and Justin Martyr, whereof, the testimonies of the two later are incontrollable; for in their Apologies they durst not mention such things, and cite such testimonies as they must needs know would be easily confuted. (b) Ecc. Hist. l. 2. c. 2.

84. (a) Tertullian writeth, that Tiberius referred it to the Senate, with the prerogative of his own suffrage, but they having not approved the thing, refused it. Caesar notwithstanding remained firm in his resolution, and threatened such as should accuse the Christians. This he openly asserteth in his Apology to the Pagans, writing also in another (b) place of the same excellent Work, that Pilate, who in his heart believed in Christ, at the same time wrote all the History of him to the Emperour Tiberius, whereupon the Caesar's themselves had worshipped our Master, if their Government in so doing had been consistent with the men of this World, and Christians permitted to have been saluted Caesars. He giveth another reason, why Christ was not at first worshipped as a God. There was an ancient Law that forbade introducing new ceremonies into Religion, as worshipping strange Deities, unlesse approved by the Senate; and this was an unviolable and unalterable Law, to which the Prince himself was subject. He instanceth, that Marcus Æmilius would have had divine honours rendered to his Idol, called the god Albarnus, but could not obtain it. As for Justin Martyr, he maketh it more evident, telling plainly the Pagans in his second Aplogy, that they may know these things thus to have been, in the Acts which were written under Pontius Pilate, and again, that they might know, that Christ wrought such miracles, from the Acta (or Acts) made under Pontius Pilate. Now the word Acta signifieth sometimes the Journal Book of the Senate, then called Acta Senatus, and otherwhiles the Records of the People, or of the Publick, then named Acta Publica, Diurna, and Urbana. In the former sort was contained whatsoever was done or said by the Fathers. In the later things concerning the People, as Publick Judgments, punishments, Assemblies, buildings, nativities, the death of eminent persons, mariages, and divorces. These afforded matter for Historians to digest and adorn. Now Justin Martyr either meaneth those Acta Publica, wherein might be recorded what notable things hapned in the Provinces; and set under the administration of the several Deputies or Governours: or rather those Acta which Pilate himself composed in his Province. For we cannot but imagine, that care would be taken for the recording of things memorable, as well in other places as in the City it self. The Provinces had their Subcensors and their Tables. And the Presidents and Deputies not onely certified by letters occasionally what happened, but, as we may easily apprehend, did refer in Acta all memorable things; which were sent to Rome, and there, it's probable, either transcribed into, or laid up with, the Acta Publica. But, thus much of the testimonies of Jews and Heathens concerning Christ.

ascended into Heaven, and sent down the Holy Ghost upon his Disciples, according to his promise, for the furnishing of them to the Work, ten dayes after his ascension. Many being converted to the Faith, the Church increased, and living in Love and Unity together, they had all things common, none calling any thing his own which he possessed. About the end of the year, as is rationally computed, the Greeks or Hellenists (Jews which living out of Judaea spake Greek in a peculiar dialect, which is called Hellenistick, and used the Scriptures in their Synagogues in that language) murmured against the Hebrews (or those who both read and spoke Hibrew) for that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations. Hereupon the Apostles committed it to the number of the faithful, to chuse seven men who should take care of what was gathered for the poor, and these Ecclesiastical Writers call Deacons. About this time James the Apostle the son of Alphaeus (who is also called the brother of the Lord, and was surnamed Just) was created the first Bishop of Jerusalem. For thus Clemens wrote in the sixth Book of his Hypotyposicon, as he is cited by Eusebius. Peter, and James, and John, though they were preferred, after the ascension of the Lord, contended not amongst themselves for glory and honour; but with one consent appointed James the Just Bishop of Jerusalem. The same Clemens in his first Book, distinguished thus concerning the two which bore the name of James. There were two

James, the one termed Just, who was thrown down headlong from the pinnacle, and brained with a Fullers club, the other beheaded. Of him that was called Just, Paul made mention, saying: I saw none of the Apostles save James the brother of the Lord. In the year following Christ's resurrection, a great persecution was raised by the Jews against the Church, wherein Stephen one of the seven Deacons and the Protomartyr was stoned to death, by the procurement especially of Saul a Jew of Tarsus in Cilicia. But in this same year as this Saul was journeying to Damascus to make havock of the Church, he was converted, and called to the Apostleship, after which he went from Damascus into Arabia, as he himself testifieth in his Epistle to the Galathians. Eusebius in his Chronicon placeth the conversion of Saul (afterwards called Paul) in the nineteenth year of Tiberius.

Pilate making a slaughter of the Samarians,

86. About this time it happened, that a certain man who sought by all means the favour of the multitude, drew the Samarians to Mount Gerizim (which they accounted holy above all other mountains) promising to shew them there the holy Vessels buried in a certain place by Moses. Many had gathered themselves to the foot of the hill, where staying for more company that they might ascend all together, Pilate prevented them, and killing some, took many, dispersed the rest, and put to death the chief of those he had taken. Hereof the Senate of Samaria complained to Vitellius President of Syria, who sent Marcellus his friend to take charge of Judaea, and commanded Pilate to go to Rome, there to answer before Cesar what should be laid to his charge. Hereupon he departed, after he had governed Judaea ten years, but ere he reached Rome, Tiberius was dead. About the same time that these things hapned in Samaria, the Jews were banished Rome by the Emperour upon this occasion. A certain Jew flying his native Country for breaking of the Laws, came to the City, where he professed himself an expounder of them, and drew to him two or three no lesse reprobate than himself. They made a Profelyte Fulvia the wife of Saturninus an honourable person, and persuading her to send some Purple and Gold to the Temple of Jerusalem, converted it to their own use. Saturninus complaining of this to Tiberius, he thereupon commanded all Jews to depart Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and lifted 4000 men, whom they sent into Sardinia, and punished many that refused to bear arms, upon no other account, than because they would not transgresse the Ordinances of their Country.

The Jews banished Rome.

Philip the Tetrarch dieth.

87. About two years after the death of Christ, died Philip the Tetrarch; son to Herod the Great, a man of a modest and quiet disposition, whose Principality, for that he died without issue, Tiberius laid unto the Province of Syria. By this time Artabanus King of Parthia prospering against his neighbours, neighbours was much putted up, and despising the old age of Tiberius, when his son Arcadius was dead made his other son Arfaces King of Armenia in his stead. He also reviled Tiberius by Letters, objecting parricide, murders, laziness, and luxury to him, and willed him by a voluntary death to satisfy the most just hatred of his subjects, as soon as possible. But many Noble men of Parthia, to escape his cruelty came to Rome, and desired a King from Tiberius, who thereupon gladly named Phraates the son of Phraates that had been of a long time Hostage at Rome, and he dying in Syria, he commended to them Tiridates. Mithridates brother to Pharasmenes King of the Hiberi was also ordered to get Armenia, who breaking into it joyned the Albanians to him, and procured the death of Arfaces; for the Parthians were easily overthrown, being discouraged by a false rumour of the death of Orodes their Captain, another of Ariabannus his sons. Ariabannus having before this attempted Cappadocia, sent also to demand the Treasure which Vonones had left in Syria and Cilicia, and that had been seized by Tiberius, * who with great perfidiousness killed the owner at Antioch; and he further demanded the ancient Borders of the Persians and Macedonians, bragging that he would invade whatsoever had been possessed by Cyrus and Alexander. But Vitellius the President of Syria having drawn many of his subjects from their trust, his mind so changed, that he fled away cowardly with a few to the confines of Scythia. Vitellius taking the opportunity carried Tiridates into the Kingdom, but he by delaying to seize on the chiefest places, and hastening his Coronation, gave occasion to some of the great ones again to fly unto Ariabannus, who coming on, the other fled as fast back into Syria; so that he recovered his Kingdom, with Armenia, and resolved to set upon Syria.

Caiphas deposed.

88. Tiberius hereupon wrote to Vitellius to make a peace with him. Vitellius about this time was come to Jerusalem after the expulsion of Pilate, where he celebrated the Passover, remitted to the Citizens the Impost upon such fruits as were sold, and deposed Joseph, surnamed Caiphas, from the High-Priesthood, to which he promoted Jonathan the son of Annas. He met with Ariabannus upon a bridge built over the River Euphrates, where they concluded a peace, and afterwards they were feasted by Herod the Tetrarch. Darius the son of Ariabannus was sent an Hostage to Rome with many presents. But Tiberius died before, (March 16) having since the death of Sejanus cruelly raged against many, and lived dissolutely from his retirement to the Island Caprea, whence he never returned to the Citie, though he was twice on his way. The people ran up and down, overcome with joy upon the report of his death. Some would have had his body cast into Tiber, and others prayed that no other place might be assigned him now dead than amongst the wicked. He reigned 22 years, seven moneths and odd dayes, and died in the 78th year of his age, and the 79<sup>o</sup> of the Citie, Cn. Acerronius Proculus, and C. Pontius Nigrinus being Consuls.

CHAP. II.

From the death of Tiberius to that of Nero, the last Emperour of Caesar's family, containing the space of 20 years.

1. TIBERIUS left behind him a Grand-son of his own name by his son Drusus, yet he preferred before him Caius the son of Germanicus, either for some reason fetcht (a) from Astrology to which he was much given, or through the means (b) of Macro his Freed-man, and greatest favourite, who being a loose and vile person, Caius insinuated himself into his favour by the procurement of his wife. With her Caius was wantonly familiar, liar, and promised her marriage by an Oath, and under his hand, if he could compass the Empire, wherewith Macro was well pleased, if so be he could but therewith purchase greater preferment. 'Tis reported that he helped his Master forward by stifling him in the bed-cloths. Others have thought (c) that a slow-working poyson was given him by Caius; some that meat was denied him, & others that when he demanded his Ring which they had pulled off from his finger, they choked him with the Pillow. However it came to passe, Caius succeeded him, and some (d) judged him willing that so it should be, because he knew he would prove a very bad man, and hoped that thereby the faults of his own reign might be somerthing covered. He was received with great applause by all men. By the Army, for that he had been brought up continually amongst them. Some say he was born in the Camp; 'tis certain that the surname of Caligula he had for that reason, because he was wont (f) to wear that habit of the ordinary Soldiers. By the people he was gladly entertained out of their affection to Germanicus, and commiseration of his family so grossly used by Tiberius, whose cruelty he escaped meerly by his great dissimulation, and taking in good part every thing; so as it was said truly of him, that never was there a better servant, nor a worse Master than Caligula.

Preferreth Agrippa.

2. Caius, within a few dayes after the sumptuous funeral of Tiberius, made Agrippa King of that Countrey whereof Philip had been Tetrarch. This Agrippa was the Grand-son of Herod the Great by his son Aristobulus whom he put to death, being begotten of Berenice the daughter of Selaue. Having run through many straights for want of money by reason of his great profutenesse, he became at length very dear to Caius, who restored him to liberty (being imprisoned by Tiberius for wishing his death, that Caligula might succeed him) and then set the Diadem on his head. He had a sister named Herodias, married to Philip Herodes (not Philip the Tetrarch) his, and her Uncle, and brother to Philip Antipas on the father's side, his mother being daughter to Simon the High-Priest. This woman Herod Antipas was so taken with, that though he had already to wife the daughter of Aretas King of Arabia Petraa, yet he divorced this, and married her, upon which account Aretas made War upon him, and defeated his forces, which * was taken by the people as a judgement of God upon him for putting to death John Baptist. Now Herodias envying exceedingly the promotion of her brother Agrippa, importuned her husband to go to Rome and beg, or buy the title of King. Agrippa smelling out their design beforehand, wrote to Caius, and accused him of having heretofore been of Seianus his conspiracy, and of favouring at present the party of Artabanus King of Parthia, whereof he said his Magazines could testifie, being furnished with Provisions for 70000 men of War. This furniture he could not deny, and therefore Caius banished him to Lugdunum (now Lyon) in Gall (whither Herodias would needs accompany him) and gave his Principality and estate unto Agrippa. Thus were these two punished for the death of John Baptist; and so was Pilate for that of Christ. For, being also banished by Caius to Vienna, two years after he killed himself (whereof the Grecians are witnesses, saith Eusebius, who commit to memory in their Histories the Olympiads of times) and so became the revenger of his wickednesse upon himself, as he who betrayed Christ into his hands had been before.

3. Though the disposition of Caligula was from his Childhood tending to intemperance and cruelty, yet at his first coming to the Government he used much moderation and equity, as well towards publick as private persons. He would not hear any accusations, though said to be for his own safety, permitted free and ancient Jurisdiction to Magistrates, attempted to bring in again the Comitia, and restore the privilege of suffrages to the people, payed the Legacies given by Tiberius, though his will was nulled, and those given by Livia also, though her son would never discharge them: he remitted part of the Taxes to Italy, relieved the necessities of such as received losses by fire, and to such Kings as he restored, he gave the Tributes collected in their absence. At first he appeared a great Patron of virtue, but degenerated into a Monster, so that as far as a man could go in luxury and cruelty he seemed to proceed, which made Seneca * say, that nature seemed to have brought him forth to shew what the greatest viciousness backed with the greatest power could be able to do. We may be more favourable to this opinion, if we consider that the greatness of his estate made him so far surpass the limits of all modesty, as challenging to himself the title of Divinity, he governed all things in contempt of God.

4. He thought at first to have taken a Diadem, and changed his Principality into a Kingdom, till by his flatterers he was told, that he was above all such titles. At length he began to take to himself Divine honour. For he caused the images of their Gods to be brought to Rome, whereof the heads being taken off, the image of his own was placed upon each in their stead. He would offer himself to be adored amongst his brother gods as he called them, and ordained Temples and Priests with sacrifice of no commoner things than Peacocks, Turkeys, and Pheasants, which were to be offered every day; and he invited the Moon to his embraces. He could not endure to be accounted the off-spring of Agrippa, because of his ignobility; but gave out that his mother was conceived of the incest of Augustus with his daughter Julia. He himself committed incest with all his sisters, and spared not the chastity of either Sex. So imperious he was, that he would make persons of greatest rank run by his Chariot, and stand girt with Towels when he was at meat. So cruel, that he killed his Grand-mother Antonia by unkindness, he murdered his brother Tiberius, though he had adopted him, with all his kindred except his Uncle Claudius, whom he preserved for a laughing stock; and he forced Macro and Ennia to kill themselves. As for others, he made havock of them, causing some to be knocked in the head with Clubs, if he were but disturbed in the shows. He would cast old men, or infirm, to wild beasts, and shutting up the Barns and Store-houses proclaimed a famine. Many of quality being first stigmatized he condemned to the Mines, or to repairing of High-ways, shut them up like beasts in a Den, or sawed them asunder; and that for no greater matters than if they had not high thoughts of his gifts and shews, or had not sworn by his Genius.

His Vices.

5. He forced Parents to be present at the death of their Children. To one that excused himself by sickness, he sent a Litter to carry him. A certain Knight whom he cast to wild beasts, crying out that he was innocent, he caused to be taken out, and his tongue to be cut out of his head, after this to be cast in again. Demanding of one whom he had recalled out of banishment what he did all that time? upon answer that he prayed for the death of Tiberius, and that he might succeed him, supposing that all whom he had banished prayed also for his death, he gave command that they should all be killed. He would suffer none to be put to death but by degrees, that so as he said they might feel themselves die. He sorely afflicted the order of Knights, and being incensed against the multitude for favouring a party against him, he wished that the People of Rome had but one neck. He was wont openly to complain of the condition of his time, because not signalized by any publick calamity, and how by the serenity thereof he should be buried in oblivion (his being herein contrary to the disposition of Phalaris) in so much as he would wish for some overthrow of the Armies, some Famine, Pestilence, Fire, or Earth-quake. He purposed utterly to destroy the works of Virgil and Livy, and take away the Law. He took away honour from families, and when he met with any beautiful person made them as deformed as he could. He was so prodigal that he would drink most precious Pearls dissolved in Vinegar, and invent all sorts of delicacies, by which course he spent infinite sums in the space of three years, which Tiberius had hoarded up; and to recruit his Coffers raised unheard-of Tributes. Amongst other means for increasing his revenue he set up stews in his Palace, and some were sent about to invite all sorts of men to them, such as came being commended for increasing Cesar's revenues. He purposed to depart to Antium and thence to Alexandria, but first to kill all the chief both of the Senatorial and Equestrian rank; and answerably hereunto were there found after his death two Books, whereof the title of one was Gladius, or Sword; and the other Pugio, or Dagger, wherein were writtē the names of such as he intended to murder. A great chest also was found full of divers poisons, which being by Claudius his appointment cast into the Sea, the water is reported to have been so infected, that the fish was therewith killed, and was cast up by the tide upon the shoar. These things are reported by Suetonius, concerning which Author yet it is observed by some, that he wrote the lives of the Emperours with as great liberty as they lived them.

He is slain by Cassius Chereas the Captain of his Guard.

6. Many desired to have an hand in removing him, yet durst not attempt any thing. But Cassius Chereas the Captain of his Guard being grievously affronted by him (for ever when Caius gave him the watch-word, it should be some effeminate or obscene name, and he continually charged him with cowardize) fully resolved to kill him, and broke the business to others, whom he thought to have the same desire with himself. They killed him as he returned from the games of the Palace to refresh himself, Chereas giving him the first wound. His guard of Germans (which loved him exceedingly, because of the profit they reaped from the execution of his cruel commands) in a great rage killed all they could meet in the Palace, and with much ado were kept from putting thousands to death, that were now assembled in the theatre. Nay the common People allured by his shows and largesses, endeavoured to find out the authors of his death, to whom Valerius Asiaticus (who had been Consul) coming forth whilst they were in an uproar, and every one inquired who had done the deed, O, said he, I wish I had done it. Being once advised to beware of a Cassius, he suspected Cassius Longinus the Proconsul of Asia (of the same family with Cassius one of the murderers of Julius Caesar) and sending for him, put him to death, never thinking that Chereas had also that name. Having reigned three years and ten months with eight dayes, and lived 29, he thus died, on the ninth before the Calends of February, in the 794 year of the City, and the 42 after the birth of Christ, hee himself the fourth time, and C. Sextius Saturninus being Consuls.

7. The Senate now, as Josephus telleth us, thought of resuming the ancient form of Government, though it was utterly impracticable, Saturninus the Consul especially sticking for it. But the Soldiers rightly judging, that such an Empire could not be ruled in a Popular way, and especially looking at their own advantages, resolved the contrary. Tiberius Claudius Drusus, brother to Germanicus Caesar, and son to Drusus (by Antonia the younger, the daughter of Antony the Triumvir and of Octavia the sister of Augustus) was yet living. Him they judging most fit to succeed his Nephew, pulled him out of an hole where he had hid himself to save his life, and straight-way declared him Emperour. He was at first discouraged by the messages of the Senate, but again took heart, at the counsel and directions of King Agrippa, so that the Senators despairing of successe, gave over their enterprize, but not without (some of them) seeking the Sovereignty for themselves, which would have produced as great slaughters and desolations as ever, had any of them obtained liberty to prosecute their desires. The People were for Claudius his preferment, envying the Senate it's ancient power, and making account by the Sovereignty of one to be sheltered from it's avarice. Hereby also they thought to avoid such Civil Wars as fell out amongst the great ones in the time of Pompey. The wiser sort knew that it was impossible the Commonwealth should subsist but under Monarchy: some one they were sure would establish himself, and that through desolations, confusions, and slaughters, they must come to it at last. Self-preservation therefore and publick interest easily led them to the next heir, who by his birth could challenge an interest. For hereditary Monarchies, by preserving due reverence, excluding emulations and contentions amongst equals, by preventing numerous pretensions, and the extravagant grandeur of divers families, can only secure the Peace and prosperity of their Subjects.

8. Claudius

Putreth to death Chareas. 8. Claudius promised the Soldiers a donative upon their taking an oath to defend his person and authority. Then put he to death Chareas and others that killed Caius, as a means to secure his own person; but in reference to the Senate buried all things in oblivion, and behaved himself moderately and civilly. He confirmed Agrippa in his Kingdom, and enlarged his dominions by an addition of Judea and Samarina, which heretofore belonged to his grandfather. And he further bestowed on him Abila, and the Principality of Libanus, which had belonged to Dysunias; moreover upon his desire he granted to his brother Herod the Kingdom of Chalcis, and at the request of both, published favourable Edicts in behalf of the Jews, who groaned under the persecution of Caius. This Agrippa (called also Herod by St. Luke) labouring all manner of ways to gratifie the Jews, killed James the brother of John, and shut up Peter in prison, intending to bring him forth to the People after the Passover, but he was miraculously delivered by an Angel. A just punishment from God overtook Agrippa not long after: For having begun to build the walls of Jerusalem, when upon complaint of Marcus President of Syria, he was forbidden by Claudius, he descended to Cesarea, there to celebrate games in honour of Cesar. Being clothed with a robe of silver, which glittered exceedingly by the reflection of the Sun-beams, he rejected not the flatteries of those who ascribed to him divine honours, and was presently seized by a pain in his guts, and being eaten with worms, gave up the ghost within five dayes, after he had reigned seven years in all, and three over Judea. His Kingdom was not committed to his son by reason of his youth (for he was but seventeen years old) and therefore Cuspius Fadus was sent to govern it. Idem c. 11.

Inlargeth the Dominions of Agrippa. Whom vengeance overtaken for the death of James. Claudius restored also Mithridates the Iberian to his Kingdom, whom Caius had imprisoned. On another Mithridates (descended from Mithridates the Great King of Pontus) he bestowed the Kingdom of Bosphorus (giving one part of Cilicia to Polemo in requital) and another part of this Country to Antiochus with Commagena; for he had also been deprived of this his Kingdom by Caius. But the Lycians and Rhodians he deprived of their liberty. The former, for that they had raised a Sedition, wherein some Romans had been slain, and the later, because they had crucified some of them. About this time the Britains were very tumultuous, for the reducing of whom to obedience, he sent A. Plantius in his second year, with an Army out of Gall. Josephus ut sup. pra c. 4, 5.

The Britains tumultuous.

10. Since the time of Julius Caesar, the Romans had attempted nothing upon Britain. Augustus seemeth of purpose to have neglected it, counting it policy to keep the Roman Empire within it's bounds; to wit, the Ocean, the Rivers Ister and Euphrates, limits set by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine (for so he himself speaketh in Julian) or invincible, and not miscary through it's too great bulck and burthen. Strabo is of opinion, that he despised it, seeing no cause to fear, nor hope of much profit from the Britans; and yet it seemed that no small danger would be presented from other Nations lying about the said Island. But at length he departed from Rome with a purpose to transfer the War into Britain; but when he was come into Gall, the Britains pacified him by Ambassadors, and having obtained his amicy, dedicated presents and oblations in the Capitol. They brought the Island now familiar to the Romans, and endured taxes and imposts, which saith Strabo, are now nothing grievous to them, being raised out of such merchandise and commodities as are shipped to and fro out of Gall and Britain: those be Ivory works, bits and bridles, chains and wearthes, Vessels of Electrum and glasse, with other base and common wares of like sort. And therefore there needs no Garrison for this Island. For it would require one Legion at least, and some Horsemen, if tributes were to be levied from thence, and the said tributes would but countervail the charges of maintaining a Garrison there; for of necessity, by imposing a tribute, the revenues coming by collage and poundage, and suchlike imposts, would be lesse: and if any violent course were used, some penil or other must be expected. The year following following also Augustus intended a second Expedition into Britain, because there was some variance about the Covenants: but by occasion of some insurrections made in Spain by the Cantabri and others, that journey was failed.

11. Tiberius nothing transported with an inordinate desire of enlarging the Empire, seemeth to have rested in that counsel of Augustus; For he brought out a Book written with Augustus his own hand, wherein was contained the whole wealth and estate of the Commonwealth, what number as well of Roman Citizens as Allies were in Arms, how many Navies, Kingdoms, and Provinces, what tributes and imposts belonged to the State, with a resolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the same bounds. Which advise and resolution of Augustus contented him so well, that, as Tacitus reporteth, he would attempt nothing in Britain, nor maintain any Garrison or Deputies there. For, whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what Coasts and Countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it seemeth, that the Britains entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the same time Germanicus sailed the Ocean, some of his Company being by force of Tempest driven to this Island, were by the Princes thereof sent back again. That Caius Caesar cast in his mind to enter this Island is certain: but by his shittle brain, sudden repentance, and wonderful attempts against Germany it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of some mighty piece of work, he made a bridge between Baia and the Piles of Puteoli, three miles and 600 paces in length. But having achieved no greater exploit, than received to grace Ad-minius the son of Cynobellinus King of the Britans (who being by his Father banished, had fled over Sea with a small power and train about him) he sent magnificent and glorious letters to Rome, as if the whole Isle had been yielded up into his hands: warning and wishing the Posts to ride forward directly into the Forum and Curia, and in no wise to deliver the said missives unto the Consuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent Assembly of the Senate.

Britenbuis.

12. After this to the Ocean he marched, as if he minded to translate the War over into Britain. There upon the shoar he embattelled his Soldiers: he himself took Sea in a Gally, and having lanchd forth a little from the Land, returned again. Then mounting an high scaffold, he sate him down, and gave his Soldiers the sign for batrel, and commanding the Trumpets to sound, on a sodain charged them to gather Cockles, Muskles, and other small shell-fishes. Having gotten these spoils he waxed proud, as if he had conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded his Soldiers, he brought some of these shell-fishes to Rome, to shew the booty he had gotten. In token and memorial of this great achievement, he caused to be built a brave high Turret, out of which as from a watch-tower, there might blaze all night long lights, and fires, for the better direction of Sea-men. The ruines hereof are some times seen at a low-water on the shoar of Holland, by the People inhabiting thereabouts, called Britenbuis, that is, the Brutish house, who also find oftentimes stones ingraven with letters: of which one had these characters, C. C. P. F. which they expound thus, Caius Caligula Pharum Fecit, that is, Caius Caligula made this Pharos (or Watch-tower) so called, I suppose, from that notable one, and one of the Worlds wonders, built by Ptolomy Philadelphus in the Island Pharos, from which <sup>a</sup> some would have the ancient Kings of Egypt called Pharaohs. It is probable, that this Watch-tower afterward being repaired by Septimus Severus, became a Granary for reception of Corn, which was brought out of Britain, whence it might take it's name of Britenbuis. For Zozimus writeth, saith Cambden, that Corn was wont to be brought out of Britain by ships to this place, and thence with barges and boats haled up the Rhene against the stream, to serve the Roman Garrisons: seeing that Julian the Emperour built Garrisons, as Marcellus saith, wherein might be inned and kept the Corn, that the Britains usually transported thither.

13. But, afterwards the inland parts of Britain wasted rather with Civil Wars and Factions than by the force of the Romans, came by little and little subjected to them. Some making choice of their protection swore allegiance to them, and practised by all means to subject their Native Country unto their government. The principal of these fugitives was one Bericus, who moved, and perswaded Claudius to give the attempt upon Britain, which none assayed to do since the time of Julius Caesar, and which then was up in a broil and commotion, for that the said Fugitives were not rendered again unto them. Claudius therefore in his second year ordered A. Plautius the Prator to passe over out of Gall, who having by the means of Narcissus quieted the Soldiers that refused to make War without the compasse of the World, overthrew several times the sons of Cynobellinus. His Lieutenant was Flavius Vespasian, who behaved himself very gallantly in the service. But Claudius in his fourth year being very ambitious of a triumph (as not contenting himself with triumphal Ensigns decreed to him by the Senate) without a just cause pitched upon Britain as yet seditious, because their Fugitives were not restored. Sailing from Ostia, he was twice in danger of shipwrack, once near Liguria, and again near the Islands Stachades (four or five in the French Sea near Languedoc and Provence) wherefore from Massilia (now Marseils in Provence) he went by Land as far as Gessoriacum (now Bologne) and thence passing into the Island subdued part of it, and amongst other Towns Amalotinum (now Maldon) the regal seat of Cynobellinus, with the Orcades. Dio writeth, that at his first landing he defeated the Barbarians in battel. But Suetonius saith, he performed these acts without a battel, and the losse of one drop of blood. Having been divers times saluted Imperator (a thing directly saith Dio against the Roman custom; for lawfull it is not in one War to assume that title oftner than once) he disarmed the Britains, and committing as well the government of these, as the War with the other (not yet subdued) to Plautius he hasted to Rome in the sixth moneth, sending before him Pompey and Silanus his sons-in-law with tidings of the victory.

Passing thither himself subdueth part of it.

Suetonius ut supra cap. 17.

14. So great a matter it was, and of such consequence to have Conquered even so small a parcel of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in honour of Claudius, yearly Games with triumphal Arches, both at Rome, and also at Gessoriacum in Gall, and a most honourable and stately Triumph. To the beholding hereof Governours of Provinces, and some banished persons also were permitted to come to the Citie: a naval Crown was fixed on the loover of the Palace, as the Ensign of the British Sea subdued by him: the Provinces brought in Crowns of Gold, and Gallia Comata one above the rest weighing nine pounds: and the hither part of Spain, another of seven pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitol by the stairs on his knees, supported, and heaved up by his sons-in-law on either side. He entred in Triumphant wise the Adriatick Sea, embarked in a Vessel more like some exceeding great house than a ship. Unto his wife Messalina was allowed the highest place to sit in, as also to ride in a Carroch or hanging Coach. After this he set forth triumphal playes and Games, being made Consul for that purpose. The solemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when he was gone aside from the fight, others had the charge thereof. Horse races for the prize he promised as many as those dayes would admit. Howbeit, above ten there were not; for between every course of Horses Bears were killed, Champions performed their duties, and choice boyes sent for out of Asia, danced the warlike dance in Armour. Upon Valerius Asiaticus, Julius Silanus, Sidius Geta, and others, in regard of this Conquest, he heaped triumphal Ornaments. He suffered Licinius Crassus Frugi to follow after himself in this triumph, mounted upon a trapped Courser with a rich caparison, and arrayed in a Robe of Date-tree work. Upon Posidius the Eunuch he bestowed a spear staff without an head: upon C. Gavius chains, bracelets, horse-trappings, and a Coronet of Gold; as is to be seen in an ancient Marble at Taurinum.

Extraordinary expressions of joy at Rome.

15. In the mean time Aulus Plautius went on with the reliques of the War in Britain, and sped so well, that Claudius passed a decree that he should enter Rome in Ovant Triumph: and when he was entered into the Citie, he himself went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way. Vespasian, partly under Claudius, and partly under Plautius, fought thirty battels with the Enemy; subdued also two most mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Isle of Vetis or Wight. For those exploits he received triumphal Ornaments, and within a short space two sacerdotal Dignities, with a Consulship which he bore the two last moneths of the year. Titus also served in quality of a Tribune under his father with exceeding commendations for his industry and valour (for he valiantly delivered his father when besieged) and no lesse repute of his modest carriage say some, as appeareth by a number of his images and titles to them annexed, throughout the Provinces of Germany and Britain. About this time a new Island appeared in the Aegean Sea named Thia near to Hiera, which 110 years before it first also sprung up: And both of them lay betwixt Thira and Therasia, which in like manner 130 years before the Original of Hiera were first seen amongst the Cyclades.
16. Two or three years after this, Claudius being certifiel that his wife Messalina (the most unchast of all women) had openly married C. Silius, he animadverted upon her and her minions. About the same time Herod the King of Chalcis dying, he bestowed that Kingdom upon Herods Nephew Agrippa the younger, for Judaea his father's Kingdom was still governed by Deputies. Tiberius Alexander, who succeeded Fadus, now gave place to Cumanus, under whom the Jews, being affronted at the Passover by impudent and lawey Soldiers, murined, but now, as ever, came to the worst: and not long after their Countrey-men that dwelt at Rome were expelled thence by Claudius, and under their name as many think the Christians also. In the nineteene year of his reign he married Agrippina his own Neice by his brother Germanicus, through the perswasion of Pallas his Freedman, which woman presently as soon as she perceived her strength procured his daughter Octavia to be given in marriage to Domitius Nero her son by her former husband Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus. The maid was formerly contracted to L. Silanus an eminent young man, but he accused by Pitellius was put out of his Pratorship, and the match was broken betwixt him and the Princess, whereupon he shortly after killed himself. And a year after was Claudius perswaded by Pallas to adopt Nero his wife's son, though he had a son of his own, by name Britannicus, but two years younger. Pallas was so high flown in favour, that he procured his brother Felix to be sent Governour into Samaria, and afterwards got his power extended to Judaea, Galile, and Perea, where he acted the part of a Tyrant, and having married several great Ladies, obtained also Drusilla sister to Agrippa. The Parthians now again at variance amongst themselves, and wearied with the Tyranny of Gatarzes, asked a Prince from Rome. Claudius sent them Mithridates the son of Vonones, and Grandson of Phraates; but he was presently betrayed into the hands of Gatarzes. At this time also the Britains rebelled.
17. Now was P. Ostorius Proprator there, upon whose first coming the Britains grew confident, as contemning him for his want of experience. The Winter being begun they made excursions into the Territories of the Allies of Rome. He knowing that the first event would either incourage or amate them, set upon, and scattered them, then went about to disarm all such as he had reason to suspect; but the Iceni (inhabiting those parts now called Sussex, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingtonshire) a strong Nation, refusing to submit, drew others in to them, and pitching upon a very convenient ground gave battel to the Romans, who by reason that they despaired of pardon, had much ado to overcome them. By this foil of the Iceni, others before unseled were contained in obedience, and Ostorius led his Army against the Cassii (a people living towards the Irish Sea) and walling their grounds had passed on well nigh to the Irish Sea, when he was recalled by the discord discord of the Brigantes (people inhabiting the North part of that now called England) the Ring-leaders of whom, when he had taken off, the rebellion was extinguished. But the Silures (inhabiting Southwales) would by no means be either allured or discouraged from waging War, trusting to the strength of Caractacus the greatest Prince amongst the Britains, who excelling as well in policy as the knowledge of the Countrey, transferred the War into the Territories of the Ordovices (now Northwales) as more convenient for him by reason of the Mountains and Rocks. Here he made a speech to his Officers, putting them in mind how their Ancestors had repulsed Caesar the Dictator, and willing them to behave themselves at this time as the beginning of their liberty or eternal slavery. Till they came to strokes the Romans had the worst of it; but afterwards breaking into the Rampires they easily routed the Britains, and got a great victory, wherein the wife and daughter of Caractacus being taken, his brethren yielded themselves.

Caractacus betrayed is carried to Rome.

18. Caractacus committing himself into the hands of Cartismunda, Queen of the Brigantes, was treacherously bound, and delivered up to the Conquerours in the ninth year of the War, wherein he had got himself an exceeding great name. Being carried to Rome, the people was called together as to some famous show, and the Prætorian bands were placed along for the reception of him. The prayers of the rest were by reason of fear, base, and nothing favouring of Nobility: but Caractacus, neither hanging down his head, nor craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperour's Tribunal spake to this purpose. If my moderation in prosperity had been as great as my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a friend into this Citie, than a Captive: neither would you have disdained to receive me with Covenants of peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and a Commander over many Nations. My present state is, as to me dishonourable, so to you magnificent. I have had horses, men, armour, and wealth: What marvel if against my will I have lost them all? For if you will rule over all men, it followeth that all men must abide servitude. If presently I had yielded, and been delivered into your hands, neither had my Fortune nor your glory been very remarkable: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you save me alive, I shall be an example of your clemency for ever.

His speech to the Emperour.

He is pardoned.

19. Upon those words Caesar pardoned him, his wife, and brethren. And they being all unbound did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina (who sat aloft not far off in an high seat to be seen) giving her the like praises, and in the same degrees of stile as they did the Emperour himself. Surely a strange precedent without any example, saith the Historian, that a woman should sit and command the Roman Ensigns. But she carried her self as a fellow and associate in the Empire gotten by her Progenitors. After this the Senate was called together, and the Fathers made long and glorious discourses, as touching the Captivity of Caractacus. Neither was this lesse honourable, as they affirmed, than when Pub. Scipio shewed Siphax, L. Paulus, Perses, or whosoever else exhibited Conquered Kings to the view of the People. As for Ostorius, it was decreed he should be honoured with triumphal Ornaments. But his Fortune soon changed, either for that he grew secure upon the Captivity of so considerable a man, or the Enemy was highly moved to revenge it. For a party left to awe the Silures was incompassed by the Britains, and if help had not presently come in from the adjoyning Villages and Fortresses, had been utterly cut off, besides, that the Commander in Chief with eight Centurions, and many others were slain. Not long after such as went to gather forrage, and several Companies sent in to their aid, were also routed, and the Enemy was hardly restrained at length by the help of the Legions. After this hapned many skirmishes, as they met by chance, or were desirous of booty, and two Auxiliary Cohorts were intercepted, with the spoils of which other Nations were drawn to revolt, and not long after Ostorius spent with care and pensiveness died. To his place Claudius preferred A. Didius, who

Claudius poisoned by Agrippina his wife.

His Character.

Ecclesiastical matters in his reign.

20. Claudius, the twelfth year of his reign ending, bestowed on Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Philip, as also that of Lysanias, taking Chalcis from him after he had governed it 4 years. After this he restored the Rhodians to their former liberty upon their repentance, and eased the Inhabitantes of Ilium of all charges and tributes, as being the Authors of the Roman race. Nero pleaded the causes of both Cities, whose mother Agrippina now began to be discovered to her husband. He chanced in his drink to say that it was fatal to him first to endure, and then to punish the wickednesse of his wives, and he repented of his folly in preferring her son before his own. She bechinking her self how to escape the danger, first gave him poison in Mushrooms his beloved meat, but it passing through him, she used the skill of Xenophon the Physician, vwho as it vvere to help him to vomit put something down his throat dipped in a most violent poyson, and so he died, who within a small time upon a very small account had put to death 35 Senators and 300 Knights. He vvas a man that before his coming to the Government vvas despised by his relations as some imperfect thing, and afterwards vvas but counted blockish, and despicable by others, yet somerimes he would judge very vvise and circumspectly, and so far profited in liberal studies (which he very much plied) that he vvrote divers things, and amongst the rest a learned defence of Cicero in answer to the books of Asinius Pollio. He vvas fearfull above measure, so that (amongst other demonstrations) vwhen Camillus, vwho attempted a Rebellion, sent to him a reprochfull, and menacing Letter, vvilling him to lay down the Government, he vvas in doubt, and seriously consulted vvwhether he should not do it: and this made him put many to death upon idle and malicious accusations. He vvas the very slave of his Freedmen (vvhereof Narcissus and Pallas vvere chief) vvho rather reigned than he; for, they managed all things according to their pleasure or lust, bestowing favours upon vvhom they pleased, and killing any, though never so vvorthy, or nearly allied to him. He excused his anger and peevishnesse by a publick Declaration. He vvas so forgetfull that he vvould several times ask for such as he had put to death. He vvould eat and drink at any time, or in any place: he vvas a great player at Dice, of vvwhich Art he set forth a book. He died on the third before the Ides of October, in the 64 year of his age, vwhen he had reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and twenty dayes, in the 807 year of the Citie, the 55 after the birth of Christ, M. Asinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being Consuls.

21. Now that vve may note briefly such Ecclesiastical matters as fell out in the reign of Claudius. In his first year James the brother of John vvas, as vve said, put to death by Agrippa, and Peter being cast by him into prison vvas delivered by an Angel. In his second, Paul returned out of Arabia to Damascus, vvhen he came to Jerusalem to see Peter. Hence he vvent to Tarsus, and not long after to Antioch, being sent for by Barnabas, vwho had been sent thither by the Apostles. In his third year Paul preached for a vvhole year at Antioch, together vvith Barnabas. In his fourth, Paul carried the Almes of the faithfull from Antioch to Jerusalem, because of the Famine foretold by Agabus. Thence returning to Antioch, he vvas sent vvith Barnabas to preach the Gospel in Asia. In this fourth then, and the fifth year of Claudius he preached Christ in Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, and returned to Antioch. In the sixth he vvas sent from Antioch to Jerusalem to the Council vvith Barnabas, vvhen returning to Antioch he reprehended Peter, vwho came thither a little after him, for his dissembling, and not long after vvent vvith Silas into Asia to confirm the Churches he had founded. In the seventh of Claudius he preached Christ in Crete, and through Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, visited the Churches, converted the Galatians to the Faith. In the eighth he came to Troas, and thence into Macedonia, vvhere at Philippi, as also at Thessalonica, at Berea, and then at Athens thens he preached the Gospel. About the end of the ninth year he came to Corinth, where he found Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he staid half a year preaching the Gospel, and thence wrote both his Epistles to the Thessalonians. In the eleventh year he came from Corinth to Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whom there leaving, he went to Jerusalem to the East. Thence he returned to Antioch and Ephesus through Phrygia, Galatia, and the higher parts of Asia. Being at Ephesus in the twelfth year, there he continued two years till the tumult raised by Demetrius. Hence he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians; the former also to the Corinthians, and to Titus, but about the end of the following year; as also the first to Timothy. About the end also of the thirteenth year, or the beginning of the following, he came into Macedonia and Achaia, to receive the collections to be caried to Jerusalem. And hence (from Corinth) being to passe into Asia, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans about the end of the following year. About the end also of the fourteenth year he was imprisoned at Jerusalem. And being caried to Casarea was there kept prisoner by Felix for two years. Concerning the Chronology of these accounts, Ludovicus Cappellus is by Students to be consulted, in his Historia Apostolica Illustrata.

Of St. Peter his being at Rome.

22. St. Peter the Apostle is reported in the second year of Claudius to have come to Rome, having been formerly Bishop of Antioch, in which Sea he was succeeded by Evodius one of the 70 Disciples, of whom also Paul maketh mention: some say that he continued Bishop at Rome 25 years, viz. twelve under Claudius, and thirteen under Nero. Perhaps he might come to Rome at this time, but that he staid there 25 years is but to be taken as a fable. For we read that Claudius banished all Jews from Rome, and he being a Jew, must needs give place, or abide the danger. We do not find he had any trouble, and this was by reason of his absence. It's probable that he went away when Aquila and Priscilla departed Rome, and met St. Paul at Corinth. Eusebius indeed often mentioneth his being at Rome, and writeth, that he suffered Martyrdom together with Paul under Nero. This might be at his second return unto Rome, so that we may count 25 years from his first coming under Claudius unto the end of his Martyrdom under Nero; it being, to say truth, better thus to reconcile Writers, than flatly to deny all, or to say, he never was at Rome. Here he met with Simon Magus again, and confounded him, as it's reported. This man being a Samaritan of the Village Giton, was baptized by Philip the Deacon in Samaria. He would have bought of Peter the gift of the Holy Ghost; and thence of him arose the word Simony. He came to Rome in the time of Claudius, where calling himself a God, he was honoured with an Image, having this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. He had to his yoke-mate one Helene, by Irenaeus called Selen, a Witch and a common Harlot, whom he called the Principal understanding. He said unto the Samaritans that he was the Father, unto the Jews, that he was the Son descended from Heaven, and unto the Gentiles, that he was the Holy Ghost. Peter foiled him in Samaria, whence for shame he fled, and leaving Samaria and Judea, he sailed from East to West, and came to Rome, under Claudius, where Peter met him. Peter it's said had much to do with him in the presence of Nero. Some write that he had three conflicts with him, and in the end Simon seeing himself foyled, and his witchcraft not at all to prevail, told them he would leave their City, and flye up into the Heavens whence he came. Whereupon at a certain day appointed, he climbed up into the high Capitol, whence he took his flight by the means of witchcraft, and the spirits that bore him up in the air. The People at the sight hereof was amazed. But Peter fell down and prayed God that his witchcraft might be revealed to the World. He had no sooner spoke, but down came Simon Magus, and was broken to pieces, so that he there miserably died. Now again to the course of our History.

23. The death of Claudius was kept private by Agrippina, till such time as the Empire could be secured to Nero her son, who then, at noon time of the day, the doors of the Palace being opened sodainly, accompanied with

Burrhus Captain of the Guard, went to the watch, by which at the instance of the Captain, he was received with lucky acclamations. Being put into a litter, he was thence caried to the Camp, where speaking as the time required, and promising a donative to the Soldiers, after the example of his Predecessors, he was saluted Emperour, and presently owned by the Senate, and in the Provinces. Claudius his testament he never published, lest the People should be moved by the injury offered to Britannicus, to whom his father was so superlatively unnatural, as to prefer his wives son before him. Indeed some of the Soldiers at first paused, and looking back, asked for Britannicus; but finding no body to stir in his behalf, joyned themselves to the multitude. Nero came to the Government, being seventeen years old, six years after he had been adopted by Claudius.

Suetonius Nero
1. 7.

24. Nero at first caried it exceeding well towards People and Magistrates, governing according to the pattern of Augustus, whose prescript he professed he would observe. He omitted no occasion of shewing liberality, clemency, and mildnesse, insomuch that Trajan himself admiring his first five years, averred, that All Princes came short of them. Heavy tributes he either took off or lessened, distributed money to the People, gave annual stipends to impoverished Senators, and to the Pratorian bands Corn every moneth freely. Being desired to subscribe to the execution of a condemned person, Oh, said he, I wish I knew not letters. But this good beginning is rather to be attributed to Burrhus and Seneca (the later of whom, after his adoption, was his School-master) who being in power mutually helped each other. Agrippina thought by virtue of his name to rule indeed, and at the beginning poisoned Silanus Proconsul of Asia, and made away Narcissus; without his knowledge the former, and the later without his consent; and had gone further, but that Burrhus and Seneca interposed. Not long after, jealousies arose betwixt them, for he falling in love with Acte a Freed-woman, and distasting such as she leaned upon, removed Pallas her Minion from publick employment, which so far exasperated her, that she upbraided him with Britannicus, as most fit to enjoy his Fathers seat. This seat she told her son he now enjoyed by her means, and not sparing to lay open all the evils, as she said, of their unhappy Family, her own marriage and sorcery; she took it as happy for the gods and her, that Britannicus was living, and protested she would go with him to the Camp.

25. This, together with Britannicus his frowardnesse (who being fourteen years old, began to be sensible of his condition, and to move compassion towards himself) made Nero resolve to dispatch him out of the way, and for that he could not do it openly to his brother, he procured poyson to be given him, which working downwards without any great incommodity, he caused to be boiled to that height, that it instantly killed him the second time, whilst he himself sate at supper with him, as knowing nothing. He made him be buried the same, though a very rainy, night, his mean funeral being provided beforehand. Agrippina very much troubled that her refuge was gone, was shortly after accused to her son, as intending by a marriage with Rubellius Plautus (who was as near to Augustus as Nero himself) to invade the Sovereignty. Being something gone in drink when he heard of it, he would have had her killed out of hand, which being hindred by Burrhus, the next day she stoutly denied any such design, and the wound of jealousy for the time was skinned over. After two years, Nero began to discover what his Nature prompted him to. Disguising himself in a servile habit, he ran about the City by night to Taverns and Stews, accompanied with such as himself, where raking away things by force, as also cutting and slashing such as they met, he himself came into danger of life.

A little before those things, he sent Porcius Festus into Judea to succeed Felix, who being out of his office, was accused at Roma by such Jews as dwelt at Casarea. Nero pardoned him through the intercession of his brother Pallas, who was as yet in favour. bited with them, about the right and privilege of the City. They pretended that Herod the founder of it was a Jew, and those answered, that ere he named it Cæsarea, it was called the Tower of Straton, at what time none of the Jews inhabited it: and the Syrians by a great sum of money procured Beryllus (who had been Nero's School-master) to get them the Emperours letters, whereby was abrogated that Privilege which the Jews had formerly enjoyed with the Syrians. Herewith the Jews incensed, were still seditious till the beginning of the Warre. Great motions at this time fell out in the East. The Parthians had set upon Armenia, having driven away Rhadamistus nephew to Mitridates, whom Claudius had set over that Kingdom, and who was killed by the other, that he might succeed him. Nero sent to preserve that Country Domitius Corbulo, who for two or three years had little to do, because the Parthians deferred the War. But now Tiridates brother to Vologesus the Parthian being resolved to fight for the Diadem, the Armenians also inclining to him, Corbulo took several Forts, and besieged Artaxata the Metropolis, which, though the Inhabitants opened the gates, and for this were spared, yet because it could not be held for the greatnesse of it, was burnt and razed. Nero for these things was saluted Imperator, passing great honours were decreed to him, and a far greater stir was made by the flattering Fathers than was convenient.

27. The same year that these things were done by Corbulo, being the fifth of his reign, Nero fell in love with Poppæa Sabina, the daughter of P. Ollius, though she named her self after her Grand-father by the mother's side, because more eminent. He came first acquainted with her by the commendations of Otho her husband, who also had been too familiar with her in the dayes of her first husband Rufus Crispinus: She incensed him more against his mother, because she feared, that as long as she lived, he would not dismiss Octavia and marry her self. Sometimes she laid at him by divers criminations, as otherwhiles jeered him as a Pupil, who not onely wanted command and authority, but also liberty. Some have suspected, that Agrippina sought to commit incest with her son. How true soever this was, he now began to be absolutely weary of her, to shun her company, and within a while resolved to make her away, though solicitous how to do it. At length Anicetus his Freed-man and General of the Fleet at Misenum, acquainted him that a ship might be so framed, as to break into pieces and let her fall into the Sea. This ship was thus made, and she brought into it by her son, under colour of doing her honour, but the upper part of the ship falling chanced to misse her, though it killed one of her attendants. One of her maides knowing nothing of the design, cried out, that she was Agrippina, hoping thereby to save her self, and was thereupon killed by the Oars; but she her self being silent, escaped them, and swam to Land. Her escape struck Nero with great consternation, who called up Burrhus and Seneca to give their advice. Whether they knew of the thing before or no is uncertain. Some say, Seneca asking Burrhus whether the Soldiers should not be commanded to kill her, he answered, they would do no such thing to the daughter of Germanicus, and that Anicetus rather should perform his promise of dispatching her. This he readily undertaking, accompanied with two others, went to the Village where she lay. One of them first bruised her head with a club, another drawing his sword, she stretched out her belly and bad him strike that, and so died of many wounds. Some report, that her son viewed her dead body exactly, and passed his judgement upon every part. She had been a very lewd and ambitious woman, and now reaped the fruit thereof, according her own desire. For consulting on a time about the fortune of this her son, the Chaldeans told her, that He should reign, but kill his mother, to which she answered, Occidas modo imperet: Let him kill me so he but reign. After this wicked fact he was continually tormented in his Conscience, confessing often, that he was haunted by the Furies, which did bear him with fire-brands.

may to such fordidnesse of spirit was both Senate and People degenerated, that returning to the Citie, they met him with as great Pomp, as if he had come from some notable victory; for the severall Tribes, and the Senate received him, their Wives and Children being placed according to their Sex and Age. Hereupon he grew excessive proud, as Lord over so many slaves, and presently unmasking himself, without any care of his actions, fell into such disorders, as he appeared rather a Devil incarnate than a man. He became a Stage-player, learning that art, and exercising himself therein in publick continually. He ordained Games to be solemnized at Rome every fifth year, in imitation of the Greeks, and called them Neronia; persons of all sorts, and degrees, being constrained to be actors. These being continued night and day, most horrid things were committed, Prince, Senate, and People, either through affection or fear, not onely giving way, but compelling to such filthinesse. Corbulo at this time prospering in Armenia had Tigranocerta yielded to him, and then placed in that Kingdom, Tigranes Grand-son to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, with whom having left a Guard, and settled matters, he departed into Syria to succeed Vinidius the Governour. The year following, being the 814 of the Citie, wherein Casinius Pains and Petronius Turpilianus were Consuls, the Romans received a sad defeat in Britain.

29. Of late the Lieutenants of this Province had made but small progresse in their Conquests; A. Didius Avianus the Successor of Plantius contenting himself with what was done before, and Verannius, who followed him, making onely some excursions upon the Silures; for he was prevented by death from any further service. But now Panlinus Suetonius the Æmulator of Corbulo for Military glory, had the chief Command, and sought to equal the acts of the other in Armenia, by chastizing and taming the Britains. He set upon the Isle Mona (now called Anglesey) peopled with strong Inhabitants, and the receptracle of all Fugitives, where he was received with multitudes of men on the shore, & with women running about like furies with fire-brands in their hands, having their hair spread about their shoulders; the Druides also, the antient Seat of whom that Island was, pouring out plenty of curses. The Soldiers something terrified at first, being exhorted by their General, easily broke through, and dissipated this furious Company: then placed he a Garrison in the Island, and cut down the Groves where they were wont to offer mans blood, and consult their Gods by the entrails of some Captive. But whilst these things were adoining, news came to Suetonius of the revolt of his Province. For, Prasutagus King of the Iceni, that his Kingdom and family might be freed from molestation, left Cesar his Heir, together with his two daughters. But it hapned far otherwise, his Kingdom being wasted by Centurions, and his house by Slaves: his wife Boadicia (otherwise called Boodicia, Boudicia, Vondica, and Bunduica) was whipped, his daughters deflowered, his chiefeft subjects spoiled of their Goods and Lands, and his kindred counted no better of than slaves. Provoked by these things, and fear of worse when they should be reduced into the form of a Province, they took Arms, stirring up the Trinebantes to rebellion. Others also joyned with them, having heretofore combined to recover their liberty out of hatred to the old superannuated Soldiers, who being planted as a Colony at Camalodunum, committed grievous outrages against them, and these were rather cherished by the Army than otherwise, in hope of the like liberty for the time to come. But this Colony not being fenced by any fortifications, the founders having rather looked at the pleasantnesse of the situation than commodiousnesse of the ground, the Britains accounted it no great matter to destroy it.

30. The Camalodunians being terrified by several prodigies, desired aid of Catus Decianus the Governour in Suetonius his absence. He sent them but 200 men, and those but meanly Armed, and they neglected still to raise any fortifications, their Counsels being confounded by such as were irgaged in the plot. Being then beset round by the Natives, all things were burnt and de-destroyed, and Petilius Cerealis coming to their relief with the ninth Legion was utterly defeated, all the foot being cut in pieces, and the horse with himself glad to run away to the Camp; whereupon Catus passed over into Gall, having by his avarice been the great cause of this defection. The same defeat was given to Verulamium (out of the ruins of which rose St. Albans) a Town free of the Citie of Rome; for the Britains passing by Castles and places of defence, set upon such as were most obnoxious to their fury. At both places were massacred 70000 persons, none being taken or sold after the custom of War, but either put to the sword, hanged, burnt, or crucified as Malefactors. Suetonius passed through the midst of his Enemies to Londonium (now London) a Town not then notable in respect of the Colony, but for multitude of Merchants, and plenty of Traffick very famous. Perceiving it but badly provided of Soldiers, although he once thought to make it the seat of the War, he left it, being not prevailed with to stay either by the prayers or tears of the Inhabitants. For, resolving with the losse of one Town to preserve the rest, he took all along with him that could go, and all others, whom either Sex or Age, or the pleasantness of the places detained were destroyed by the Enemy. Having got together an Army of 10000 men, he resolved to venture a battel with all expedition; and for that purpose made his choice of convenient ground. Boadicia carrying her two daughters in the Chariot with her about to the Companies, told them it had been usual before for the Britains to fight under the conduct of women, but she was now in another capacity than her Ancestors, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the ordinary sort to revenge her lost liberty, her own stripes, and the violence offered to her daughters. As for her self she said she was resolved to win the field, or die; as for men, they might live if they pleased, and be slaves. Suetonius on the other side considering the weight of the Enterprize, was not silent.

battel.

31. The Romans, though far inferiour in number, yet in Military knowledge and Discipline far exceeding the Britains, put them to the worst, and made of them great slaughter by reason of the difficulty of flight; for those having brought their wives to behold the battel; and be eye-witnesses of their valour, they had placed them in Waggones about the Army. Some reported that scarcely fewer then 80000 of the Conquered were slain, and of the Conquerors about 400; and Boadicia ended her life by poyson. Afterwards, the Army being increased by a great supply sent over by Cæsar, wasted the Countrey with fire and sword, which was also sorely oppressed by famine; for being intent upon the War, the Britains had neglected the sowing of Corn, hoping also to enjoy the Provisions of the Enemy. For all this they were not forward to ask Peace, being encouraged by Julius Cassilianus, who being sent to succeed Catus, disagreed so far with Suetonius, and soilled him to those at Rome, that he wrote they must not expect an end of the War till some one was sent to succeed him, attributing all mishaps to his unfitness, and all successe to the good Fortune of the Commonwealth. To view then the condition of Britain, was Polycletus the Freed-man of Nero sent over, who coming in with a great train seemed terrible to the Roman Soldiers, but ridiculous to the Britains, who burning with affection to liberty, and as yet ignorant of the power of such, wondred that the General and Army (which had put an end to such a War) would obey slaves. Suetonius was comminded to deliver up his Army to Turpilianus, who was even now out of the Consulship, and neither provoking nor being provoked covered slothfull idleness, as Tacitus telleth us, with the specious, and comely name of Peace.

32. The year after was Albinus sent into Judea to succeed Festus, who died in his Government. About the same time Agrippa (who had power after his Uncle of Chalcis to bestow the High-Priesthood on whomsoever he pleased) gave it to Ananus son of that Annas or Ananus, who beyond example having himself enjoyed the Office, had five sons, who every one of them executed the same. bold and cruel, conceiving he had got a convenient opportunity (Festus being dead, and Albinus not yet arrived) called a Council, and condemned James the brother of Jesus Christ, as Josephus writeth, with some others, as guilty of impiety, to be stoned. This act displeased, saith the Historian, all good men, and especially such as were most studious of the Law, who desired of Agrippa that he would command Ananus to forbear the like for the time to come: some going also to meet Albinus, told him that the High-Priest had no authority to call a Council, whereupon he wrote to him very angrily, and threatened him, upon which account Agrippa the King removed him from his Office after the third moneth. At this time died Burrhus at Rome, not without suspicion of poyson, and Seneca's power was weakned by the losse of that conjunction, whereby they had mutually strengthened the hands of each other. Seneca was now backbited, and by Nero sleighted, of whom he desired leave to withdraw himself, having been with him fourteen years, and he offered to give up his great estate into his hands (for that had brought him so far into envy;) but Nero having learnt, and practised dissimulation, under colour of respect denied his Petition. Now did Nero marry Poppæa, whom all this while he had kept as his Concubine, and dismissed Octavia loaded with accusations of barrenesse and greater Crimes; and when the people troubled at it grew seditious, he caused her to be put to death in that fatal Island Pandateria. The same year also as 'tis believed he poysoned the Chief of the Liberti or Freed-men, Peryphoras, because he was against his marrying Poppæa, and Pallas, for that living very long, he had scraped together a vast sum of money.

33. At this time were the stirs renewed in Armenia. For Vologeses seeing his brother thus beaten off, and Tigranes set up in his stead, had invaded the Countrey to revenge the injury offered to the line of the Arfacide. Corbulo, though very warily, yet resisted and repelled him, when Cesennius Paus was sent to defend that Countrey, who by his ignorance in Military matters and rashness undid all. Being besieged, he was glad to Covenant for his preservation to quit Armenia, and remove the Garrisons thence, which done, Nero was to be sent to. Yet so ridiculous and degenerate were they at Rome, as to erect Trophies over the Parthians, though they knew nothing of the success, either one way or other. The Parthian Ambassadors came to Rome to desire that (as they hinted) which had been gotten by force, but without effect, for War was decreed against them to be managed by Corbulo; yet were they dismissed with gifts, so as there might be hope, that, if Tiridates himself would intreat for the Diadem, it should not be in vain. Corbulo again invaded Armenia, at which the Parthians affrighted came to a Treaty, wherein it was agreed that Tiridates laying down his Diadem at the feet of Nero's Statue should not receive it without his leave. Nero now growing now worse and worse, broke out into most horrid impieties, well nigh beyond all belief.

34. The next year being the 817 of the Citie, the 65th after the birth of Christ, and of his own reign the 10. C. Lecanius Bassus, and M. Licinius Crassus being Consuls, acting the common Stage-player, and giving up himself to all luxury, and unheard-of pollutions, amongst the rest he married himself as a woman to one of his filthy crue, called Pythagoras, all things being provided and celebrated as at a marriage. He made himself also the husband of Sporus, from whom he took as much of the Male as possible, and ordered him to be brought to him in a Veil as a Bride. Being offended at the deformity of the old buildings, and the narrowness of the streets, or else to feed his cruel eye with so sad a spectacle as he had read to have hapned at the siege of Troy, he caused the Citie to be set on fire, which burning six dayes and seven nights, of the fourteen divisions four onely remained whole, the other being wasted, or defaced, with the fury of the flame. He beheld the fire from the Tower of Macenas, and very merry at the beauty of it, as he termed it, in a Player's habit sung the destruction of Ilium. This calamity being generally attributed to him as the cause, he accused the Christians there-thereof, and raised the First Persecution, torturing them with most exquisite kinds of punishment. About this time he sent Gessius Florus into Judea to succeed Albinus, who desiring to gratifie them of Jerusalem, for all the mischief he had done, ere his departure, brought out all the prisoners, whereof those that were committed for any capital offence he put to death, but the rest he fined onely and dismissed; whereby all the Gaols being thus emptied, the Country was filled with thieves more than before. The year following was discovered a conspiracy against Nero, which gave him occasion further to indulge his cruel humour.

35. Who was the Author of it is uncertain, as also upon what particular grounds it was hatched, though all the persons bore him malice, as they thought they had reason. But Lucan the Poet (who wrote the Civil Wars betwixt Caesar and Pompey, and was nephew to Seneca by his brother Annaus Mela) was aggrieved that Nero envied him the glory he had got by his Verses; and several others joyned with them out of love to Cn. Piso the head of the party. It was discovered by Milichus the Freed-man of Sceninus, who had commanded him to scour his dagger, and provide necessaries for wounds; whereupon some would have had Piso to have gone to the Rostrum, and laid open the Tyrant to the People, to obtain their help; but he refused. The next after him that was put to death was Annaus Seneca the Philosopher and Nero's School-master, not being convicted of any treason, though accused by one Natalis, as it's thought, to please Caesar, such an earnest desire his Scholar had to dispatch him, having formerly without effect attempted it by poyson. Being commanded to dye, he did it very chearfully, though he was forced to seek for death several wayes. For, he had so starved himself with abstinence, that he could not bleed, and poyson would not work upon him; but at length entering into a bath he was stifled with the fume of it, having all this while discoursed, even to his last, according to his wonted elegancy, such excellent things, as being then taken from his mouth, came afterwards abroad. Such was the end of this excellent Philosopher, concerning the character of whom, Students are rather to trust to Cornelius Tacitus than to Dio, if Justus Lipsius be a competent Judge. Dio accuseth him of extortion, adultery with Agrippina, and what not? He maketh him a Sodomite, and to have taught his Scholar that wickednesse, as also the cause and procurer of the death of Agrippina, and a cart-load of other Calumnies, saith * Lipsius, doth the idle man heap upon him; contrary to the duty and mind of all men. What cause was there of this hatred? or what reward had he for lying? for Seneca lived so long before him, that he neither could injure him nor oblige him. I believe, saith he, it was a certain perversity of judgement and manners, which also set him keen against Cicero and all good men. I desire that youth may take heed, and so to gather the flowers of Amiquity from these fields, that they do not also gather poison. But as for what concerneth the riches and gallantry of Seneca, see Reader, and read his excellent Treatise De vita beata, which he wrote with no other design, than to stop the mouths of these Calumniators, especially from the seventeenth Chapter. Thus hath Lipsius prevented us in our Apology for this excellent person, in whose vindication much might be said.

36. Pompeia Paullina the wife of Seneca (Dio calleth her a most noble woman, perhaps the daughter of Pompeius Paullinus, to whom Tacitus giveth the title of Consularis, and who was set over the publick customs or imposts) cut also her veins, that she might die with him, but Nero bearing her no malice as it happened, sent some to stop the bleeding, and recover her. Seneca had another brother besides the father of Lucan, who was also put to death. This was Annaus Novatus, otherwise called Junius Gallio from his adoptive Father, being also mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and then Governour of Achaia. Their Father was M. Annaus Seneca a Rhetorician of Cornuba in Spain, whose Suasories and Controversies are yet extant, joyned to his sons Works. Nero proceeded in his madnesse and cruelties. for which he kicked her great with child, and thereupon she miscaried. Then raged he against many of greatest note, amongst whom was Mela the father of Lucan (who had formerly perished for the conspiracy) and this allaid the grief which was conceived for the death of many others, by the pestilence that now raged, because they seemed thereby well delivered from the fury and rage of the Prince, who now neither used choice nor measure in his slaughters. Being puffed up with the successe of his cruelty, he said, that None of his Predecessors knew their power, hinting also, that he meant to destroy the remnant of the Senators. It was believed he had a great desire to deliver up quick men to be devoured of an Egyptian, a monstrous eater of raw flesh, or any other thing that was given him.

The height of his wickedness.

37. Neither was there wanting to him luxury and effeminatenesse, suitable to his cruelty, nor any other vice, whereby the truth of that saying of Domitianus his father might appear, who hearing of his birth, said, that Of himself and Agrippina could proceed nothing but accursed, detestable, and to the damage of the Commonwealth. For in him seemed to meet and be conjoynd not onely all the vices of his own family (which of late had been too pregnant of them) but all the corruption of his Country, from the beginning to his very time. He lengthened his feasts from Noon to Midnight, accounting no use of riches but in the abuse of them. Such he thought to be sordid and base, as took account of their expenses, and he extolled and admired his Uncle Caius, for spending in so short a time so vast sums, as had been hoarded up by Tiberius. To Tiridates that came to Rome to take the Diadem from his hands, he allowed an incredible sum for his daily expenses, and as profusely gratified him at his departure. He put on no garment twice, plaid for vast sums at dice, fished with a golden net, when he journeyed any whither, he never had lesse than 1000 Caroches in his train, and he caused his mules to be shod with Silver. But his house exceeded all belief, having built it out of the ruines of the City. For length, for pleasantnesse of groves and fish-ponds it was incredible, garnished also with Gold and precious stones. To the madnesse of this expence he was encouraged by one that made him fair promises of discovering a vast treasure in Africk, which Dido the Queen flying out of Tyre should thence bring with her. But being deceived, as was likely, with so foolish a project, he took such courses as became Nero to recruit his coffers.

38. When Tiridates was departed into Armenia, he went into Greece, there to act Tragedies, to sing, and run races in the Chariot. Running in the Olympick Games, although he fell from his Chariot, yet he was rewarded with a crown as Victor. He took from Apollo the Cyrrhaan Territory, and defaced the place whence they were wont to receive Oracles, killing men at the hole whence the blast came. He attempted to cut through the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, digging first himself, and carying out the first basket of Earth upon his shoulders: but with the same successe as others had before him. When he was in Achaia news came from Cestius Gallus President of Syria concerning the rebellion of the Jews. Being long vexed with the injuries of the Deputies and Governours, they could no longer contain themselves. Christ's blood lying heavy upon them, and crying for vengeance, they themselves executed part of it. For such robberies in the Country, such and so many murders in the City were committed, and such delusions by false Prophets prevailed amongst them, as after a wonderful manner turned their estate upside down, drew upon them the malice of their enemies, and demonstrated the high displeasure of Almighty God. The particular occasion of their rebellion was from Florus their Governour, who through the insinuations of his wife into Poppæa having procured that Office, caried himself as worthy of such a Master. He flew to that height of impudence and wickednesse, as by a publick Crier to give free leave to rob and steal through the whole Country, on condition that he might have part of the booty. It was his design to provoke them to rebel, that his impieties might thereby be covered. After he and the Townsmen of Cæsarea had grievously abused such Jews as there lived,

he came to Jerusalem with an Army, rifled the Forum, plundered the houses, killed the Inhabitants, whipped and hung up several, who, though Jews born, were made Knights of Rome, and all under pretence that some had reviled him for his cruelty. Not content herewith, he perswaded the People of Jerusalem to go out to meet, in a courteous manner, certain Soldiers that were coming thither, to whom he sent, that they should not return their civility, that so they might be offended, and give out words, which advantage he commanded them to take, and fall upon them. This was performed, and many perished, whom the Chief-priests and others with lamentable intreaties had perswaded to go forth, hoping thereby to please the Tyrant, and prevent the mischief. From this violence sprung the War, in the twelfth year of Nero's reign, the seventeenth of Agrippa, the second of Florus his Government, the 819 of the City, and 67 after the birth of Christ, C. Suetonius Paulinus and L. Pontius Telesinus being Consuls.

39. Some of those that were most eager after rebellion, assaulted a Castle called Masada, and killing the Romans placed therein a Garrison of their own. And in the Temple Eleazar the son of Ananias the High-Priest Captain of the Guard and a forward young man, perswaded the People no more to offer the sacrifices which were wont to be offered for the good of the Romans. The Chief-Priest and Nobility dissuaded them all they could from rebellion, but profiting nothing, besought Agrippa and Florus to come and suppress the sedition betimes. Florus glad to hear such news, gave no answer. Agrippa sent 3000 Horse, which being received into the upper part of the City, the Rebels took the lower part with the Temple, and after some ado brake also into the upper quarters, burnt divers Palaces and publick houses, and then besieged the Tower of Antony, which having taken within two dayes, they put the Garrison to the sword. After this they laid siege to the Kings Palace, whither Agrippa's Souldiers being retired, upon their desire they were dismissed. But the Romans yielding upon the Faith of Eleazar, were all cut in pieces contrary to his word, except Motilus their Captain, who begging hard for his life, promised to be circumcized and turn Jew: and this was done on the Sabbath-day in September. On the same day were all the Jews of Casarea massacred by the inhabitants, to the number of above 200000, not one being left alive; for those that escaped were taken by Florus, and brought out bound to the People. Throughout all Syria the slaughters of the Jews were renewed. At Alexandria also a sedition being raised, 50000 Jews were slain in one day by two Roman Legions.

40. Cestius Gallus as soon as he heard of these motions, came with an Army into Judea, wherein taking some Towns he sat down before Jerusalem, at the Fest of Tabernacles. But though he might easily with a little patience have taken the City, yet raised he his siege, having neglected many opportunities. He departed to Antipatris, losing many of his men by the way, that were cut off by the Jews who followed him close in the rear. With this successe the Jews being elevated, created two Commanders to govern the City, viz. Joseph the son of Gorion, and Ananus the High-Priest: and they sent several Captains and Governours into the Country, amongst whom was Joseph, who wrote the history of this War. He fortified the several Towns of Galile, and indured as great a conflict as to his own person, with divers, both there and at Jerusalem, (who envying him the honour of his command, would have had him turned out) as he did afterwards with the Romans. But Cestius sent to Nero then in Achaia, as we said, to let him understand the state of affairs, laying all the blame of the rebellion upon Florus.

41. Nero deliberating whom he should send into Judea, wanted Corbulo whom he had killed. At length he pitched on Vespasian, who having been trained up in Martial matters all his youth, he thought him onely capable of such a charge, though a little before grievously offended at him, for that he little regarded his singing (either departing from off the stage, or sleeping if there) he forbade him not onely his presence, but also publickly to salute him.

him. Hereupon he withdrew himself, and lurked out of the way in fear of his life; but Nero having now need of him, and not fearing him, because of the meanness of his birth and name, gave him this employment. Vespasian dispatched away his son Titus to Alexandria, thence to bring forces into Judaea, and he himself passing the Hellepont into Syria gathered together the Roman Soldiers with supplies from the Princes, and came to Ptolemais, where Titus reached him sooner than was expected for the Winter season. Nero returning towards Rome in Triumphant manner, after he had been two years in Greece, C. Julius Vindex a Gall by birth, but of Senatorial degree amongst the Romans, incensed his Country-men against him, for that they groaned under his intolerable exactions, yet striving not for the Principality himself, he offered it to Ser. Sulpicius Galba an old Soldier, and now Governour of the Tarraconian Province in Spain, who, as well for his own safety, as to gratifie ambition, accepted of it. Nero being come to Naples heard of the conspiracy on that day he had killed his mother, & was then little moved at it; but seemed rather to rejoyce for the occasion that was thence offered to spoyl the rich Provinces of Gall. For though the Mathematicians had told him that he should be forsaken, yet he interpreted it of the losses sustained in Britain and Armenia; and some also promised him, though in this condition, the Empire of the East, and some by name the Kingdom of Jerusalem; but most affirmed that things would go well at this time. He took nothing so ill in all the opprobrious speeches of Vindex, as to be called an unskilfull Musician, & after the name of his family, Enobarbus; yet at length terrified by many messages he returned to Rome. Now had he most horrid projects in his head, as of killing the Captains and Governours of Provinces, with all the Exiles, and all of Gallish Original at Rome; of poysoning the whole Senate in feasting, burning the City, and letting loose wild beasts upon the people, thereby to hinder the quenching of the flames. From these things he was thought to be terrified more by despair of accomplishing them, than out of any repentance concerning his purpose. In preparing for his expedition his especial care was for the choice of carriages wherein to convey his Concubines and instruments for the stage.

42. When he heard of the revolt of the rest of the Armies, in a great rage taking some poyson with him in a Golden box, he left his house, and sending some of his trustiest servants to Ustica to make ready some ships, moved the Tribunes and Centurions of his Guard about flying with him; but some staggering at it and hanging backwards, others flatly refused it. Then he considered whether he should not fly to the Parthian, or in an humble manner to Galba; or whether going to the Rosstra in a mourning habit, he should not there ask pardon in as dolefull a manner as he could for what was past? but he was fearfull to be pulled in pieces ere he could reach the publick meeting-place; and put off those thoughts till the next day. At night finding his Guards withdrawn, he started out of his bed, and sending his friends about to their Lodgings, wear also himself; but none would answer; so that he returned to his Chamber, whence his attendants also were now fled, having taken away the furniture, and removed out of the way the box of poyson. Then desired he that some one would kill him, but none attempting it, Then, saith he, I have neither Friend nor Enemy, and run down as to throw himself into Tiber. But stopping ere he came there, he desired some lurking hole wherein he might recover his spirits, and Phaon his Freedman offering him his assistance, he went with him to a Village four miles distant in a disguise, hearing as he passed the prayers of the people for his destruction. Here being called on to rid himself out of the way, and prevent the abuses which else would fall upon him, he ordered things to be prepared for his dead body, weeping, and adding, Qualis Artifex pereat? How excellent an Artist do I die? Understanding at length that he was declared an Enemy by the Senate, and how he was sought for to be punished, more majorum, or after the custom of their Ancestors, and upon his enquiry hearing that this kind of death was to be stripped, and having his neck made fast in a Pillory to be whipped to death, he he called for two Daggers, the points of which he onely felt, and put them up again, pretending that his fatal hour was not yet come: He bade Porus lament and weep, and wished that some would help him by their own example to kill himself, chiding also himself for his backwardness. Certain horse-men now drawing near to fetch him alive, he at length effected it by the help of Epaphroditus his Freed-man, on the fourth of the Ides of June, having reigned 13 years, seven moneths, and 28 dayes, in the 32th of his age, and the 821 of the Citie, An. Dn. 68. C. Silius Italicus, and M. Valerius Trachalus being Consuls. Vespasian asked Apollonius what was Nero's overbrow? He answered, Nero could touch and tune the Harp well (noting his excessive delight in that Instrument) But in government sometimes he used to wind the pins too high, sometimes to let them down too low. The unequal, and untimely Enterchange of power Pressed too far, and Relaxed too much, destroyeth authority above all things.

matters in his time.

43. About the later end of Nero's second year St. Paul was sent bound to Rome by Festus, where he continued in durance two years. In his third year living at Rome in free custody, he wrote to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. About the end of the fourth he seemeth to have been set at liberty, and thence to have returned into Greece and Asia, where for five or six years he established the Churches he had founded. In the eleventh year of Nero he is said to have suffered Martyrdom at Rome. For, Nero having set the Citie on fire, accused the Christians, as Tacitus writeth; and exposed them to ignominious deaths. Some he caused to be covered with the skins of wild beasts, that they might be devoured of Dogs, others to be Crucified, and others burnt alive, and that in the night, that they might give light to passengers. He offered his own Garden for this show, and celebrated the Circensian Games amongst the common sort in the habit of a Chariot driver, who could not have raged against Christianity as Tertullian observeth, but that some excellency was in it. In this First persecution, besides Paul, who was beheaded, and many others, Peter also was Crowned with Martyrdom: being Crucified as 'tis reported with his head downward, which kind of death himself desired, because he would die in a more dishonourable sort than his Lord and Master. But some will have St. Paul and Peter to have suffered Martyrdom in the last year of Nero's reign, and that on June the 29. inomuch that Chrysostome saith, that the day of Paul's death was more known than that of Alexander.

After the Martyrdom of James surnamed Just the First Bishop of Jerusalem (whom Eusebius (a) from Clemens reporteth to have been thrown down from a Pinacle of the Temple, and brained with a Fuller's Club) who governed that Sea thirty years, Simon (b) Cleopas the Lords Cousin German, one of the 70 Disciples, and which saw Christ with his eyes, was chosen into his place by the Apostles, and Disciples themselves, being gathered together for this purpose. After the Martyrdom of Peter, (c) Linus one of the 70 Disciples, of whom Paul made mention, succeeded him in the Sea of Rome, where he continued Bishop twelve years, though some place his Martyrdom also in the last year of Nero, and the ninth before the Calends of October. Evodius one of the 70 Disciples, whom St. Paul remembred in his Epistles, was Bishop of Antioch, being by Eusebius said to be the first known to govern that Church. Him succeeded Ignatius (d) the Disciple of John, who wrote as they say to Mary the Mother of Christ, and Adary unto him again. He wrote unto John the Evangelist, and to Polycarpus his Disciple. Besides, he wrote sundry other notable Epistles, yet extant, and in the eleventh year of Trajan was brought to Rome, and torn in pieces of wild beasts, as will be shewn. Eusebius writeth that he was the second Bishop by succession after Peter in the Church of Antioch. When Nero had reigned the space of eight years, saith the Historian, first after Mark the Evangelist, Anianus took the government of the Church of Alexandria, a man both virtuous, and renowned in all respects.

CHAP. III.

From the death of Nero to that of Domitian, the last of the family of Vespasian, the space of 27 years.

I. GALBA after the death of Nero obtained the Principality, yet not long; for being Emperour, he maintained not the opinion which had been conceived of him whilst a private man; for that he gave way to a cruel and covetous humour, acting all things according to the will and lust of three men whom the people thence called his School-masters. But his severity towards the Soldiers, especially that speech Legi a se militem non emi, procured his ruin, who upon the revolt of the Armies in upper Germany betrayed him to M. Salvius Otho, notwithstanding he had adopted Piso. He was murdered by them in the Forum near the place where Curtius rode into the hole, and his head being cut off, for some time was carried up and down on a spear, till his Enemies had with the sight satisfied their flouting appetite, and then it was buried with the body. He died on the 17th of the Calends of February, in the 73th year of his age, having reigned seven months.

Otho seizeth on the Empire.

Being opposed by Vitellius,

He killeth himself.

2. Otho seized on the Empire by the help of his Soldiers, having resolved it after he saw Piso preferred before him. He was Nero's great friend and companion, and now refused not to be called by his very name, suffered his Images and Statues to be restored, as also his Officers and Freed-men to their several places, and the first thing he subscribed to was for money to finish his golden house. But A. Vitellius was shortly after saluted Emperour in Germany by the Army there, being son to L. Vitellius, who governed Syria. Being sent into Germany by Galba, he denied nothing to the Soldiers, but granted them their wills, with impunity in all things, and for that was rewarded with this Election. Hereupon Otho desired the Senate that they would send to him, to acquaint him with his Election, and to persuade him to be quiet; but he himself by Letters offered to be onely partner with him in the Sovereignty, and to be his son-in-law. The Enemy drawing near, the Prætorian bands stood very faithfully to him, even so far, that with much ado, and with the slaughter of some of their Officers, were they kept from destroying the Senate, which they suspected to be false to him. His interest was to draw out the War in length, having the Enemy at advantage, who was straightened both for necessities, and by reason of the narrowness of the passage: But he rashly and imprudently resolved on a battle, either for that Vitellius was not yet come, or urged by the earnestness of the Soldiers. They had four engagements, whereof in the first three he had the better, but in the last at Bedriacum (a Village in Italy betwixt Cremona and Verona, now called Labernum) was worsted; yet so as he might without difficulty have recovered himself, though taken at unaware, and deceived by pretence of a parley. But being ashamed to seek his own establishment with the hazard of so many mens lives, rather than out of any desperation, he killed himself. He was much extolled for his generous death (as it was accounted) which rendered him so much more desirable than his life had done, that many thought him to have killed Galba, not so much out of the desire of rule, as to restore liberty so called to the Commonwealth. He died on the 12th before the Calends of May, in the 38th year of his age, and the 95th day of his Empire.

Vitellius owned as Emperour.

3. Otho being dead, though Vitellius was dethroned by those at Rome, yet when they heard how things went they began to flatter, and gave him the title of Emperour. The Army of upper Germany which first mutined against Galba turning to him, he gladly received the surname of Germanicus, but deferred the title of Augustus, and utterly refused that of Cæsar. When yet in Gall he heard of the event of the battle at Bedriacum, he presently cashiered the Prætorian bands, as giving a bad example of revolt, and 120 which had demanded a reward of Otho for killing Galba, he commanded to be sought, and put to death. Hereby he much commended himself to the people,

People, and gave hopes of an excellent Prince ; but carrying on all things afterwards according to his natural inclination and former course of life, he deserved to be ranked amongst the worst of Governours.

4. He returned to Rome in a triumphant manner, and gave up himself to luxury and excess, wherein he also tolerated his family and Soldiers, as in all manner of wickedness. Coming through the fields where the Armies fought, when many loathed the noisomeness of the carriages, he stuck not to say, Optime olere occisum hostem, & melius civem; that A slain Enemy smells well, but sweeter a Citizen. He drunk much wine in the place before them all, to prevent any hurt that might proceed from the stench, and caused this liquor to be distributed to the Soldiers, with the like vanity and insolence. Entering the City as into a field with trumpets sounding to the charge, with colours flying, and in his coat-armour, he fell more and more into the neglect of all Laws, divine and humane. He made himself Perpetual Consul, and that it might be seen after whose pattern he meant to govern, in the Campus Martius attended by a number of Priests he sacrificed for the Soul of Nero; and at a solemn feast commanding a Musician to sing something of Domitian, he leaped up and applauded the beginning of Nero's songs. He governed State matters at the will and discretion of the vilest Player and chariot driver, especially of Asiaticus his Freed-man. He gave himself over to such luxury as he had been accustomed to in the days of Caius and Nero; especially to gluttony, the abominable excess whereof turned him into a very Monster. For, he would eat four or five meals a day, which that he might be able to bear, he used frequent vomiting; and inviting himself to the houses of his friends, he would, as Nero did, put them to incredible expenses. At his coming to Rome his brother made him a feast, wherein were served up 2000 several dishes of fish, the daintiest that could be found, and 7000 sorts of fowl. But he far exceeded this preparation at the Dedication of the Great Platter, which he called Minerva's Target, in which were mixed together the livers of Guilt-beasts, brains of Pheasants and Peacocks, with the tongues of Phanicopters, and the small guts of Sea-Lampries fetched as far as the Carpathian Sea and the Straights of Gibraltar. He would also eat meat taken from the hearth in time of sacrifice, and fetched from Visiting houses, either smoking, made ready the day before, or half eaten.

5. ~~He was prone to the killing of any person and for any cause whatsoever:~~ Noble-men, his School-fellows and contemporaries, he deceitfully made away by degrees. To one in a Fever, desiring a draught of cold water, he gave poison in it with his own hands. He scarcely ever spared any of his creditors or others that asked him the money he ought. One of them saluting him, he sent away to be put to death, and presently again calling him back (for which the by-standers commended his clemency) he caused him to be killed before his eyes, saying, that he would satiate his eyes with the slaughter of him; and another that interceded for him, he put to death with his two sons. A certain Knight whom he commanded to be slain, to save his life, told him he had made him his heir, whereupon he commanded his will to be produced, in which finding that the man's Freedman was made coheir with him, he caused them both to be put to death. He was most cruel towards Mathematicians, because they foretold his reign would be but short. And to compleat all, he was suspected to have killed his mother. These vices only seemed to put him in mind of his condition, for else so great a stupidity had seized on him, that if others had not known him to be the Prince, he himself would quickly have forgot it. He accounted all sharp that was wholesome, liking of nothing but what was pleasant; and fortifying himself only with mirth and foolishness against all dangers, he forgot all things past, and regarded nothing present or to come: not a word of Warre proceeded from him, the rumour and talk of which was forbidden in the City. But he was within a short time roused by the coming of the forces of Vespasian, who was by others put upon seeking the Empire, being then Judea.

Thence removing to Jotapata, on the 21 day of May he took it by storm after 40 dayes, though stoutly defended by Joseph the Historian. Joseph was taken and kept to be sent prisoner to Nero; but desiring to speak with Vespasian, foretold him that he should loose him out of captivity, but as Emperour. After this, bestowing his Armie at Casarea and Scythopolis, to refresh the Legions, he himself went to Casarea Philippi, where he was entertained by Agrippa the King for twenty dayes. Then went he about to subdue Tiberias and Tarichea, whereof the former yielded, and was spared at the request of the King, but the later was taken by force and destroyed. After this were Gamala, Giscala, and the Hill Itaburium taken, and all Galile being reduced, Vespasian and Titus returned to Casarea. Idem l. 4. c. 1, 2, &c.

themselves.

7. The Jews were now imbroyled in civil dissentions, whilst some desired Peace, and others would not hear a word of it. Parties were made and fought in every City, and rash young men prevailed every where against the grave and elder sort, who foresaw the calamity. At first they robbed one another singly; but at length turned thieves, in whole troops committing such cruelties, as equalled the misfortune received from the Romans. At last the thieves loaded with plunder brake into Jerusalem, where they not onely consumed the provisions of the People, but filled the City with slaughters, rapines, and dissentions. They cast the principal of the Citizens into prison, and then put them to death unheard, pretending that they intended to betray the City to the Romans; yet for all this wickednesse they boasted of zeal for the Law of God, and customs of their Country, and thereupon were called Zealots. The People being about to rise against them, they betook themselves to the Temple, where they made one Phanias an ignorant fellow High-Priest, though he was not of the order of Priests; but they were opposed by Ananus, who procured the People to rise against them, and beat them into the inner part. Hereupon they sent to the Idumeans, accusing Ananus of an intention to betray their Country, and forasmuch as they fought for the liberty thereof, and now were besieged, they implored their assistance. Twenty thousand came, and being let into the City, together with the Zealots, committed horrid outrages against the Inhabitants. They slew 3000 the first night, and afterwards other 1200 of the chiefest, (amongst whom was Ananus) besides an infinite number of the common sort: then at length the Idumeans perceiving the wickednesse of the Zealots, and that they had falsely accused the Nobility, set at liberty 2000 which they had imprisoned, and returned home. After their departure the Zealots renewed their slaughters, and ragged more cruelly than ever, especially against such as they had found attempting to flye to the Romans. Idem ibid. c. 5, 6.

Horrid outrages committed by the Zealots.

8. But they presently after fell out amongst themselves, by reason of one John, who with a seditious party holding Giscala, pretended to receive the conditions given him by Titus, and stole away to Jerusalem. There becoming the great Incendiary, he now affected sovereign power; but he was withstood by such as before this had been equal to him. Though they thus disagreed, yet herein they consented, to spoil the People; and Jerusalem being thus filled with tumults, those that were without the City had liberty to rob and spoil, and those whose Towns were hereby destroyed, assembled together in the Wildernesse, and uniting, brake into other Temples and Towns; so that there was no place in Judea, which did not languish in an unheard-of manner together with the mother City. Vespasian excited by the seditious, and intreated by the fugitives to save their Country, prepared for the siege of Jerusalem, and that he might not leave an Enemy at his back, took in Gadara (where 13000 were put to the Sword) and all other places beyond the River, except the Castle of Macheron. He built Castles at Jericho and Adida, and made all things ready for the siege; but hearing of Nero's death, and the succession of Galba, he deferred the Expedition, and sent Titus. Idem l. 5. c. 3, 4, 5, 6, &c.

Uncertain what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, they neglected the Warre against the Jews, for they feared their own Country, and therefore thought it an unfit time to assault strangers. Yet he drew out his Army from Casarea, and subdued all forts of Judea save three Castles, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the thieves. Besides these Jerusalem onely remained to be conquered.

Vespasian.

9. Vespasian hearing of Otho's death, and having compassion on the State, thought of freeing the Commonwealth from the tyranny of Vitellius; but for that it was now Winter, and he was at a great distance from Rome, he strove to conceal that indignation which he had conceived. But Mucianus President of Syria perswaded him to it very earnestly: certain Soldiers also who were removed out of Syria into Mesia, giving him large commendations, the three Legions which proceeded as far as Aquileia to help Otho, resolved to proceed, notwithstanding his death, and put Vespasian's name into their Colours. First of all others, Tiberius Alexander Governour of Egypt, on the first of July swore the Legions to him, and two daies after the Army in Judea, compelling him with threats to take the Government upon him, took the oath. The Armies then in several Provinces declaring for him, he sent Mucianus with forces into Italy, and went himself to Alexandria, to make sure of Egypt. The Mesian Legions hearing of Mucianus his coming, chose Antonius Primus an excellent Soldier (who had been banished by Nero, and restored by Galba) for their Captain, and hasted for Italy, that they might have the plunder of the Country. Cacina (otherwise called Allienus) the General of Vitellius, made haste and got to Cremona before them; but considering the effeminate of his Army, he hearkned to the friendly advice sent him by Antonius, and perswaded his Soldiers, by laying before them the weaknesse of Vitellius, and the force of his adversary, to revolt. They accordingly sware fealty to Vespasian, but presently repenting, cast bonds upon their General as a traitor, and exhorted even Antonius to embrace the quarrel of Vitellius; then coming to blows, though they wanted a Leader, maintained a most sharp fight, both parties being possessed with such fury, as night it self could not sever them. They knew and talked to one another, ~~my intermitting the fight for some time~~ give victuals one to another, and yet after their repasts fell to it again. But in a morning the Soldiers of the third Legion saluting according to the fashion, the rising Sun, Vitellius his men thought Mucianus was arrived, and thereupon betook themselves to Cremona, where loosing Cacina, they procured him to make their Peace, and the Mesian Army entering the Town made great disorder.

10. Vitellius hearing of this was amazed, and not knowing what to do, became ridiculous unto all men; for his affairs went down the wind in all places. He covenanted then with Flavius Sabinus the brother of Vespasian for his own safety, and presently after at the stairs of the Palace, before many Soldiers, professed he would give up the Empire, which he had unwillingly taken upon him. But the Soldiers crying out against it, he deferred the thing, and in the morning went to the Rostra in a mourning habit, where with many tears out of a paper he uttered the same words he had before spoken to the Soldiers, who again interrupting him, the People bad him be of good cheer, and promised him their assistance. Taking courage hereat, he forced Sabinus (who was Governour of the City) with others into the Capitol, which setting on fire he suppressed them, Sabinus being put to death, whose nephew Domitian (afterwards Emperour) was hid by the Priest of Jupiter's Temple and escaped. Then would he have had the Senate send Ambassadors to the Enemy with the Vestal Nuns to beg Peace, or at least so much time as to consider what was to be done. But Vespasian's Soldiers enraged at the report of the besieging of the Capitol, made haste. Perilius Cerealis being sent before with a thousand Horse set upon the City, but was forced to retreat. Antonius

Primus coming on with the rest of the Army, many skirmishes hapned, till such time as the Guards being beaten from off the bridge Vespasian's men entered the Citie with great fury, wherein they committed grievous outrages. Vitellius was pulled out of an hole in the Palace where he lurked, at first unknown; but being discovered, he desired he might be kept in prison, for that he had something to reveal, which concerned the safety of Vespasian. But his hands being tied behind him, and an halter cast about his neck, he was dragged half naked into the Market-place, and abused in the way, both by many words and deeds, was killed with many blows, and cast after the fashion of Traitors into Tiber. This hapned in the 57th year of his age, after he had held the Government eight moneths, and five dayes. The day following Mucianus entred the Citie, and the Soldiers being hindred from any further slaughters, the Empire was by the Senate decreed to Vespasian, who hearing these things at Alexandria, receiving congratulatory Embassies from all quarters, and having settled affaires in Egypt, ere he set forward for Rome, ordered his son Titus to set upon Jerusalem, and finish the War in Judea.

11. Whilst Vespasian and Vitellius were yet disputing the controverſie, great commoions hapned in Germany, the Batavians (now Inhabitants of Holland in the Low-Countreys) rebelling first at the instigation of Civilis, the most eminent amongst them, who having been sent prisoner in Chains unto Nero, and dismissed by Galba, came into danger again under Vitellius, the Army requiring that he should be put to death. He drew into the conspiracy, besides the Caninafates (a more inconsiderable people inhabiting the same Island) by secret messages the Auxiliaries of Britain, and the Batavian Cohorts, which then quartered at Mogontiacum, now Mentz. They cast out, or destroyed the Roman Garrisons, overthrew Aquilus Captain of the Vanguard, and after him Mumius Lupercus the Lieutenant. Herennius Gallus also endeavouring to hinder the march of the Batavian Cohorts was worsted by them. Civilis after the coming of the Cohorts, to colour the matter, sware his Soldiers to Vespasian, and besieged such as refused in the old Camp. After this the Romans mutining against Hordonius, the command was given to Vocula, and Herennius Gallus was made his Lieutenant. Vocula in his first ingagement with Civilis had the worst, but at length by good hap overthrew him, the Vizard of his friendship to Vespasian being drawn off.

lib. 4.

12. The report of Vitellius his death through Germany and Gall doubled the War. For now Civilis without any pretence of friendship to Vespasian, carried himself as an Enemy to the Romans, and Vitellius his Soldiers rather wished for external servitude than his Government: the Galls also took heart, interpreting the burning of the Capitol to preſage the destruction of the Empire. The Treviri therefore (now Inhabitants of Triers) and the Lingones (now of Langres) revolted, when all Gall was in a tottering condition, and what was worse, and unheard of, the Legions proved unfaithfull, and were corrupted. For Vocula being slain, they took an Oath for the Empire of Gall, and to them other Legions in several places joyned themselves, some being besieged upon necessity, and afterwards cut in pieces by Civilis as they had deserved. In the mean time Julius Sabinus one of the revolters taking on him the name of Cesar, led a great and disorderly Company against the Sequani (inhabiting the Countrey now called La Franche Conté) who not refusing batrel routed the multitude, and put him to flight. These things being reported at Rome rather with improvement, all things seemed there to be lost, whereupon Domitian the son of Vespasian, and Mucianus, addressed themselves to the War, and four Legions were presently dispatched away towards Germany.

Idem ibid.

13. By this time the Galls by the means especially of Julius Vindex, began to consider of the power of the Romans, and at length approved rather of a servile peace than a dangerous War; Petilius Cerealis also gave the Treviri a great overthrow, and most of the revolters returned to obedience. After

Petilius Cerealis.

After this he accepted of battel from Civilis and Classicus his companion, in the beginning whereof he had the worst, for the Legions began to be broken, the horse was put to flight, and the bridge over the River Mosella gained by the Enemy; but though he had now lost even all for want of heed, yet he restored all by his diligence, so as on the same day he took, and destroyed the Enemy's Camp. Domitian and Mucianus heard of the successe ere they came to the Alps, and Mucianus perswaded Domitian against marching further, knowing his ambitious and naughty humour, which he had already betrayed whilest at Rome; but his advice succeeding not, he went with him out of compliance to Lyons, whence, as 'tis said, Domitian wrote privately to Cerealis to deliver up the Army to him, that he might therewith seize on the Empire. But perceiving he was despised for his youth, he betook himself to such courses whereby he thought that his designs might best be covered. During these stirs Vespasian was yet at Alexandria. Afterwards both Civilis recruited his Forces through Germany, and Cerealis also doubled his strength, whereupon followed several fights, the effect of which was a Peace. For the Batavians were so chastized, as glad they were to accept of it, as Civilis of pardon, both of which were offered by the Roman General.

The invasion of the Sarmate.

14. With the aforefaid revolt of the Germans, at the same time, saith * Josephus, agreed the boldnesse of the Scythians. For those that are called Sarmata, in great multitudes having privily passed over Ister, being violent, and most cruel, through the suddenesse of their invasion killed many of the Romans whom they found in Garrisons, with Fonseius Agrippa the Lieutenant (who valiantly resisted them) and wasted all the adjacent Countreys with fire and sword. Vespasian hearing of this, and the wasting of Mesia, sent Rubrius Gallus to chastize them, by whom many being slain, such as escaped returned home in great fear. The War being thus ended, the General taking care for the future, fortified the places with stronger Garrisons, that the passage might be utterly impassable to the Barbarians. These first eruptions of the Barbarous Northern Nations are therefore more to be noted, because at length they over-ran and destroyed the Roman Empire. Now return we to the affairs of the Jews, and the War managed by Titus.

* De bello Iudaico lib. 7, cap. 23.

The Zealots
fall out amongst themselves.

15. During the former transactions in the West, a faction was raised against the Zealots by one Simon the son of Giora, who getting together a company of Thieves and Murderers that were assembled on the Hilly Countrey, fell upon many Villages and Cities, brought all Idumaea into his power, wasted Judea, pitched his Camp against Jerusalem it self, and became a great terror to the poor Inhabitants, who were most cruelly oppressed by the Zealots within. In the mean time such Idumeans as had of late fled into the Citie, and were become of John's party (whom the Zealots had now chosen their Captain) fell at odds with him, detesting his cruelty, and killing many of his men, forced the Tyrant out of his Palace into the Temple; but he, and the Citizens fearing that by night he might fall out upon the Citie, they let in Simon, and then set upon the Temple, but in vain. After this Eleazar, who once had been chief amongst the Zealots, envying John his power, withdrew some Soldiers from him, and kept the inwardst part of the Temple, whereby John was forced to fight, both against Simon and him. Hereby all things about the Temple were burnt up, and Provisions destroyed, which might have served them a long time, and for want whereof they were oppressed with famine in the siege.

Josephus de bello Iudaico lib. 5, cap. 9. & 1, 6, 6, 1.

Titus besiegeth
the Citie.

15. But Titus in prosecution of his fathers orders came from Alexandria to Casarea, where gathering together some forces with aids from the Neighbouring Kings, he appointed the rest to follow him, and marched towards Jerusalem, accompanied with Tiberius Alexander, (who now began to be in principal favour) and Joseph the Jew being for the truth of his prediction now released out of bonds. He sate down within six or seven furlongs of the Citie, a little before the Feast of the Passeeover, and therein shut up an infinite multitude, which according to the custom flocked to that solemnity; and hereby all Provisions were consumed in a short time. The three factions upon sight of his great Army agreed to oppose it, and issuing out, made great disorder, forcing the Romans to forsake their Camp, and fly to the Mountains; but they were repelled by the great care and industry of Titus. But on the day of unleavened bread (April the 14) Eleazar, who kept the inward part of the Temple, opening the Gates to the people, which was desirous to sacrifice, John sent many of his party in amongst the rest with swords hid under their Cloaths, who killing Eleazar, and many of his faction, seized also on that part of the Temple, and thereby the number of the factions was reduced to that of two. That under John consisted of 8400. and the other under Simon of 10000 fighting men besides 5000 Idumeans. Notwithstanding the Enemy was at the Walls, and to oppose him, they a little joyned together; yet did they break out the one upon the other, and the poor people miserably suffered under both.

 to it.

16. The Citie being fortified with three Walls on every side, but where it was fenced with deep Valleys, Titus having with much opposition placed his Engines, battered the uttermost of them, and breaking, on the third of May into the Citie, possessed all the North part as far as the Tower of Antonius, and the Valley of Cearon. Five dayes after, he brake within the second Wall, though the besieged made divers sallies. They beat him out again, but the fourth day after he recovered the place, and prepared for the battery of the third Wall. Yet he sent Joseph the Historian to them, who exhorting them with many words to yield, was entertained onely with scoffs and reproaches. The people thinking to escape out of the Citie, John and Simon stopped up all passages; yet the famine increasing many came out, whom being taken Titus caused to be Crucified to such a vast number that room was wanting for Crosses, and Crosses for persons. On the 12th of May he began four Mounts whereon to place his battering rams: two near to the Castle Antonia, where he hoped he might take the Temple, and other two near the Monument of John the High-Priest, where he thought he should with most ease break into the upper part of the Citie. But John, whose part it was to oppose the Romans in the former place, cast down, and burnt them two; and two dayes after Simon did as much by the other, though seventeen dayes had been spent in making them all. He destroyed also many rams and engines, and brake into the very Camp of the Romans; but was repelled by Titus from Antonia, who in a Council of Officers resolved now to compass the whole City with a trench, which with incredible diligence and celerity was finished in three dayes, with thirteen forts to hinder the flight of the besieged, and hinder the conveyance of relief into the City.

 geth.

17. The seditious were nothing herewith moved, though the famine not only raged amongst the common sort, but themselves also were pressed by it. A certain Noble woman sod her child to eat it, and such a mortality ensued, that from the fourteenth of April to the first of July were caried out to be buried at the publick charge 115080 carkeises of the poorer sort, as Titus was told by one Mannans, who was appointed to pay the money. Divers Noble men that fled to him, certified him also that 600000 of the ordinary sort were cast dead out of the gates, and others that were dead besides, were innumerable; for because they could not cary all out, they laid them up in houses. A bushel of corn was sold for a talent, sinks and holes were raked to find old dung of Oxen to eat, which much moved the Romans to compassion, but the seditious were hereby nothing changed. For Simon not obtaining from murders and rapines, notwithstanding this lamentable condition, killed Matthias the High-Priest, by whom he had been let into the City, with his three sons, and sixteen others, pretending that they purposed to flie to the Enemy. Judas one of his own Officers hereupon weary of his cruelty, attempted to betray a certain Tower, whereof he had the charge, to the Romans; but being discovered, was put to death with ten others of his complices. John also being driven by necessity, converted the Golden Vessels of the Temple with the sacred Money to prophane uses, and was con-constrained to divide the Wine and Oil, ordained for Sacrifices, to his Soldiers.

18. Titus cut down all the groves within a great distance of the City, and causing more mounts or scaffolds to be erected within 21 dayes, on the first of July began to batter the wall of Anonia, John that opposed him being beaten back, and on the fift day broke into the Castle. At this time many false Prophets suborned by the seditious, told the multitude they must expect assistance from God, and therefore though Titus often exhorted them to yield, they flatly refused, boasting that they would rather endure all miseries. The contest was earnest about the Temple. The wall of the inward part thereof was too strong for the battering rams, and the defendants valiantly resisted at the top: the foundation of the gates could not be undermined, and therefore Titus was constrained to set them on fire. Yet was it his intention to save the Temple, but on the tenth of August, a certain soldier without any command, (nay against the command of his General) moved as by an instinct from above, cast fire into the buildings on the North side, which catching the flame imparted it to the Temple it self, notwithstanding all that Titus could do to quench it, on the same day of the same moneth that it was formerly set on fire by the command of Nebuchadnezar. The Temple thus burning Titus was saluted Imperator by his Soldiers, and the Tyrants with their companions fled into the City. They now desired a parly with the General himself, who checked them much for their obstinacy, but promised them life if they would yield. But refusing to commit themselves to his fidelity, they required to depart the City with their wives and children, wherewith being greatly angred, he commanded to be proclaimed by a Crier, that They should not look any longer for mercy.

19. He permitted his Soldiers to plunder and burn the City, but the seditious wretches got to the King's house, where many had deposited their wealth, and thence repelled the Romans. They also killed of their own Country People to the number of 6400, and rifling the money got them into the upper and strongest part of the City, called Sion, where for all this danger they still most cruelly tyrannized. Titus having considered the strength of the place, provided engines to batter the walls, and began so to do it on the seventh day of September. Part of the wall being broken down, the Tyrants were seized with great fear and amazement, not knowing what to do. Some said the East part of it was broken down, others that the Romans were entred, and that they saw them out of the Towers; so that the power of God appeared in the overthrow of these wretches; for they forsook the Towers which were their onely strength, and in vain seeking to escape, hid themselves in caves and privies. The Romans entering, put all to the Sword, and burnt the houses with all that fled to them for safeguard. Titus commanded both the Temple and City to be utterly razed by a plow brought over them, according to the custom; onely the West part of the wall with three Towers for their strength and beauty he preserved, to bear testimony of the statelineffe of the City to posterity. They would have crowned him as a Conquerour for this work, but he refused the honour, denying he was the author of it, for that he onely served God herein, who by it demonstrated his wrath against the Jews. To such an end came this famous City, on the eighth day of September, in the second year of Vespasian, he and Titus his son being Consuls, 38 years after the death of Christ, the Blood of whom now fell heavy upon them. It had been taken in all six times; by Asochans or Shishack King of Egypt, Nebuchadnezar, Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, Herod and Sosius, and now by Titus; but twice onely was it destroyed, viz. by Nebuchadnezar and Titus. It was first built, saith Josephus, by Melchisedeck King of Salem, and afterwards enlarged by David. It was destroyed by the Babylonians 1468 years and six moneths after the founding of it, and 477 years and six moneths after it had been taken by David from the Canaanites. By Titus Vespasian it was destroyed 1179 years after David took it, but from it's first founding to it's last destruction intervned 2177 years.

20. John and Simon having hid themselves were taken, and the former being condemned to perpetual prison, the other was reserved for a Triumph. The rest of the thieves and seditious were discovered, one telling of another, and were all slain. Of those which during the whole War were taken captives the number amounted to 97000, and of those that perished in the siege to 1100000. So heavy was the guilt which lay on them for the death of Christ, and such were the horrid enormities committed by them, that we have reason to agree with Josephus, who thought, that if the Romans had delayed to come against them, the City would either have been swallowed up of the Earth, or have perished by some Deluge, or else by Thunderbolts and Lightning have undergone the punishments of Sodom, whose Inhabitants they exceeded in wickedness. A year after was Lucilius Bassus sent Lieutenant into Judea, who taking the Army of Cerealis Vespasianus took the Castle of Herodian and of Macharun beyond Jordan. Not long after Vespasian wrote to Liberius Maximus the Governour, to sell all the Land of the Jews, upon whom wheresoever they lived he imposed a yearly tribute to be paid into the Capitol, it being that they were wont to pay into the Temple at Jerusalem. About a year after Publius Sylva succeeded Bassus then dead, and finished the War, taking the strong Castle of Massada from Eleazar, who held it with 960 backsters, who upon his motion set fire on the Castle and all their goods, and then killed themselves. Many such as these flying out of the Country came to Alexandria in Egypt, where they solicited the Jews to revolt, but were by them delivered up to the Romans, and those of them that then escaped were afterwards taken. Vespasian hearing of their attempt, gave order to Lupus Governour of Alexandria, to demolish the Temple of the Jews (built in Egypt in times past by Onias brother of the High-Priest) which he neglecting to do, onely spoiled it of some consecrated things, and shut it up. But Paulinus his Successor utterly bereaved it of all, and so shut it up, that he made it inaccessible, and without any shew of Religion, 343 years after it was first built by Onias.

21. But the Jews of Cyrene were also infected with a distemper of madness. There one Jonathan a Weaver led many of the simple sort into the Wilderness, promising to shew them signs and wonders; but by the chieftest of the Jews the matter being discovered to Caullus Governour of those parts, he sent Soldiers who slew most of them, and not long after Jonathan himself was taken. Caullus a covetous man procured him and others to accuse many unjustly, whom having slain and seized on their estates, he carried him to Rome, where following the same trade, Joseph the Historian was also accused; but Vespasian having found out the deceit, caused Jonathan first to be whipped, and then burnt alive. Caullus at present escaped through the mildness of the Emperour, but not long after fell into grievous anguish of mind, imagining he saw the ghosts of those he had slain, and his bowels rotted away from him, that he died miserably. Thus far hath Josephus communicated to us the affairs of the Jews, who being kindly entertained by Vespasian, was honoured with a Statue, and his Books were thought worthy of the publick Library. For the truth of his History concerning the Wars, he had the testimony of the Emperours, King Agrippa, and others. Titus would have the certain knowledge of these Wars delivered unto the World by his Books onely, commanding them to be published with the privilege of his own hand. And King Agrippa wrote 62 Epistles, wherein he testified of the true History delivered by him. But his Jewish Antiquities he finished not till the thirteenth of Domitian, when he himself was 56 years old, as he testifieth at the end of that Work.

23. In the fourth year of Vespasian, Cassianus Pater President of Syria, accused Antiochus King of Comagena and Epiphanes his Son, as holding correspondence with the Parthian, whereupon order was given him to prevent what might ensue. Pater then invaded Comagena, which Antiochus quitted, being loth to fight, and fled into Cilicia. His sons also, after they had made some opposition, went to Vologesus into Parthia. But Pater procured Antiochus to be taken and sent to him bound towards Rome, yet Vespasian caused him to be loosed, and stay at Lacedæmon, where he allowed him a revenue to live like himself, and he afterwards sent for both him and his sons to the City, where they were magnificently entertained. About this time the Alani, who being Scythians inhabited about Tarais and the Lake Meotis, consulted with the King of the Hyrcanians who was Master of the Straights to invade Media, which they entred and sacked at their pleasure, Pacorus the King being forced up into a strong hold, and glad to redeem his wife and concubines with 100 Talents. From Media they passed into Armenia, and wasted the Country. Tiridates the King opposed them, but was near being taken alive in battel, for with his sword he cut in pieces the rope that was cast about his neck, as they were therewith drawing him amongst his Enemies, and escaped. But they enraged at his opposition wasted the Kingdom, and carrying great booty out of both Countries returned home.

and Comagena, the King whereof he sent for to Rome, as we said before. Cappadocia now began to be over-run with barbarous Nations, to restrain whom he added Legions, and placed one of Consular dignity over it in room of a Knight. At length all Wars and tumults being suppressed both at home and abroad, he shut the Temple of Jannus the sixth time from the foundation of the City. It was his principal care first to settle and establish the afflicted and tottering condition of the Empire, and then to adorn it. Whereas the City was very deformed by reason of the burning of it, he permitted any to build upon old plots, if the owners would relinquish them: he also re-edified the Capitol. As to his personal quality, he was of much temper and clemency, easily passing by and forgetting injuries. The meanness of his former condition he sought not to hide, but sometimes would profess it openly. He took not the Tribunitial power, nor title of Father of his Country for some time. If any innocent person were punished it was solely against his will, and for want of knowledge. He passed by the treason of many that had plotted his destruction, saying, They were fools, and knew not what a weight and trouble the Empire was: he wept and groaned at the punishment of an offender. To Vologeses King of Parthia who wrote to him thus: Artaxerxes King of Kings to Fl. Vespasian, without any reproof he directed his answer thus, Fl. Vespasian to Artaxerxes King of Kings. The only vice reprehended in him was covetousness, and yet to that seeking earnestly for money, he was constrained through the necessities of the State. 'Tis certain he used it well however gotten, being very liberal in feasting, relieving impoverished Senators, and others of desert. He encouraged learning, and gave the first stipends out of the Exchequer to the Professors thereof. He was Consul eight times (besides once before he was Emperour) and in his last Consulship died of a flux, in the 69 year of his age, the tenth of his reign being completed; in the 832 of the City, A. D. 79, he himself the ninth time and Titus Caesar the seventh being Consuls. He was the first Emperour whose successor was his own son. In his time flourished Pliny the elder and writer of the Natural History. Who also the same year that he died, whilst he went to see what might be the cause of the burning of the hill Vesuvius, was stifled with the smoak thereof, and died, as Pliny Junior his nephew writes in his Epistle * to Trajan. Now also Quintilian and other learned men were famous.

Titus succeedeth him.

25. Titus his eldest son succeeded him (by whom Jerusalem had been taken, and destroyed) on the eighth of the Calends of June. He was born that year wherein Caius was slain, and brought up with Britannicus the son of Claudius, being instructed in the same things by the same Masters: he was thought also to have drunk some of the poyson which Nero gave to that Prince, and that this was the cause of his want of health some conjectured. He performed the Office of Tribune both in the Wars of Germany and Britain with great commendations, and after that, being Quaestor, came to have the command of a Legion in Judea. After his father came to the Government he was suspected by some, when he was yet in Egypt, as intending to establish himself, whereupon he hasted to Rome to cut off all jealousies. Taking then part with his father in the publick cares, he triumphed with him over Judea, executed with him the Censorship, Tribuneship, and seven Consulships; nay taking as it were all upon him, he dictated letters in his fathers name, published edicts, spake in the Senate, and that in the room of the Quaestor, and took on him the Government of the Palace, which never had formerly been discharged but by some Roman Knight; and this Office he executed with such rigor, that he contracted much envy, and was accounted cruel. He was suspected of luxury, for feasting with voluptuous persons till midnight; of incontinency also, being (amongst other arguments) too familiar with Berenice the sister of King Agrippa, to which Lady he is also said to have promised marriage, but performed it not, because of the distaste of the People. Moreover rapacity was laid to his charge. He was both accounted and openly talked of as another Nero, and scarcely did any any ever came with more fear or lesse favour to the Government.

His admirable virtues.

26. But so contrarily to expectation did he behave himself, that his former carriage did but set him off with the greater lustre; and so free was he from all vice, and adorned with so many virtues, that he became the Love and delight of mankind, and by an happy exchange was so called. His temperance he shewed in the moderation of his diet, the choice of his companions, and putting away Berenice: his moderation by abstaining utterly from other mens goods, and refusing often ordinary benevolences, although no man ever exceeded him in munificence. He was the Mirroure of courtesy, being wont to say, that no man should go sorrowful from the presence of the Prince; and on a day having done no courtesie for any man, he said, Amici diem perdidisti, My friends I have lost a day. Several sad accidents hapned in his litle time; so great a Pestilence as seldom had been known. So great a fire there was in Rome, and kindled from Heaven, that it burnt three dayes together. Vesuvius also the hill in Campania burst forth with great flames, and destroyed all round about it; all which miseries he lessened as much as he could, neither sparing cost nor pains to relieve the distressed. At the same time another War arose in Britain, wherein Cn. Julius Agricola harrazed all the Country of the Enemies, and first of all the Romans that we know of, saith Dio*, knew that Britain was compassed about by the sea. For certain Soldiers in a Sedition having killed their Centurions and Tribunes fled to their ships, and lanching out, sailed about that part of Britain which lieth toward the West, being caried by waves and wind: when they had done this, and by chance light upon the other Camp of the Romans on the other side, Agricola sent out others to hold the same course, from whom he also knew that it was an Island. These things being done in Britain, Titus was saluted Imperator the fifteenth time. Agricola passed the rest of his life in ignominie and poverty, because he had done greater things than were suitable for a Pretor; and for that cause he was afterwards put to death by Domitian, though by the permission of Titus he had triumphed. But concerning these things Tacitus is rather to be consulted in the life of Agricola.

Several calamities in his time.

27. Titus put down informers, usually tollerated before. His mercy was too great; for he vowed he had rather perish than destroy another, as according to the judgment of some it came to passe. Amongst others that plotted his destruction, he not onely spared his brother Domitian, but had him in the same respect as from the beginning, and owned him as his partner and successor; onely betwixt them two he besought him with tears at length to relent to Love and Unity. He was a man of excellent parts, both outward and inward accomplishments; but to the great losse of man-kind, was presently taken away, whether by the treachery of his brother or no, is uncertain. In the beginning of his sickness he is said to have look'd up to Heaven, as taking it ill he should dye so soon, being not conscious to himself of any sin, save one, which as he did not expresse, so it is altogether unknown. He was with good reason sadly lamented throughout the Provinces. He died in the same Village his Father had ended his dayes, near the Country of the Sabines, in the 42 year of his age, when he had reigned two years, as many monerhs, and twenty dayes; in the 834 year of the City, A. D. 81. M. Plantius Silvanus, and M. Annius Verus being Consuls.

He dieth.

Domitian his brother succeedeth him.

28. Domitian (so called from Domitilla their mother) succeeded Titus, being more like to Nero, Caligula, or Tiberius, than either father or brother. His youth he passed disgracefully enough. Doubring upon the death of his father, whether he should not give a double donative to the Soldiers to obtain their good-will, he never feared to boast that he was left partner in the Empire by his father, but that his testament was corrupted. He never ceased to plot against his brother secretly or openly, and ere he was quite dead commanded him to be caried out as such. In the beginning of his reign he restrained himself; for his cruelty was then employed upon flies, which privately in a room hee was wont to catch and prick with a bodkin, so that one asking whether any body was within with Cesar? it was not un-swered by Vibius Crispus, No not so much as a flie. But though at present he strove to allay the fury of his vices by some forced virtue, yet within a while he let fall also this vizard, and became in appearance what inwardly his disposition inclined him to be.

Great difficulties in his time,

29. He undertook several Expeditions, as against the Catti and Sarmatians (People inhabiting the Northern parts of Europe) who had cut off a whole Legion. The Dacians also put him to much trouble, and grievously afflicted the Roman State, under conduct of Diarpaneus their King; for they overthrew first Oppius Sabinus a man of Consular dignity, and next Cornelius Fuscus Captain of the Guards, in several fore and bloody battels, inso-much that the Historians of those times, have thought fittest to passe over in silence the number of the slain; Yet at length he triumphed over them all. He was also struck at by a Civil War raised by L. Antonius President of upper Germany, whom he had incensed by the odiousnesse of his vices, and especially by uncivil language. This he finished absent with admirable felicity; for, that very hour the fight was to be, the Rhine swelled so high, that it hindred the Auxiliaries which were sent to Antonius from joyning with him. In the second year of his reign Agricola defeated the Ordovices in Britain, and took the Isle Mona about Autumn, and that upon his first coming into the Island. So that the years of the Expeditions which Tacitus afterwards relateth, are rather to be reckoned from the Kalends of January of the former year, as Jacobus Cappellus hinteth. Though Dion Cassius, as appeareth from Xiphilin, referred the discovery of that Britain an Island to the reign of Titus. Yet others unto the time of Domitian, who at length envying Agricola that great glory he had got in reducing Britain, recalled him under pretence of sending him into Asia; and he died two years after, on the tenth of the Kalends of September in the 56 year of his age, Pompeius Collega and Cornelius Priscus being Consuls. Whether hee died of poyson or not, though there wanted not suspicions, Tacitus his son-in-law dareth not affirm.

Which yet he overcometh.

30. Domitian having suppressed the rebellion of Antonius, grew extraordinarily cruel, putting men to death upon small and trivial accounts. Those of any note that were of his party he tortured to death by wayes unheard of, and confounded the cause of the innocent with that of the guilty, raging against the Christians with a second persecution. He arrived at that horrid arrogance, that he sticke not to say in the Senate, that he gave the Empire to his father and brother, who did but restore it to him; and (what was worse than this) he would be called our Lord and God. Being hereby rendered terrible and hatefull unto all, he wrought his own destruction, which fearing, and being foretold it by the Chaldeans, he grew timorous out of measure, and was ruined with the least suspicion. Hence did he cause the place where he was wont to abide to be beset with the stone Phengites, that he might see if any one came behind him; and though he was sufficiently ambitious, yet did he refuse an extraordinary honour offered him by the Senate, viz. that when he bore the Consulship, Knights should go before him with spears amongst the Sergeants. Hence also he put Epaphroditus his Secretary to death, because it was believed that he had helped Nero in dispatching himself; and he killed Flavius his Uncle, though he had openly owned his two sons as his Successors, whereof the one he called Vespasian, and the other Domitian; which hastened his destruction. Eight moneths after he was slain by his own servants, of whom Parthenius the chief of his Chamber was principal, Domitia his wife being drawn in to the conspiracy, for that she feared to be poysoned for her kindnesse to Paris. Longinus Proculus then in Germany is said to have foretold the very day of his death, and Apollonius Tyaneus a famous Magician (who being convented before him vanished out of sight) spoke of it that very hour, exhorting Stephanus as it were to strike him home. The people took his death indifferently, the Soldiers heavily, which they shortly after revenged upon the murtherers; but the Senate as it were triumphed, and ordered the memory of him to be abolished. The best thing we find concerning him was, that though he was no Scholar himself, he took

31. Now must we give a short account of Ecclesiastical affairs according to the course of time and matter. (a) Dionysius the Arcopagite being by St. Paul, (who converted him to the faith) made Bishop of Athens, governed that Church in the time of Nero and afterwards. There are extant several works under his name, but suspected; and sundry Epistles, whereof one to John the Evangelist then in the Isle Pathmos, and another unto Polycarpus. Linus the Bishop of Rome, being Crowned with Martyrdom on the ninth of the Calends of October, in the last year of Nero, according to Damasus, Clemens or Anacleus succeeded him in that See. Some next unto Linus do place Clemens, then Cletus, and then Anacleus. But Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Epiphanius rank them thus: Peter, Linus, Cletus, or Anacleus, Clemens; for he whom Irenaeus and Eusebius call Anacleus, is by Epiphanius and Damasus called Cletus. This Cletus according to Damasus died in the 2 year of Domitian, on the sixth before the Calends of May, and was succeeded by Anacleus. But (b) Eusebius maketh Anacleus to have been Bishop twelve years, and in the 12th of Domitian to have been succeeded by Clemens, whom St. Paul in his Epistle to the Philippians, calleth his fellow labourer. In the fourth year of the reign of Domitian (c) Anianus the first Bishop of Alexandria (having continued there 32 years) died, to whom succeeded Abilinus. As for the Bishops of Byzantium afterwards called Constantinople, we have them in this order from (d) Nicephorus the Patriarch. The first was Andrew the Apostle, who having preached the word at Byzantium, and built an Oratory in Argyropolis ordained Stachys to be Bishop, of whom (e) St. Paul maketh mention. Stachys governed 16 years, after him succeeded in the year of our Lord 55 Onesimus, who governed 14. then Polycarpus ruled 17. and Eleutherius 7. who came to the Chair A. D. 85. in the second of Domitian.

32. Domitian having raised the second persecution against the Christian faith, St. John the Apostle, who having continued at Ephesus 27 years, was in the ninth of his reign banished into the Island (a) Pathmos one of the Cyclades, where he wrote his Revelation. In this work he sheweth both Christ's and his own hatred of the Doctrine of the Nicolaitans; for several Heresies had by this time sprung up, as St. Paul had forewarned. (b) Eusebius maketh Simon Magus the first Author of Heresies, concerning whom we have already spoken, but as to his Heresies particularly, 1. He affirmed that he himself was Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that he was worshipped of all people by divers names. 2. That Christ did suffer no hurt from the Jews; for he was Christ. 3. That any man might ly with any woman, for this was no sin. 4. That the World was made by Angels, and that an Angel redeemed mankind. 5. He denied the Resurrection. 6. He thought that the gifts of the holy Ghost might be bought with money, and therefore that sin of him is called Simony. (c) Ni-

He having a fair wife, and being accused of jealousy, permitted any to marry her, at which fact others taking occasion, thought it lawfull for any man to have the company of any woman whom they themselves could like. (d) Epiphanius writeth, that they taught Venerie to be so necessary, that those men who used it not every week on Friday could not be saved. Besides these Hereticks, about the year 69 sprung up the Heresie of the Cerinthians. (e) Cerintus was a Jew by birth. He taught that the World was made by Angels: 2. That Jesus our Saviour had for his Parents indeed Joseph and Mary, and that at his baptism Christ descended on him, who (saith he) is called the holy Ghost, by whom he did all his miracles; when Jesus was to be crucified of the Jews, then Christ left him, and returned into Heaven. 3. That Christ's Kingdom after the resurrection should be an earthly Kingdom, and men then should live in all fleshly lusts and pleasures together for 1000 years. 4. He denied the Divine nature of Christ, and said, that he had onely an humane nature; and that he was not yet risen from the dead, but should rise hereafter. 5. He affirmed that the old law, and all the old Commandments and Precepts belonging to it were to be kept, together with the new Law or Gospel, and that therefore Circumcision was necessary for every one that would be saved. Epiphanius writeth, that certain Hereticks called Alogi, affirmed Cerinthus to have been the Author of the Revelation.

33. About the beginning of Domitian arose also the Heresie of Menander a Samaritan, and the Scholar of Simon Magus. He taught first, that the World was made by Angels, and that these Angels could be overcome by no means but by Art Magick. 2. He denied Christ to be true man. 3. He affirmed himself the Saviour of the World, and that he came from Heaven to save mankind, & that all who would be saved must be baptized in his name. Out of his Doctrine (that we may speak of these Hereticks briefly) budded that of Saturninus of Antioch, who not long after in like manner taught, 1. That the world was made by seven Angels, without the knowledge of God the father. 2. That Christ was but the shadow of a man, for he had neither the true Body nor Soul of a man, and thus he fulfilled the mystery of our redemption. 3. He said moreover that marriage and procreation was of the Devil. Basilides, of whom were named the Basilidians, agreed in several points with Simon, Menander, and Saturninus. He taught, that Christ did not suffer but Simon of Cyrene; that Christ taking the form of Simon laughed them to scorn. 2. He turned men away from Martyrdom, affirming that it was no sin to deny Christ in time of persecution. 3. That the Angels made 365 Heavens, and that these Heavens made the World. He wrote 24 books upon the Gospel, and feigned to himself Prophets, whom he called Barcabas and Barcoph. He commanded silence to his Scholars for the space of five years, after the manner of Pythagoras.

Carpocrates and the Gnosticks his Scholars.

34. Irenaeus writeth, that in the time of these two Carpocrates lived, the father of the Heresie held by the Gnosticks, who thought good not to make known the Sorcery of Simon privily but openly, glorying of charmed love-drinks, of Devilish, and drunken dreams, of assistant and associate spirits, with other like illusions. They taught further, that who so would attain to the perfection of their mysteries must work such facts though never so filthy, otherwise could they not overcome (as they termed them) the secular Potentates, unless every one played his part after the same secret operation. These were the most vile Hereticks in filthiness of all others. They held 1. That the Soul was made of the substance of God, and that brute beasts have reason as man hath. 2. That there are two Gods, a good and an evil one, and that this evil God was the Creator of all things. Carpocrates also taught 1. That Christ was a meer man born of Joseph, and not of the blessed Virgin, that he was a good man, and therefore after he was Crucified his soul went up into Heaven, but his body is still in the Grave. 2. That the World was made by Angels. 3. That there is no resurrection. 4. He rejected the Old Testament as not Canonical. Besides these, at this time arose the Heresie of the Ebionites, so called from Ebion. He taught, that Christ was but a meer man. 2. That when Jesus was 30 years old there descended on him, and dwelt in him another person called Christ, and thus Jesus and Christ dwelt, and were united together. 2. He agreed with Cerinthus in the rest of the Heresies, touching Circumcision, and keeping all the Law of Moses. He denied the Epistles of Paul, accusing him that he fell from the Law. The Jewish Sabbath, and other Ceremonies he observed together with the Jews, onely the Sunday he celebrated as we do in remembrance of the resurrection. 'Tis reported that St. John hearing Ebion was in the Bath restrained his company, and having seen and allowed the three Gospels published by the other Evangelists, wrote his own to confute the Heresies of him, Cerinthus and Menander.

CHAP. IV.

From the death of Domitian to that of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to publick sale by the Soldiers, the space of 97 years.

1. IT is reported of Domitian, that not long before his death he dreamed, that a golden neck and head was grown up on his shoulders, and that he was fully assured, that after him were thereby portended golden dayes to the Commonwealth. This truly came to passe through the abstinence, moderation, and excellent government of the six succeeding Princes, during the reign of whom the Roman Empire (for temporal respects) enjoyed more happynesse, than ever before or after, Strangers affording that, which the Natives of Italy would not contribute to their own Country.

Sueton in Domitian, Eutropius, Xiphilinus ex Dione.

Golden dayes after Domitian.

2. Cocceius Nerva, an old man, and born in Crete (say some, though others make him a native of Narnia in Italy) after the death of Domitian had the Empire put upon him, by the Legions which then quartered amongst the Sequani in Gall. After his assuming the Government, a strong rumour went abroad, that Domitian was yet living, which somewhat perplexed him, till by Parthenius, and Petronius, Captains of the guards, he was put out of doubt; and afterwards his election was confirmed by the Senate. He took down the golden and silver Statues erected to Domitian, whereof was raised a great sum of money, and forbad any to be set up to himself. He recalled such as his predecessors banished, and amongst others the Christians, so that St. John the Apostle returned out of Pachmos unto Ephesus. Calpurnius Crassus by vast promises attempted to draw the Soldiers from him; but being happily discovered, he only banished him to Tarentum. He eased the Commonwealth of the grievous impositions laid upon it, and having conjoynd these two things, in the times of some of his Predecessors insociable, viz. Sovereignty and Liberty, although he had kindred of his own, yet he adoped M. Ulpius Trajanus, a Spaniard born, who then ruled Germany, preferring herein the publick good before private respects. He lived with him but three moneths. For falling out with the Senate, he was in so great a passion, that it drove his natural heat into a Fever, whereof he died on the sixth before the Calends of February, having lived 65 years, and reigned one year, four moneths, and nine dayes, in the 851 year of the City, A.D. 98, he himself the fourth, and Trajanus Caesar the second time, being Consuls.

3. Trajan succeeded him, and took the Ensigns of the Empire at Agripina a Colony in Gall. He presently reduced all Germany beyond the Rhine into it's wanted condition, brought under also several Nations beyond the River Danubius. But Diurpanes (or Diurpanis, Decebalus, or Decibalus, for he hath several names) King of the Daci, who had formerly forced Domitian to pay tribute, held him stiffly to it for the space of five years, with the expence of so much blood, that there wanted linnen to bind up the wounds of the Soldiers, and the Emperour rare his own robe to supply the defect thereof. But at length he brought them under, and planted Colonies in that Country. He reduced Armenia, having killed him that seized on it, conquered Parthia (whence he was called Parthicus) and passing over Tigris and Euphrates, invaded Persia and Assyria; and got into his hands Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Babylon. Considering Trajan as an Heaven Prince, in excellency of Government he was second to none. He extended the Empire further than any of his predecessors; so that now it reached from the Irish Ocean beyond the River Tigris: from the Atlantick Sea to the Persian Gulf; from the Mount Atlas to the Calidonian Forrest: as also as far as the River Albis, and beyond Danubius. He had in his intention to invade India with a Fleet, which he ordered to be provided in the Red Sea. He was saluted person in civil matters,

saluted Optimus by the Senate. His moderation was exceeding great, being backed with such a confidence of his own innocence, that giving a dagger to Saburanus according to the custom, when he made him Captain of his Guard, he bade him use it in his behalf if he did well, but imploy it against him, if he found him to transgress the bounds of Law and equity, for as much as he that ought to look to others, should most of all look to himself. He so used his Subjects as he himself (he said) would desire his Prince should use him, were he a private person. Though he was not learned himself, yet he much favoured humane and secular Learning, conversing very familiarly and often with the Professors thereof, whom he also preferred to publick Offices.

His discourse with Ignatius Bishop of Antioch,

4. Humane and Secular Learning he favoured, and that onely. For he raised the third persecution against the Heavenly Doctrin and the Church of Christ, to which cruelty the worldly wise men seem most of all to have contributed. Being puffed up with the Victory he had obtained over the Daci and Thracians (after the ending of the second Dacian War, in the ninth year of his reign, Decebalus having killed himself) as he was marching against Osroes or Chosroes the Parthian King, and the Armenians, having commanded all that would not worship his false gods to be put to death, Ignatius the Scholar of St. John the Apostle, and Bishop now of Antioch, was brought before him, whilst he lay (in his passage) in this City. Ignatius standing in his presence, he said, who art thou Devil (Cacodæmon) who makest haste to transgress our Commands, and perswadeest others to destroy themselves? Ignatius answered, No body calleth Theophorus a Cacodæmon, for Devils flie from the Servants of God. But I know thou so callest me because I molest them. For I confesse I have Christ the heavenly King; and dissolve their councils. Trajan demanded who is Theophorus? Ignatius replied, He who hath Christ in his breast. Trajan said, Dost not thou think we have the Gods in our breast which assist us against our Enemies? Ignatius answered, In that thou esteamest the Devils of the Gentiles to be gods, thou erreest. For there is one God, who made Heaven, and Earth, and Sea, with all that are in them; and he hath one onely begotten Sonne Jesus Christ, whose friendship I have obtained. Trajan then said, Thou speakest of him that was crucified by Pontius Pilate: Ignatius replied, Of him who crucified sin and the inventor of it; and who approveth not of him that serveth Idols, but who in his heart wisely understandeth this. Trajan added, Dost thou then carry Christ in thy self? Ignatius said, Yes, for it is written, I will dwell and walk in them. Trajan concluded thus, I award that Ignatius, who saith, he beareth in himself the Crucified, be conveyed in bonds by Soldiers to the great City Rome, there to be devoured of beasts for a show to the People. This was accordingly executed upon the most holy Martyr, on the 20 of December, as it is recorded in his Acta or the Memorials of him collected by Philo, Gaius, and Agathopes, who followed him from Syria to Rome; concerning which, as also three Epistles which go under his name, the Dissertations of the most Reverend and Learned Arch-Bishop of Armagh are to be consulted.

letter to Tra-

5. Ignatius being vexed by a tedious journey, that his constancy might be shaken, when he came to Troas (or new Troy, built not far from the place where that of Priamus stood) understood that Peace was restored to his Church of Antioch. This came to passe whilst Trajan stift continued there, consulting about the Parthian War, as appeareth from Malela the Historian of that City. For Tiberianus the President of the chief Nation of Palestine, moved the Emperour to moderation by this letter: I am wearied with punishing and putting to death the Galilæans (who come before us under the names of Christians) according to your Commands, yet they cease not to reveal themselves for the slaughter. And although I have laboured both by exhortation and threatnings, that they might not dare to make known themselves to me as professors of that doctrine; yet being prosecuted, they do not cease. I desire therefore that what your pleasure is in this kind, your Majesty would please to certify me. * Suidas mentioning also this message of Tiberianus unto Trajan, addeth, that the Emperour forbade all his Subjects to punish the Christians. Yet that this indulgence was not so universal, but that it most especially concerned Palastine, Syria, and other parts of the East, where the Emperour then resided, appeareth from Ignatius his deprecation, that the persecution might cease, when he was even to be brought into the Amphitheatre; as the Acta or Memorials concerning him relate. But besides this Letter of Tiberianus, there is extant another of Pliny the younger, who was moved to write to the Emperour upon the same occasion, and for the same end.

As also the letter of Pliny
Junior.

6. For being Proprator of Bithynia, the variety of cases in those that were accused troubled him; although, to comply with the iniquity of the times, he declareth, that such as stood out his threatenings thrice, he commanded to be led to punishment. He signifieth, that out of such as had formerly been Christians, but now worshipped the Images of the Emperour, and the gods, and blasphemed Christ, he could not get any confession of any other fault or error, than that they were wont on a day appointed, before it was light, to meet together, and sing an hymn to Christ; and bound themselves by a Sacramentum or religious oath, not for any wickednesse, but that they should not commit robbery, theft, or adultery, that they should not break promise nor cheat. Which being done, they were wont to depart, and meet again to eat, promiscuously but innocently. To get out the truth he tortured two women servants, but could not find any thing justly chargeable, though through his Ethnick pravity and desire to please the Emperour, he termeth the faith Superstitio prava & immodica, or a naughty and immoderat superstition. He addeth, that it seemed to him a thing worthy of serious consideration; especially for the number of those that were in danger: for many, saith he, of every age and order, and of both Sexes, are brought, and will be brought into danger. For not onely hath the contagion of this superstition gone through Cities; but also Villages, and fields, which as it seemeth might be stopped and corrected. To be sure, it's clear enough, that the Temples which were almost desolate begin to be frequented, and the sacrifices of long time intermitted to be restored, beasts for that use now going off, which till now scarcely any would buy. Whereby it is easie to guesse, what a multitude of men might be reclaimed, if there were but place for repentance: Thus Pliny, to whom Trajan answereth (that we may onely repeat the turn) that Christians are not to be sought for, but if accused and convicted, except they recant, to be punished; concerning the absurdity and injustice of which Sentence, Tertullian excellently argueth in his * Apology, most worthy to be read of all Christians.

The death of St. John the Apostle.

7. In the reign of Trajan died St. John the Apostle, the time and manner of his death being uncertain, though all agree as to the place, which was Ephesus. (a) Jerome referreth his death to the 68 year after the Passion of Christ, which fell in with the third of Trajan, and the 27 of December, on the first Feria. (b) Others place it in the 71 after Christ's Passion, and the sixth of Trajan. Dorotheus Bishop of Tyre (in his tract written concerning the lives, ends, and Martyrdoms of the Prophets, Apostles, and 70 Disciples) writeth, that being 120 years old, yet living (the Lord would so have it) he buried himself. (c) Jerome alleged out of Tertullian, that in the time of Nero (though others say in the reign of Domitian) he was thrown at Rome into a tun of hot boyling oil, yet thereby took no harm, but came out after this trial purer than he went in. (d) Augustine calleth him a Martyr by will: Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus (as (a) Ensebins allegeth) sticketh not to call him a Priest, a Martyr, and a Doctor. But that which (f) Augustine writeth of his end, is strangest of all, and let the credit thereof rest in the choise of the Reader. How John caused at Ephesus his grave to be made, and in presence of divers went in alive, and being no sooner in and to their seeming dead they covered him. Which kind of rest saith he, is rather to be termed a sleep than death. For that the earth of the grave bubbleth or boyleth up after the the manner of a Well, by reason of John's resting in it, and breathing : a sign of his slumbering therein. Though he died at Ephesus, yet was not the succeeding Bishop, much lesse any other, Heir of that Authority, which for so many years he had obtained in the Church, as having many years outlived the rest of the Apostles. For to the Apostles succeeded not Apostles nor universal Messengers of Christ, of which sort John was for many years, and he alone, but Bishops, every one circumscribed within his own limits. In the dayes of Trajan, and this third persecution was Crucified (g) Simeon Cleophas Bishop of Jerusalem, being 120 years old. Justus a Jew succeeded him, after whom some place Zachaus, Tobias, Benjamin, and John in the 19th. and last of Trajan. In the eleventh of his reign was Euaristus Bishop of Rome Crowned with Martyrdom on the sixth of the Calends of November, and Alexander succeeded him, who also being Martyred in the 19th year, on the fifth before the Nones of May, (h) Cistus had his seat according to Damasus. And we must not forget that Heros succeeded Ignatius in the Sea of Antioch. (g) Euseb. l. 3. cap. 32. (h) Euseb. l. 3. cap. 35.

Gods judgements upon Trajan for his persecuting Christians.

8. The persecution of the Christians drew down heavy judgements upon the Empire in the time of Trajan. In the later end of his reign hapned most grievous Earth-quakes in several places, by which four Cities in Asia, three in Greece, and three in Galatia were overturned. Antioch also whilst he wintered there was grievously shaken, whereby multitudes, which for his sake had flocked thither, perished by many sorts of deaths. He himself was by an unknown hand drawn out of a window, and continued in the open air till the Earth-quake ceased, not daring to venture himself in any house for many dayes. He was now marching towards the East, and not being removed from his purpose, proceeded, crossed Tigris, subdued Adiabene, and peirced as far as Ctesiphon and Babylon : but presently it came to passe through the sicklenesse of such as had revolted to him, that he, who had already devoured the whole East, was forced to retreat to defend his own. For the Jews supposing him intangled in an inextricable Warre. 2. Perswading themselves that by the Earth-quake was portended the ruin of the Roman Empire. 3. Thinking that from the first of Cyrus to this present had but passed 483 years, and consequently but one of Daniels weeks to be unfulfilled, entred into a conspiracy, and made incredible slaughters of the Romans, using in several Countreys several Captains, whereof yet Barcocab was chief. The fury of this rebellion fell upon Egypt, Cyrene, and Cyprus. The manner of the outrageous Massacres they practised both upon Greeks and Romans was as hainous as the facts themselves ; though these hainous beyond all belief, if not related by most credible, and most impartial Writers. They are their flesh, besmeared themselves with their blood, wore their skins, sawed them asunder, cast them to wild beasts, made them kill one another, &c. Besides the particular butcheries which they committed throughout Egypt ; about Cyrene they slew 200000. and in Cyprus 250000. Trajan resolving to pursue them throughout his Dominions, not as Enemies or Rebels of the Empire, but as Creatures noxious to humane society, with revenge suiting their former outrages, sent Marcus Tubero with a great power, both by Land and Sea.

The Jews rebel.

9. He neither in a short space, nor without long, and cruel hostility finished the War ; but he slew many Myriads of the Jews. Partly for the better security of the Cyprians in time to come, partly in memory of their former misery, and the infamy of the Jews it was publicly enacted : That no Jew, though driven by Tempests thither, should presume to set foot within their Coast, upon pain of present execution, as already condemned by his very appearance on that soil, which had been tainted with the deadly venom of his countrey-men. Their carriage in the West made the Emperour suspect their brethren in Mesopotamia, whereupon he commanded L. Quinimus to banish them that Countrey, and he joyning battel with them slew also a great number. In the time of Trajan was Nero's golden house burnt, and also the Pantheon by Thunder ; not the Pantheon of Agrippa, as Scaliger and Cappellus note, but perhaps that of Jupiter Uxor or Minerva Medica. At length Trajan

Trajan dieth. Trajan died in Cilicia of a flux in August, having reigned 19 years, six moneths, and 15 dayes, in the 64th year of his age, the first of the 224 Olympiad, of the Citie the 870. A. D. 117. Quintus Niger, and T. Vipsanius Apronianus being Consuls. He was first of all Emperours buried in the Citie, being so beloved, that in succeeding times the people in their acclamations to their Princes would wish them the felicity of Augustus, and the goodnesse of Trajan. In his time flourished Plutarch, Lucian first a Christian, and then an Atheist; Plinius Secundus, Suetonius, L. Florus, Cor. Tacitus, and others. Euseb. in Chron.

Hadrian, 10. Ælius Hadrianus, or Adrian, succeeded Trajan, being the son of his Cousin German, and born also in Spain, in the Citie Italica, near to Civil, the birth-place of Trajan. He was more engaged to Plesina the Empreſse than to her husband for his succession; for she, ere his death was published, signed the Testament whereby he was made Heir; and the Soldiers standing to him, he took upon him the government in Syria, where he was President. At his first beginning he cut off all he suspected, and restored Discipline to the Army. He crossed the Seas into Britain, where he reformed divers things, and caused a Wall 80 miles in length first to be made to sever the Barbarians from the Romans. He took the greatest pains of any Emperour in visiting the Provinces, for coming into Britain out of Gall and Germany, he also went into Spain; then did he visit Mauritania, Parthia, Asia, and Greece; and by Sicily returned to Rome. After this he went into Africk again, and thence returning into the Citie, once more into Greece, thence into Arabia, and so into Egypt. He ever travelled on foot, and without any thing on his head, either in heat or cold. For this travelling Florus the Poet twitted him, to whom he as wittily answered. Xiphilinus ex Dione. Aurel. Victor. Spartianus. Festus Rufus.

11. He overthrew the Sauromata (or Sarmata inhabiting the Countreys now called Russia and Tartary) but the greatest contest was with the Jews. The principal cause of their rebellion was, for that he built a new Citie, and therein a Temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, where Jerusalem stood, and called the place after himself Ælia Capitolina, and he forbade them to be Circumcised. They were confirmed in their sedition by one who pretending he came down to them as a light from Heaven to save them from slavery and bondage, saying, he was the Star foretold by Balaam, whence being called Barcochab, he was first worshipped as the Messiah, and anointed at Beer, a Citie in Africk, but afterwards proving to be an Impostor, they called him Barcozba, or the son of a lye. Dio wrote, that the whole World was in a manner shaken with this Commotion of the Jews. Hadrian sent the best Captains he had against them, whereof the chief was Julius Severus, who at this time governed Britain. Albeit in the end he had the victory, yet would he not have wished for many Triumphs at the same rate. For very many of the Romans fell; insomuch that Adrian writing to the Senate, used not that beginning which other Emperours were wont: Si vos liberique vestri valeatis, Bene est; Ego quidem & exercitus valemus. But the extraordinary strength which now appeared in the Jews was given them for their destruction. The greater danger their mutiny had occasioned to the Empire, the greater was the Emperours severity in punishing their rebellion past, the greater his care to prevent the like in time to come. In battels & skirmishes were slain of them 580000. besides an infinite number consumed with famine and diseases, during the time of this lingering War, protracted of purpose by the Romans, not willing to try it out in open field with such a forlorn desperate multitude. Dio, who lived not long after this time, emphatically notes, that they were left few in number, their Land laid waste, fifty of their strongest Munitions utterly razed, and 985 of their Chief, and most populous Towns sacked, and consumed by fire. Adrian after this strange desolation, by Publick Decree ratified by the Senates consent, prohibited any Jew to come within the view of Judea. Before this overthrow they had manifest signs forebiewing their desolation. Solomon's Sepulchre which they held in greatest honour, saith Dio, a little before this War fell asunder of its own accord; Wolves and Hyanaes howled Lib. 69. p. 793.

howled throughout their streets, and devoured them in the fields. Such Jews as Adrian took Captive, he banished into Spain his own Countrey (this was their 10th Captivity saith *John * Vaseus*) where they had their Synagogues, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel, and Emanuel King of Portugal. * Chron. Hisp. A. D. 137,

12. The State of the Jews from this time untill the expiration of the Roman Empire cannot easily be gathered from any Roman vvriters, who seldom vouchsafe the Jews or Christians any mention, unlesse inforced thereto by some famous vvar or mutiny, or by some other event redounding to the Roman glory. Judea after this time was not famous for any tumult till the ruin of Romes greatnesse; the Jews wanted strength, and the Christians willing minds to procure the Emperours glory by Seditions. Hereupon whatsoever calamity either of them suffered by the Romans, was passed over by Roman vvriters, as private wrongs not worthy registring in their Annals. Upon this account tis no wonder they took no notice of our Saviour, or his Acts, all tending to Peace and Loyalty. For as Tacitus notes, Judea was most quiet in Tiberius his time, which was the best news the Romans cared to hear thence. Yet the general estate of the Jews between Adrians and Honorius his time, as * one observes, may be gathered out of the reverend Fathers of the Primitive Church; who usually stopped the mouths of Heathens, or blasphemous Atheists, by proposing their condition, then known unto all the World, for such as our Saviour had foretold it. Thus much of the Jews untill the series of time and affairs reduce us to them.

Adrian Character.

13. Adrian, if we look at his natural disposition, was as it were compounded of vice and virtue, yet so as he seemed to have the command of them, and may be reckoned amongst good Princes. He was much addicted to studies, and well seen in most of the liberal Arts; here was his fault, that he desired to comprehend all, and did not reserve himself for the most worthy, being one of the most curious men that ever lived. And in him that saying was sufficiently demonstrated, Non est curiosus quin idem sit malevolus. For he was so envious that he mortally hated all better Scholars than himself, and consequently the greatest Professors in all Sciences; but such as were unable for their Profession he would dismiss with great rewards. He killed Apollodorus the Architect for shewing him something freely the errors in his buildings. The Captain of his Guard was Similis, who as Dio writeth, getting leave to retire, and live quietly in the Countrey his last seven years, commanded this Inscription to be set on his Tomb: Here lieth Similis, whose life consisted of many (or 67) years, yet he lived but 7. His cruelty toward his later end we may in charity impute to his peevishnesse contracted by the Dropsie with which he was sore vexed in every part. In his time the Church was under some persecution; for Xistus Bishop of Rome was Crowned with Martyrdom in the tenth year of his reign, on the eighth of the Ides of April, to whom succeeded Telephorus, according to Damasus; but this was rather from the malice of others, and the wicked custom then on foot, than out of his inclination. Being something satisfied with the Apologies of Quadratus and Aristides, two learned men, he wrote a Letter to Minutius Fundanus Proconsul of Asia, which Justin Martyr hath exemplified in his second Apology, and from him as it seemeth, Eusebius in his History, after this manner.

His Letter in behalf of the Christians.

14. The Emperour Caesar Ælius Adrianus to Minutius Fundanus. I received a Letter from Serenius Granianus, that right worthy man thy Prædecessor, the occasion whereof I cannot with silence passe by, lest thereby men be wroubled, and a gap left open to the malice of Sycophants. Wherefore if your Provincials can prove ought against the Christians whereof they charge them, and justifie it at the Bar, let them proceed, and not impeach them onely for the name with making outcries against them. For it is very expedient that if any be disposed to accuse, the accusation be thronghly known of you and sifted. Therefore if any accuse the Christians that they transgresse the Laws, see that you judge, and punish according to the quality of the offence.

But

He dieth.

But in plain terms, if any upon spite or malice in way of cavillation complain against them, see that by all means you chastise and punish him according to his malice. Adrian at length by vomiting blood in great quantity contracted a Dropsie (if Dio writeth Phyfician like) which so tormented him, that he desired death, but could not have it (according to the prayer of Severianus, whom, though he judged him worthy of the Empire, of late he had put to death) but at length by an ill kind of diet accelerated it, yet saying, Mul-ti Medici Regem fastulerunt, and enquiring * of his Soul whither it meant to go. He died on the fourth of the Ides of July, having lived 62 years, and reigned 21 with 11 moneths, in the 891 year of the City, A. D. 138, Sulpicius Camerinus and Quintius Niger Magnus being Consuls. In his time flourished Ptolomy of Alexandria, that great Astronomer, Aulus Gellus or Agellius, Justin who epitomized Trogus Pompeius, and others.

* Animula va-gula blandula hospes comesque corporis, Que nunc abibis in loca Pallidula rigida nudula, Nec ut soles dabis jocos?

Antoninus Pius.

15. Adrian first adopted L. Verus, who died the year before him, on the first day of his second Consulship, and the Kalends of January. He had a son named Lucius, and was commanded to adopt Marcus, but they being both young, Hadrian adopted Pius, and commanded him to adopt Lucius and Marcus. F. Av. elius Fulvius Antoninus for his goodnesse surnamed Pius, the son of Aurelius Fulvius, and born in Gall within the Alpes, succeeded Adrian. There was little stir in the Provinces during his reign; onely something was done in Britain against the Natives by Lollius his Lieutenant, and some bickering with the Jews, the last and weakest struglings of a dying Nation. Now was another wall of turf made in Britain, and for the Victories obtained by Lollius Urbicus, the Emperour was saluted Britannicus, who as * Pausanias telleth us, fined the Brigantes part of their grounds, because they had fallen with War upon the Genunii, the Allies of the Roman People. And at this time saith Cambden, as we collect out of Fabolenus, Seius Saturninus was Archigubernus of the Navy in Britain. But whether by this title he was an Admiral of the said Navy, or a principal Pilot, or the Master of a ship, I would have the Lawyers to tell. Antoninus ruled with such care, moderation, and humanity, that he was called another Numa, all things flourishing in calmnesse and tranquility. He repaired several Cities that had been overturned with Earthquakes, in which and other respects Pausanias giveth him large commendations. He was excellently learned; a subtil and deep Philosopher. He was rendered favourable to Christianity by the Apologies of Justin Martyr, and the supplications of others in behalf of the faithful in Asia, which were grieved with all sorts of contumelies practized against them by their Provincials. He graciously sent a constitution in their behalf unto the body of Asia, which was read at Ephesus in the audience of this great Assembly, and yet is preserved to our sight in the end of Justin Martyr his second Apology, and by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, according to this tenour.

* In Arcadicis.

16. The Emperour Cæsar, Titus Ælius Adrianus Antoninus, Augustus Pius, Pontifex Maximus, fifteen times enjoying the power of Tribune, four times Consul (not thrice, as it is corruptly written in Eusebius) Father of the Country, to the People of Asia Health. I know the gods are careful to disclose hurtful persons. For they punish such as will not worship them more grievously than you do those whom you bring in trouble, confirming that opinion which they have of you to be wicked and ungodly men. It's their desire in Gods quarrel, rather to die than live. So that they become conquerours, yielding their lives unto the death, rather than to obey Edicts. It shall seem very necessary to admonish you of the Earthquakes, which have and do happen amongst us, that being therewith moved, you may compare our estate with theirs. They have more confidence to Godward than you have, you during the time of your ignorance despise other gods, condemn the Religion of the immortal God, banish the Christians which worship him, and persecute them unto the death. In the behalf of these men many of the Principal Presidents have written heretofore unto our Father of famous memory, whom he answered in writing again, that they were not to be longer molested, unlesse they had practized treason against the Roman Empire. And many have informed us of the same matter, whom we answered as our Father did before us. If any therefore hereafter be found thus busied in other mens affaires, we command that the accused be absolute and free, though he be found such an one, I mean as faulty, and that the accuser be grievously punished. That this Edict was proclaimed at Ephesus in the hearing of the great Assembly of Asia, witness is Meliton (saith Eusebius) Bishop of Sardis (who flourished at that time) in his profitable Apology for our doctrine, delivered unto the Emperour Verus. But Antoninus died on the Nones of March, after he had reigned 22 years, seven moneths, and 26 dayes, in the first year of the 235 Olympiad, the 914 of the City, A. D. 161. In his time flourished besides many excellent Lawyers, and Justin the Christian Philosopher (the son of Prius Bacchius, and born in Flavia a new City of Palastine, as he saith himself) Polycarpus Bishop of Smyrna, Galen that excellent Physician, and Ælian Writer of the natural and various Histories.

Bishops.

17. In the first year of Pius died Telesphorus Bishop of Rome, on the Nones of January; the Sea was vacant seven dayes (both the terms being excluded) and then Hyginus the ninth Bishop succeeded on the Ides of January, and the first feria. In the fifth of Pius died Hyginus, on the third of the Ides of January, and Pius succeeded him, when Sex. Erucius Clarus and Cn. Claudius Severus, as Damasus will have it, were Consuls, which if it be true, the Sea was vacant four years. In the thirteenth of Pius, died Pius the Bishop, on the fifth of the Ides of July, and his seat being vacant fourteen dayes, Anicetus the eleventh succeeded him on the 25 of July, the first feria. (a) From the Passion of our Saviour till the eighteenth year of Adrian there were fifteen Bishops in the Church of Jerusalem all Jews. In the which year after the utter overthrow, the siege and conquering of the City under the said Ælius Adrianus Jerusalem was called Ælia, and began to be inhabited of strange Nations. Until (b) wellnigh this time this Church was called a pure and uncorrupted Virgin, for till about the year 110 there was no false doctrine sown there. Of the Gentiles (c) Marcus was the first Bishop of Jerusalem. After Abilius, (d) Cerdo was Bishop of Alexandria in the first year of Trajan, where he continued thirteen years. Him succeeded Primus, who continued in the Sea twelve years. After Primus was (e) Iustus Bishop of Alexandria, where he continued eleven years. After Iustus, (f) Eumenes was Bishop, and so continued thirteen years. He was succeeded by Marcus, who governed that Church ten years. Then followed (g) Celadion, who continued fourteen years. And in the Sea of Antioch (that we may still continue the series of Bishops formerly began) after Heros (who succeeded Ignatius) (h) Cornelius was Bishop about the twelfth of Adrian.

Hereticks.

18. After the Bishops and Fathers of the Church, it's convenient to continue the series of Hereticks formerly laid down. About the year 110, (a) Thebulis was the first Heretick in the Church of Jerusalem. It's said, that he fell from the Faith because they would not chuse him Bishop after Simoon. About the same time were certain Hereticks called Ophites, who worshipped a Serpent, and thought that the Serpent which deceived Adam and Eve was Christ: they kept a living Serpent, which with opening of the chest and charming of the Priest came forth, licked the bread upon the altar, and wrapped it self about it. Their manner was to kisse the bread, and so to eat, believing verily that the Serpent had consecrated it. They defended themselves that the Nicolaitans and Gnosticks delivered them this service. About the same time there were certain Jews, which believing in Christ, called themselves Nazaræi of Nazareth. In confessing Jesus Christ to be the Son of God they contraried the Jews. But they erred in Christian Religion, in that they addicted themselves wholly to the whole Law. There were other Hereticks which honoured Cain, and took him for their Father, whence they were called Caini. They highly esteemed of Esau, Corah, Dathan, and

and Abiram, with the Sodomites. They called Judas the Traitor their Cousin, honoured him for betraying of Christ, affirming that he foresaw how great a benefit it would bring to mankind. They read a certain gospel written, as they said, by Judas: they reviled the Law, and denied the Resurrection. There were others called Sebians, who derived their pedigree from Seib the son of Adam, whom they honoured, and called Christ and Jesus; they held that in the beginning of the World he was called Seib, but in the latter dayes Christ Jesus. Epiphanius saith, that he disputed with some of them in Egypt, and that the last of them were in his time. Cerdon the Heretick came from Syria to Rome when Hyginus was Bishop there. He taught that God preached by the Law and Prophets, was not the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He said, that Christ was known, the Father of Christ unknown. He denied the Resurrection, and the Old Testament, he held other things with the Manichies; and Marcion was his Scholar.

19. In the time of Hyginus, Valentinus the Heretick came to Rome, lived under Pius, and continued till Anicetus. He taught 1. That Christ brought his flesh with him from Heaven, and took no flesh of the blessed Virgin, but passed through her as water through a conduit-pipe. 2. That there are two beginnings of all things, Profundum, i. e. the Deep: and Silentium, i. e. Silence: these being married together, had issue Understanding and Truth, which brought forth 300 Ævæ or Ages, and of these were the Devil and others born, who made the World. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, Marcion also the Heretick began to teach, living in the time of Justin Martyr, who wrote against him. He was native of Pontus, first a Stoick, then a Christian, he followed Basilides, Cerdon, and Valentinus, in their Heresies. Meeting Polycarpus, he said, Knowest thou us? Polycarp answered, I know thee for the first born of Satan. Epiphanius writeth, that being a Bishop's son, when he had deflowered a Virgin, he was by his own Father excommunicated, and afterwards flying to Rome, because they there admitted him not into the Church, he began to preach detestable doctrine. He taught, that there were three beginnings, Good, Just, and Evil: that the New Testament was contrary to the Old. He denied the Resurrection. He baptized such as died without Baptism, saying, that Paul bade him do so. He taught that marriage was unlawful, and that it was a great sin to marry. That Cain, the Sodomites, and all wicked men were saved, because they met Christ when he descended into hell, but the Patriarchs and Prophets are still in hell, for not meeting Christ; for they thought (said he) that Christ came to tempt them. Under Anicetus also came to Rome Marcellina, a woman which infected many with the Heresie of Carpocrates, who called himself Yngwuds. She is said to have kept and offered incense to the Statues and Pictures of Christ (which the Gnosticks said, had been made by command of Pilate) as also to others of St. Paul.

20. About the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, the beginning also of Montanus his Heresie is placed by Epiphanius; but from Eusebius, Cappellus would gather, that the original of it was fifteen years before, because the Historian writeth, that Apollinaris wrote against Miltiades, and Montanus the Hereticks, under the Proconsulship of Gratus, who seemeth the same with him, whose Consulship is by Cassiodorus cast into the fourth of Pius. He thinks therefore, that in the nineteenth year some new thing might be attempted by Montanus; as he might this year institute his Prophetesses. These were his two Country-women, Priscilla and Maximilla, born at Pepusa a City of Phrygia, upon which account he called Hierusalem by that name. Cappellus further observeth, that of such things as are attributed to Montanus, some were truly his, some after his death were added by the Montanists, and some falsely ascribed to them. Montanus really held, that the promise of sending the Holy Ghost was deferred till his time, and in himself fulfilled, because the Church heretofore could not bear the yoke of more severe and holy discipline, which he indeavoured to bring in, by appointing the eating of dried meats, fasting, and Monogamy, or single marriage. The Montanists, after

after their number was increased did those things which Hierome mentioneth, viz. they appointed themselves Patriarchs, 2 Cenona, which word seemeth of Phrygian Original, and 3 Bishops. That is falsely imputed to them, which Jerome saith others did attribute, but he would not believe, viz. that they pricked an Infant, and with his blood made up the Eucharist. If this opinion may be attributed to any Hæresie, or if this prejudice did not arise from the imputation of this kind of cruelty by the Heathen to Christianity it self, the Carpocratians rather than the Montanists were guilty of it. But because both sorts were called Gnosticks (as swelling with an opinion of knowledge) what was acted but by one, might easily be attributed to the other. So because Montanus, as full of the Holy Ghost called upon men in the name of the Father, he was believed to confound the persons of the Trinity into one, which was the invention of the Sabellians 100 years after. 'Tis further said of him, that he baptized the dead, and not allowing of second marriages permitted married persons to be separated when they themselves would. That he took away repentance, affirming that sinners could never have their sins pardoned by repentance. And that the Apostles and Prophets understood not any thing they had written, but were Arreptiui. Now to return to civil matters.

Ad Marcellum

M. Aurelius,
Antoninus,
Philosophus,
and L. Verus.

21. Pius being dead on the Nones of March, Marcus the son of Annius Verus succeeded, who was first adopted by Caecilius Severus his great Grandfather on the mother's side, the second time by Lucius Commodus, and the third by Pius. He made Lucius the son of Lucius Commodus, by whom he was adopted the second time, partner with him in the Empire, as his brother, and six moneths after having a son born to him on the Calends of September, named him Commodus, after his said adoptive father. Marcus and Lucius were the first two that ever jointly, and with equal power and authority ruled the Empire, being very contrary in disposition, though through the goodness and prudence of the former they maintained concord betwixt themselves. Marcus notwithstanding his publick place was so in love with the liberal Sciences, that he would frequent the Lectures of Philosophers: Lucius having little capacity, and lesse affection for such matters, gave himself up to luxury and idleness, onely so far restraining himself as his interest compelled him to comply with his Colleague, although he might have been diverted from such courses by the Wars. For Emperour King of Parthia brake into Armenia, Cappadocia, and Syria, laying all waste before him, overthrew the Roman Army, and put to flight Attidius Cornelianus, who at that time governed Syria. Against him Lucius was sent, and by his Captains did very great things, not onely for the recovery and relief of those places, but also in Assyria. For, he therein took Selencia, situate upon the River Hidaspes with 400000 persons, for which he triumphed with his brother. But after they had reigned eleven years Lucius died of an Apoplexy as he rode with his Colleague in the same Chariot.

the freedom of the Citie

22. As for the disposition and carriage of Marcus, both as a (Heathen) Man, and a Prince; he scarcely ever had his Superiour in goodness and virtue. Being extraordinarily learned (upon which account he was surnamed Philosophus) he abounded according to the dictates of right reason, with moderation, justice, and clemency. For the maintenance of his Wars, that he might not be burthensome to his subjects, he sold several things to raise money. The head of Avidius Cassius, who having rebelled against him was slain in the East, being sent to him, he caused it presently without any insulting language to be buried. Aurel. Victor telleth us that in his time the freedom of the Citie was promiscuously given to all; so that Cambden seemeth mistaken, who writeth that by the ordinance of Pius, as many as were in the Roman World became Citizens of Rome. This freedom of the Citie was wont to be given either with privilege of suffrage or without. The first that had it without suffrage were the Carites. We understand, saith Gellius, that the Carites were first made Municipes without the right of suffrage: and that it was granted to them, that they should receive the honour of the Roman Citie, but be freed

Freedom of the Citie va-

freed from businesse, and burthens, for that they received, and kept the sacra (or idols) in the Gallick war. Paerculus also telleth us, that in the Consulship of Sp. Posthumius and Veturius Calvinus, Campanis data est civitas partique Samnitiis sine suffragio, and in the same place M. Curio & Regino Cornelio Coss. Sabinis sine suffragio data civitas. What Municipium was, and who Municipes, is worthy of consideration. In the time of Gellius it appears from him that those words were much in use, but nothing understood. For such as were of Colonies would call both themselves and their Countrey-men Municipes, which, saith he, is far distant from reason and truth. Even so what Municipi are, and how much they differ from a Colony, we are ignorant, and we think that Colonies are in a better condition than they.

23. Of this opinion so full of error Adrian the Emperour learnedly discoursed in his Oration which he made in the Senate concerning the Italicensis, or Inhabitants of Italica in Spain, (as they were called) from whom he himself descended. He wondred that the Italicensis and other ancient Municipia (amongst whom he named them of Utica) when they might live according to their own customes and laws, were tickled with a desire to be changed into the condition of Colonies. He said that the Pranestines earnestly desired of Tiberius to be altered from the state of a Colony to that of a Municipium, and that the Emperour granted it, in consideration that under the Walls of their Town he had recovered from a deadly disease. Municipes therefore (so Gellius concludeth) are Roman Citizens of the Municipia, using their own freedom and Laws, onely partakers of honourable employment (Muneris honorarii) with the Roman people, from undertaking which employment (a quo munere capeffendo) they seem to be named, being bound by no other necessities, nor by any Law of the Roman people, for as much as their Land never belonged to it. Then proceedeth he to distinguish in the matter of the Carites, betwixt such Municipes as had right of suffrage, and not, for if there had been no such distinction he would never have said, The first Municipes we understand to have been made without right of suffrage were Carites. For a more clear discovery of the relations of other places unto Rome, we shall observe this four-fold distinction of privileges.

The severall
leges.

There was 1 Jus Civitatis, 2 Jus Municipii, 3 Jus Coloniae, 4 Jus Latii. Jus Civitatis was freedom of the Citie, and we find in Paerculus that it was cum suffragio & sine suffragio. Jus Municipii we find in Gellius to have also been freedom of the Citie, for Municipes were also called Civies Romani, and were named Municipes, a muneribus capiendis, or capeffendis; there was also as appeareth from Gellius Jus Municipii cum, & sine suffragio, Jus Civitatis therefore & Jus Municipii seem to have differed little; the former was larger, respecting single persons sometimes absolutely considered without relation to any place that was related to Rome as a Municipium. For single persons (Ambassadors or others) have had the freedom of the Citie bestowed on them primarily without respect to any place at all, who perhaps could not be called Municipes, because such seem to have been proper; and onely Free-men of Municipia, and not otherwise than mediately to have been free of Rome. The power or right of suffrage will not suffer us to imagine that, because Gellius calleth the employment of the Municipes, munus honorarium, therefore it was but titular. For by the right of suffrage they had power to assemble in the Comitia, and Vote in their Tribes, Censuries, and Curie, as the occasion required: and hence doubtlesse were capable of honourable Offices. And the word it self, though sometimes it may be expounded Titular, as the Consuls after Constantines time (or rather Consulares, as they are called in Cassiodorus, and their Office Consularinas) are termed Consules Honorarii, being but Titular Consuls; yet it also respecteth authority and power as well as meer Title, in that the Law of the Prator (whereof we have formerly spoken) is called Jus Honorarium.

Jus Civitatis
cipii*

20.

24. As for the Jus Coloniae, it is so termed by Tacitus also in those words: Atin Italia vetus oppidum Puteoli Jus Coloniae & Cognomen tum a Nerono adipiscuntur. Gellius distinguisheth it from the Jus Municipii, after this manner. But of Colonies there is another relation or alliance (necessitudo.)

For

For they do come extrinsically into the City, neither do they stand on their own roots; but are as it were begotten by the State, and have Laws and Institutions, not of their own, but those of the Roman people. Yet this condition, although it be more obnoxious and lesse free, is accounted better and more excellent, for the amplitude and Majesty of the Roman people; whereof these Colonies seem to be certain Images and resemblances: and also because the rights of the Municipia are obscure and obliterated, which by reason of ignorance the owners cannot use. From this it appears that Colonies were free of the Citie, in which respect Paterculus giving us account of the several Colonies that were planted till the time of Marius, mixeth with them such places as to which freedom was given, making it as it were the same thing. If it had been otherwise, there would not have been any comparison as to privilege betwixt Municipia and Colonies, and it would have saved Gellius the labour of proving against the common belief that the Jus Municipii was greater. Now as for the Jus Latii, Suetonius distinguisheth it from Jus Civitatis, for speaking what Augustus did to several Cities, he hath this expression amongst the rest: Latinitate vel civitate donavit. Spartianus in the life of Adrian saith, Latium multis civitatibus dedit. And Tacitus (coming up to our Term) saith of Nero: Eodem anno Cæsar nationes Alpium maritimarum in Jus Latii transtulit. The Latines were ever counted of the kindred of Rome, the Romans having descended from them, and upon this account there was a stricter League and Alliance with them than any other people, which enjoyed not the freedom of the Citie.

Jus Latii.

25. The Latines envying the rising fortune of Rome their Colony, laboured to suppress it, but still were worsted, and ever forced to submit. Servius Tullius the sixth King of Rome breathing after glory in future times, in imitation of the Council of the Amphyctiones in Greece, and other publick conventions (as we have formerly said) perswaded both Nations to build at Rome a Temple or Asylum out the common expence, where the Cities meeting yearly, should sacrifice, hold a fair at certain times, and if any contention hapned amongst them, it might be composed in a religious manner by their fellow Cities. Gathering money he built the Temple of Diana in the Aventine Mount (the most eminent in the Citie) and wrote down the conditions of the League, with the manner of observing the Feast and Mart. And that they might not be abolished by the injury of time, he ingraved the Decrees of the Council in a pillar of brasse, and the Cities which were partakers of this society, which pillar continueth till our age, saith Dionysius, dedicated in the Temple of Diana, inscribed with such Characters as Greece antiently used, which is no light argument that Rome was not built by Barbarians. Tarquinius the last King, and Successor of Servius, renewed this League, and taking in the Hernici and Volsci, appointed another place in the midst of all those Nations, viz. a Mount near to the Albanians, called also Mons Albanus, where yearly Feria (or a Festival) were to be celebrated, and for that time, in respect of the religion of the place, and the Law made for that purpose, they were all to abstain from all manner of violence, and in common sacrifice to Jupiter Lævatis and Feast together; it being appointed how much each people should contribute and receive. Of these Feria, and this sacrifice were partakers 47 people, and in our age, saith the Historian, the Romans observe these Feria (called Feria Latina) and some contribute Lambs, some Cheese, some a certain quantity of Milk, and others Cakes or Wafers made up with Milk. The sacrifice is one Bull for all, of whose inwards a certain portion is given to every people. They sacrifice for all in general, and the Romans preside at the sacrifice. Those Feria at first consisted but of one day, which Tarquinius appointed. After his banishment the people added another. And about six years after, when Peace was composed betwixt Patricians and Plebeians, after the Creation of the Tribuni Plebis and Ædiles, a third was added; at what time the League was also renewed with the Latines, because that after the Peace made with them at the end of the War with Tarquinius (whose part they they took) they had continued peaceable and faithful to the Romans during their confusions and seditions.

26. * Dionysius mentioning the renewing of this League, giveth us the substance of it, by which description our design is accomplished as to the Jus Latii. These things were contained in the League; Let there be mutual Peace betwixt the Romans and Latines, as long as the Heavens and Earth keep the same Station: and let neither make War upon the other, nor procure others to do it, nor give free passage to such as would, but to the utmost help each other infested by War, and equally divide the prey and spoils. Concerning private contracts, let the controversie be judiciously decided in the Forum of that People where the contract was made. Let nothing be added to the conditions of the League, nor taken away, without the consent of the Romans, and all the Latine People. To this purpose a League was established betwixt the parties, and sworn to by all sacred things. This near confederacy is to be taken as explanatory of the Jus Latii, including such a strong alliance as was not made with any, but afterwards according to this prescript. In proceſſe of time the Latines came to have the freedom of the City. When this freedom was given to them is something obscure. Dionysius so relateth the story of Cassius (in whose second Consulship, according to him, this League was renewed) as if at the same time was given to them the freedom of the City; for Cassius to curry favour with the Hernici gave them the same league, and when he would have in his third Consulship the Agrarian to passe, he caused the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, to carry it by the greater number of voices. But if any such thing were, it was done rather by his over forwardnesse to gratifie them, and without the consent of the State, as those Privileges were which he bestowed upon the Hernici. However, it appeareth that they had not the freedom till this time; for Cassius in his flattering speech to the multitude concerning the excellent acts performed by them in his three Consulships, saith, that in his third the sedition being appeased, the Commons were reduced home: the Latines kinsmen of the Romans, but emulators for glory and Empire, were received into friendship and into the City, that afterwards they might esteem Rome as their Country, and not as an adversary. Though formerly there was a League with them, yet it seemeth they were not received into the City till now, and that rather by Cassius his flattery, so that neither they nor the Hernici retained this privilege, and we do not find that they were admitted into any Tribe, or gave thenceforth their suffrages in the Comitia. This confirmeth what we say, that * Flo- * L. l. c. 14. 3.
rus declareth the cause of their revolt afterwards, to have been an emulation for Empire and Magistrates, and that contemning the Romans after the burning of the City, they required Jus civitatis amongst other things.

27. This they did not now obtain, being subdued and reduced by War to obedience, and punished several wayes. However the ancient League seemeth to have been renewed; at least with most of them, who were still called Socii nominis Latini. Often the Jus Civitatis was promised them, but still deferred and put off by the Fathers, who alone knew the secret of Empire, till at length they broke out into the Social War, and yet then were they subdued again, and brought under by force, and then was given to them conquered, what they could not obtain by strong hand. After this, the hedge being broken down from about the Roman State, and through the variety of the interests of Roman Citizens parties and factions arising, Freedom came to be given to other places, one after another, though when, to whom, and by whom, we now must not inquire. Augustus was very sparing in the grant thereof; but succeeding Princes spread this privilege far and wide, till at length Antoninus Philosophus communicated it to the whole body of the Empire, it being now nothing material, seeing that the multitude met not together in the Comitia, to give their suffrages, which had by variety of interests, humours, and inclinations confounded all things. Now again to our matter.

28. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, like a good Patriot, or rather Pater Patria, did not satisfy himself in providing for the publick good for his own

time only. For he took special care for the good education of his son Commodus, committing him to the most eminent men he could obtain for money to be educated in good literature and manners. To Lucius rather than him, is to be imputed the fourth persecution, which in their time raged throughout the Provinces. Herein suffered Polycarpus that famous Bishop of Smyrna, as is testified in the Epistle written by his Church unto the brethren in Pontus. He was ordained Bishop by St. John and other Apostles, with whom he conversed, and his Scholar he was, as Tertullian, Irenaeus, and several of the Antients do testify, and had served Christ 86 years, for he was older by much than thus, as Reverend * Usher hath evinced. He caused meat to be set before those who apprehended him, and with wonderful alacrity and resolution underwent his Martyrdom by fire, on the seventh of the Calends of April, the ninth of M. Aurelius Antoninus, and the 169 of the ordinary Era of Christ, which was the same wherein Lucius died, as some Inscriptions of Gruterus do testify. Now suffered also Justin Martyr, who after he had published his second Apology for the Christians, through the malice of Crescens the Cynick (whom railing against Christianity he had taxed for his filthy kind of life) as he even foretelleth in his Apology. The Churches of Lugdunum and Vienna in Gall were especially exercised in this fiery tryal, as is to be seen in the History of Eusebius.

29. It may without curiosity be observed, that usually the persecutions of Gods People were followed with judgements upon the adversaries, as it now through Gods providence came to passe. For so great a Pestilence fell upon the Provinces, that Villages, Towns, and fields in Italy, were left without Inhabitant or Tiller, and Galen the Physician ran away from it from Rome home to Pergamus. This was followed by a War with the Marcomanni, which could not be caried on without new levies, with for three years together the Emperour made at Carnutum (now Chartres) in Gall. For besides the Marcomanni (a People inhabiting that now called Merhern) the Quadi (whom some will have the same with the present Austrians, others with the Saxons and Silesians) the Vandalls (inhabiting in the now Kingdom of Sweden) Sarmatians, and Suevians, and almost all Germany were up in arms, and invaded Pannonia. The Roman Army resisting these motions, peirced into the borders of the Quadi; but there were beset by their adversaries, and encountered by a greater Enemy, being all ready to perish by thirst. At this time the Soldiers of the Legion called Melitina being Christians, fell upon their knees in presence of their fellow Soldiers, and in the name of Christ so far prevailed with Almighty God, that presently abundance of rain fell, and the Enemy was defeated by Thunder and Lightning. This Legion was thence called Fulminatrix or Thundering, and the Emperour confessing the Victory to have proceeded from the prayers of Christians, was thenceforth favourable to such, and owned the deliverance in a publick instrument or letter to the Roman People and Senate. Herein, after he hath related the story, and improved it in the behalf of Christianity, he commandeth such as accuse Christians meerly as such, to be burnt alive, and no constraint to be used towards the faithful. This his constitution he would have confirmed by a Senatusconsultum, and proposed to be seen and read in the Forum of Trajan. He ordereth Verasius Pollio to take care that it be sent into all the Provinces, and that any one that pleaseth may take a copy of it.

30. This letter is published at the end of Justin Martyr's second Apology, together with those of Antoninus and Adrian. It could not be added by Justin himself, for ere this time he had suffered Martyrdom. Perionius thinketh, that onely that of Adrian was added by him, and the other two by some other, who saw them pertinent for the place. But Eusebius in his History mentioneth that of Antoninus as well as that of Adrian, in the * words of Melita Bishop of Sardis, who wrote an Apology to the Emperour, and also * exemplifieth the Epistle it self. This letter also of M. Antoninus Philo- sophus, is extant in the most ancient Copy of the Vatican library, in the end of Justin Martyr's works, added by some studious and well-affected person, first translated into Greek out of Latin, and again into Latin out of Greek most accurately, as we are informed by Syburinus in his Annotations upon Justin Martyr. But the Emperour being called into Pannonia for the finishing of the War there, and passing into Sarmatia, fell sick. Hereupon seriously berithinking himself what might happen to the Empire in the minority of his son, these parts being not fully reduced to obedience, especially in case he should degenerate from the worth of his ancestors, and give himself up to luxury and cruelty, he called his friends together, and seriously commended him unto them, to be advised and assisted for the best. After this he lived but one day and a night, to the grief of all men. He died at Vendebona the 17 of March, in the 58 year of his age, and of his Empire the 19, the 932 of the City. Commodus.

31. Commodus his son (for whose sake Dio maketh the Physicians to have killed him) succeeded him, having two years before been made a Consul, through a dispensation with the Lex Annaria, as Lampridius writeth, although it seemeth something strange, that this Law could take place upon those, to whom the title of Augustus was not denied. Being owned by the Army, for some time he governed according to the direction of his Father's friends, but being obnoxious to flatterers by reason of his youth, who sought to make their own ends out of him, he shortly after, contrary to the judgement of his best Counsellors, made a dishonourable Peace with the Enemy, and away he went to enjoy the pleasures of Rome, where he was joyfully received for his fathers sake, his beauty also much commending him to the eye. For a time he here also harkned to his fathers friends, but making one Perennius an old Soldier Captain of his Guards, he being excessively covetous, allured him at first by pleasures to idlenesse and neglect of businesse, then governing all himself, he falsely accused them and others of the richer sort, that he might seize on their estates. This his design was furthered by Lucilla the Emperour's sister, who grudging that Crispina Commodus his wife should take place of her, entered into a conspiracy against her brother, and ingaged one Quadratus a young Noble man therein, who perswaded Quintianus to kill Commodus. But he meeting him, had no power to do the deed, onely shewing his dagger, said, The Senate sends thee this, and so was apprehended and put to death with his complices. These words concerning the Senate thus foolishly spoken, never went out of the Emperours mind, but made him suspect all the Fathers, which advantage Perennius took, and perswaded him to kill all the chiefest of them. This being performed, this man affected the Sovereignty, but was in good time discovered, both he and his sons, whom he had sent into Illyricum to draw the Legions to revolt, and received their reward.

ties.

32. Commodus to prevent the too great power of one man, put two into his place, Cleander and Niger, for the time to come; and yet presently after had more plots laid for his life. There was one Maternus, who practising the trade of robbery, got a great company of Highway-men together, and making himself Captain of a considerable Army, wasted Gall and Spain, and thence repelled, resolved to venture for the Sovereignty it self. Having but little hope to obtain it by force, because of the People, and the Pretorian bands, he betook him to his wits. At that time the Annual solemnity was kept in honour of the mother of their gods, wherein it was lawful for Soldiers or any other to imitate Magistrates or their Officers. Taking this opportunity, he sent some of his Soldiers privily armed to get amongst the Sargeants and Officers of the Emperour, and so to kill him; but being betrayed by his own party, he and his plot both miscaried. After this succeeded a terrible Pestilence, accompanied with a Famine, which Cleander a Phrygian, one who from a slave came into greatest power, made an occasion to advance himself. He bought up all the Corn, thinking by a largesse thereof to purchase the Empire of the Soldiers and People, but these rising against him, as the cause of the Death and Plague too, after that with great difficulty, by reason of his power, the matter was revealed to Commodus, he also received his reward. These things caused the Emperour to be jealous of all men, to cast off all care of State affaires, and giving ear to every back-biter, to kill any. Hence also no persons of worth being admitted into his presence, he was ruled by dissolute companions, and fell more and more into disorder.

33. He turned chariot-driver, and spent his time in killing beasts with darts, and other unworthy exercises. He was the best marksman that ever was known, scarcely ever missing any mark he aimed at. He publicly killed multitudes of wild beasts upon the theatre, amongst the rest a Panther, which just being about to devour a man, he hit and slew in the nick of time, as she was about to seize on him. Instead of Commodus the son of Marcus, he commanded himself to be called Hercules the son of Jupiter. Casting off the usual Robe of Princes, in compliance with that name, he would lye on a Lyons skin, and have a club in his hand; yet he would wear purple garments and cloath of Gold. To his former title he added Amazonian and Conquerour; Rome he stilled Immortal and Fortunate, and the World His Colony. A great fire hapened in the City, which burned that excellent Library gathered by his Pradeecessors, with the Temple of Peace; and other buildings, which accident as the People accounted an ill omen, so they laid the guilt upon him, knowing well his practices, which he never strove to conceal. Though his throwing of darts upon the theatre much derogated from the Imperial Majesty, they were indifferently pleased with it; but when he came naked upon the stage and acted the common fencer, it seemed intolerable. At length at the Feast of Janus resolving not to proceed from his Palace as Emperour, but as a Fencer from the fencing School, attended with such like to the view of the People, this occasioned his end.

34. For, this his resolution being known to his Friends, Martia his beloved Concubine, Laius his General, and Electus his Chamberlain, laboured with all intreaties to divert him from so shameful a thing. He herewith extremely displeased, berook himself to his Chamber, where in a roule he wrote down the names of such as he would have killed, and amongst them chose three in that order we mention them had the first places; them followed a great number of Senators, the goods of whom he intended to distribute amongst the Fencers and Soldiers, to purchase mirth and jollity from them, and defence from these. This writing he laid upon his bed, where he did not suspect that any would come at it. But a little boy with whom he was wont to play, coming thither, took it up, and went out with it in his hand, whom Martia meeting, and taking up in her arms, fearing it might be something of consequence, read it, and thereby discovered the matter, which she presently imparted to the other two. They all concluding that haste was to be made, Martia gave him poyson, and when that succeeded not, they hired one Narcissus to strangle him. So Commodus died, who by his Lieutenants overthrew the Moors and Dacians, and bridled Pannonia, Germany, and Britain, which would have thrown off the yoke. He died on the last day of the Julian year; the 32 of his age, when he had reigned almost 13 years. A. V. C. 945. A. D. 192, he himself the seventh and Helvius Pertinax the third time being Consuls.

35. The Conspirators did not make known his death, till they had made means for a Successor, and then gave out that he died of an Apoplexy, which was easily believed, because of his voluptuous life. He upon whom they pitched was Helvius Pertinax, an old Soldier, who had done good service in Britain, where he was near killing by his Soldiers, but severely corrected their insolence. He had been thrice Consul, yet being thus delivered from the danger he was in by Commodus, considering the meanness of his birth, he would have declined the burthen, but it was put upon him by the Senare, and the Army acknowledged him. He gave great hopes of an excellent Prince, behaving himself modestly and suitably towards all men. He restrained Promoters, took away divers tolls and gabells lately imposed, and restrained the rapines and insolence of the Soldiers. This troubled the guards exceedingly, who being so much the more sensible of the change brought upon them by strict discipline, as they remembered the liberty given them by Commodus, resolved to make tryal of another, and an end of Pertinax. In the strength of this resolution they set upon and killed him, though he had like so excellent a person gravely and stoutly admonished them of their duty. He died in the 85 day of his reign, and the 69 year of his age. Q. Sosius Falco, and C. Julius Erucius Clarus being Consuls.

Bishops.

36. Now, that we may briefly carry on the series of Ecclesiastical matters, whence we left them. In the second year of M. Anrelius Philosophus died Anicetus the Bishop of Rome and Soter being the 13th of this Sea succeeded him, according to Damasus. In his 10th year Soter died, and was succeeded by Eleutherius. In the 6th of Commodus died Eleutherius, on the 7th before the Calends of June, Maternus and Bradua being Consuls, in which year Commodus and Cleander to overturn the power of the Consulship created 25 Consuls, for which Cleander was afterwards punished, being carried to Rome amongst the worst sort of slaves. In the following year Eleutherius was succeeded by Victor an African, Commodus the fifth time, and Glabrio being Consuls. Touching the purity of the Church of Rome at this time Agrippinus thus wrote. (a) When I came to Rome I stayed there till Anicetus was chosen Bishop, whose Deacon was Eleutherius, whom Soter succeeded, & after him Eleutherius. In all their successions, and in everyone of their Cities is no otherwise than the Law and the Prophets, and the Lord himself preached. Irenaeus also wrote: Now (b) Eleutherius was the 12th Bishop from the Apostles, after the same order, the same Doctrine and Tradition of the Apostles truly taught in the Church at this day continued in our time. From Marcus the first Bishop of Jerusalem from amongst the Gentiles, some reckon 13 Bishops unto Narcissus, of whom are many things reported. He (c) was accused of an hainous crime, and although he was innocent, yet left he his Church, and fled into the Wilderness, where he continued a long time. In the mean while his accusers were wonderfully plagued from above to the example of all perjured persons. After his departure Dios was Bishop unto the reign of Severus, as is gathered from Epiphanius. After Cornelius was (d) Theophilus Bishop of Antioch, he wrote of Elemental Institutions, and dedicated them to Anicetus. Also against the Heresie of Herapion and Marion. After him followed Maximus, and then (e) Serapion. After Celadion in the Church of Alexandria, (f) Agrippinus was Bishop about the 8th year of Marcus, and governed 12 years. Him succeeded (g) Julianus in the first of Commodus, and governed 10 years. Then followed (h) Demetrius, who continued 43 years.

Councils.

37. During the reign of Commodus were several Synodes or Councils held against the Heresie of Montanus, and about the Celebration of Easter. Because before this time Councils were but few, we would not give any account of them in a scattered manner; but now shall briefly recite from the first of all such as hapened untill the end of Commodus. The (a) Apostles immediately after the ascension of our Saviour returned from Mount Olivet to Jerusalem, and there assembled together for the election of one to succeed in the room of Judas the Traitor, where they chose Matthias. This is the first Council. The (b) second was summoned of the Apostles and Disciples at Jerusalem, about removing the tumult risen betwixt the Grecians and Hebrews about their Widows, wherein they chose seven Deacons as they are called by Ecclesiastical Writers. The (c) third was held by the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren at Jerusalem, concerning circumcision and observation of the Law, where it was resolved, that the faithful should abstain from blood, from that which is strangled, and from fornication; the which they published by their Letters unto the Churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. The fourth was held by James Bishop of Jerusalem, Paul, and the Elders at that Citie also, where for removing of suspicion, and winning of the brethren, it was decreed, that Paul should clear and purifie himself according to the Law, yielding for some time to the Ceremonies of it. After the death of James the Apostles from every quarter (e) gathered themselves together at Jerusalem for the Election of a Bishop, and chose Simon Cleopas. In an assembly of the Apostles, certain Canons were agreed on, and published by Clemens as 'tis said. But (f) those that now go for them are corrupt, the (f) Concil. corruption of the Apostolical constitutions, and of Ignatius his Epistles having proceeded from the same hand, as reverend Usher sheweth in his Dissertation concerning the said Epistles, who as to this matter is therein most worthy to be consulted. About the time of Nerva the Emperour were two (g) Synods summoned in Asia for reformation of the Churches, and Consecration of Bishops, where St. John the Apostle being sent for was present. (g) Euseb. l. 3. c. 23. About the beginning of Marcus Antoninus was a Synod at (h) Ancyra in (h) Idem l. 5. cap. 16. Galatia, where the figments of Montanus were confuted by Apollinarius. And there were held in Asia sundry Synods in which Montanus was excommunicated, and his Heresie condemned. The brethren in (i) France also assembled together, and censured the opinions of Montanus, writing to Elen-therius Bishop of Rome, that he would maintain the Peace of the Church there against such Hereticks. (k) Serapion also Bishop of Antioch held a Synod (k) Lib. 5. c. 19. there about the middle of Commodus his reign, where together with many other Bishops he condemned the Montanists, or their Heresie called the Phrygian Heresie, because Montanus was of that Countrey. Not long after was held a Council at (l) Rome by Victor the Bishop about the Celebration of (l) Idem l. 5. cap. 23. Easter, in Palestine also, in Pontus and Gall were Synods called about the same matter.

Easter.

38. This controversie about Easter is mentioned by Eusebius not till the last year of the 243 Olympiad, which fell in with the fourth of Severus; but Appellus thinketh it first arose in the first of the 242 Olympiad, and the tenth of Commodus, wherein this feast was celebrated by the Jews, and the Churches of Asia Minor, at a wrong time, as Theophilus Bishop of Casarea thought, viz. by the Jews on the fifteenth of Nisan, March 20. but by the Christians of Asia on the fourteenth of Nisan, March 19. on the fourth Feria, three dayes before the Vernal Equinox. Theophilus supposing that the Equinox hapned on March the 25. and that so it ever did, and for this cause that the Sun was on that day created, and that Christ arose again the same day, as also that the Lords Supper was instituted on the 22 of March, contended that it was utterly against reason to prevent the Epoch of the Equinox so many dayes, and the day whereon the Lords Supper was instituted. Wherefore he procured the Fathers of Palestine assembled in a Synode, to make these Canons. 1. That never, except after March 21. 2. That never but after the fourteenth Moon. 3. That never after April 24. 4. That never except on the Lords day Easter should be celebrated; on that day which next followed the fourteenth Moon hapning next after March 21. Hereby he hoped it would come to passe, that Easter would ever be observed within the moneth of Aries. In the Synode of Palestine where these Canons were made, the aforesaid Theophilus Bishop of Casarea, and Narcissus of Jerusalem presided. Of that at Rome, Victor the Bishop was President. In that of Pontus, Palmas, as the most antient did govern. In that of the Bishops of Gall, Ireneus presided. There was another of the Bishops throughout Ostroena, and the Cities therein contained; and especially held by Rauchillus Bishop of Corinth with many others; all which saith Eusebius with one and the same sentence and judgement ordained the same Decree. With those also consented Cassius Bishop of Tyre, and Clarus Bishop of Ptolemais. They affirmed that it was the Apostolick tradition and custom as yet retained, that the fasting dayes should be broken up on no other day than that wherein our Saviour arose from the dead. And the Church of Alexandria celebrated Easter on the self-same day with them.

*Euseb. de natura rerum cap. 28.
46. et de A-

39. But all the Churches throughout Asia, as of an antient tradition thought good to observe the high-feast of Easter in the 14th Moon, on which day the Jews were commanded to offer their Paschal Lamb. As much as to say, that upon what day soever in the week that Moon fell, the fasting dayes were finished and ended. Polycrates of Ephesus, chief of these Bishops, in his Epistle

Epistle to the Church of Rome, sheweth the custom of Asia observed unto his time, in these words. We observe the unviolated day of Easter, neither adding anything thereto, neither taking anything from it. For notable pillars of Christian Religion have rested in Asia, which shall arise at the last day when the Lord shall come home from Heaven with glory, and restore all the Saints to joy. Philip, one of the twelve Apostles now lying at Hierapolis, and his two daughters, who kept themselves Virgins all the dayes of their lives, the third also after the end of her holy conversation rested at Ephesus. John also, who lay on the Lord's breast, and wore the Priestly Attire, both a Martyr and a Doctor slept at Ephesus. Moreover, Polycarpus Bishop of Smyrna, and a Martyr. Thraseas an Eumenian, both a Bishop and a Martyr slept at Smyrna. What shall I speak of Sagaris, both a Bishop and a Martyr lying at Laodicea? Also of blessed Papirius and Melito an Eunuch, who was led and guided in all things he did by the holy Ghost, and now resteth at Sardis, waiting the message from Heaven when he shall arise from the dead. All these celebrated the Feast of Easter, according to the Gospel, in the fourteenth Moon, swarving no where, but observing the rule of faith. To be short, and I Polycrates the meanest of you all do retain the tradition of my forefathers, of which also I have imitated some. For there were seven Bishops before me, and I am the 8th which alwayes have celebrated the Feast of Easter on that day in which the people remove the leaven from amongst them. I therefore (my brethren) who now have lived 65 years in the Lord, have conferred with the brethren throughout the World, and have read, and over-read the holy Scriptures, yet will not be moved at all with those things which are made to terrifie us. For my Ancestors and Elders have said that we ought rather to obey God than men. Afterwards he speaketh of the Bishops that consented, and subscribed to his Epistle, after this manner: I could repeat the Bishops that were present, whom you requested me to assemble, whom also I have assembled together, whose names if I should write would grow unto a great number; they have visited me a simple Soul, and a man of small account, and have consented to this Letter. They also know that I bear not these gray hairs in vain, but alwayes have had my conversation in Christ Jesus.

40. Immediately upon this, Victor Bishop of Rome went about to sever from the unity in the Communion all the Churches of Asia, together with the adjoining Congregations, as favoring not aright, and inveyed against them in his Epistles, and pronounced flatly all the brethren there for excommunicated persons. But this not pleasing all the Bishops, they exhorted him to seek after those things which concerned peace, unity, and love between brethren. Their words are at this day extant (saith Eusebius) that sharply reprehended Victor. Of which number Irenaeus in the name of all the brethren in Gall that were under his charge, wrote, and allowed the same sentence, viz. The Mystery of the resurrection of our Saviour to be celebrated on the Sunday onely. Yet as it was very meet he put him in mind at large of his duty, that he should not estrange, or cut off all the Churches of God, which retained the tradition of old custom. He told him, that there was not onely a controversie about the day, but also the kind or manner of fasting, that this variety began long before their time; yet for all this they were at unity one with another, for this variety of fasting, saith he, commendeth the unity of faith. He told him, that his Predecessors in the See of Rome, Anicetus, Dius, Hyginius, Telesphorus, and Xistus, neither did so observe it themselves, neither left any such commandment unto posterity, and yet they were at unity with them which resorted to them from other Churches, and did observe the same. Polycarpus being at Rome in the time of Anicetus, they varied between themselves about trifling matters, yet were they soon reconciled, and not a word of this matter. Neither was Anicetus able to perswade Polycarpus that he should not retain that which he had alwayes observed with John the Disciple of our Lord, and the rest of the Apostles with whom he had been conversant: neither did Polycarpus perswade Anicetus to observe it, but told him he ought ought to keep the ancient custom of the Elders whom he succeeded. These things being at this point, they communicated one with another. And in the Church Anicetus granted the Eucharist unto Polycarpus (or as Rassinus understandeth it, granted the ministrations of the Communion to him) for the reverence he owed him, and in the end they parted in peace; and all such as retained contrary observations throughout the whole universal Church held fast the bond of Love and Unity. Thus Irenaeus, not degenerating from the Etymology of his name, and passing all others in the gift of reconciling the brethren, practised for Ecclesiastical peace. He wrote not onely to Victor, but also to sundry Governours of divers other Churches, in several Epistles concerning the said Controversy.

41. Thus do we see the first controversies about this Feast of Easter. Although the hypotheses of Theophilus concerning the Aequinoctial will not abide tryal, yet doubtlesse, those had more reason on their side, who intending to celebrate the resurrection of Christ, refused to do it, but on that day he rose from the dead; the other practice seeming to have risen from a custom of keeping the Pascheover at that time, by such as were originally of the Jewish Nation. Notwithstanding they differed about time and manner, yet before the government of Victor, we see they agreed in brotherly love. And it appeareth that the custom of observing this Feast, was most ancient, even in the Apostles dayes, as appeareth from what is said by Polycrates, and by Irenaeus, in behalf of Polycarpus. Though they differed in the manner about keeping it, yet we do not find that any denied it was to be kept at all, although they were also for the true and spiritual observation of it, and against abuses, as all good Christians have reason to be. But (that we may conclude this controversie) in processe of time both they of Asia and others, leaving their own customs, admitted of the Paschal Canons, made by the Orientals, especially by those of Palastine and Alexandria. At length few dissenters remaining, a necessity of obedience was imposed by Constantine, who herein followed the judgement of two Synods, viz. that of Arelatum or Arles, A. D. 314, and the other of Nice, A. D. 325. But (that we may note thus much by way of Anticipation) The ancient British Church as it seemeth submitted not to those Decrees, observing Easter from the fourteenth to the twentieth Moon, which computation, saith (a) Beda, is contained within the Circle of 94. years. And for this, when they would not comply with Augustine the Monk (who had been sent from Gregory the Great Bishop of Rome to convert the Saxons, and was made by him the first Archbishop of Canterbury) who sought to draw them to uniformity, 1200 Monks of Bangor were put to the sword (whether through procurement of Augustine or no, I shall not now determin) by King Ethelfrid, A. D. 603, the Scots also then inhabiting Ireland observed Easter at the same time as the Britains did, to whom therefore Laurentius the Successor of Augustine in the See of Canterbury wrote; to drive them from their singularties. But how much he hereby profited, the presens times do yet declare, saith (b) Beda, who lived A. D. 700.

When Britain
received the Christian Faith.

42. And being thus occasionally brought to Britain, we must observe in behalf of our native Country, that the thick mists of superstition being scattered, in the reign of Commodus (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus, as Beda writeth) when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome, the heavenly light and brightnesse of Christianity, by the means of King Lucius shone upon this Island. This Prince admiring the holy life of Christians, made petition unto Eleutherus by mediation of Elvan and Meduan, Britains, that both himself and his Subjects might be instructed in the Christian Religion. He sent forth with Eugenius and Donatus, two holy men, with letters, which at this day, saith Cambden, be extant, and, as very many be perswaded, not forged, but Authentical, as bearing date when L. Aurelius Commodus the second time, and Vespronius were Consuls. This Vespronius was Vespronius Candidus, whom Onuphrius and Baronius make the Colleague of Commodus in the first year of his Fathers reign; though an Inscription of Gregorius mentions Aurelius Verus; so that to the very first beginning of Commodus the preaching of these men is to be ascribed. These holy men instructed the King and others in the mysteries of Christian Religion. Hereupon Ninnius writeth: King Lucius is surnamed Lever Maur, that is, a Prince of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now such as call the being of this King into question, for that they think there was at this time no King in Britain, which was wholly and fully reduced into a Province before; Cambden wiseth to remember, That the Romans had by ancient custom in their Provinces, Kings, as the instruments of their bondage, that the Britains even then refused to obey Commodus, and that they themselves possessed and held freely those parts of the Island, which were beyond the aforesaid wall, and had there Kings of their own, and that Antoninus Pius a few years before, having put an end to War, permitted Kingdoms to be ruled by their own Kings, and Provinces by their own Comites. He citeth Tertullian, who much about this time wrote, that Those places amongst the Britains which yielded the Romans no access, are now subdued unto Christ. Britain is inclosed within the compasse of the Ocean. The Nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beset by the Romans, for fear they might passe beyond the limits of their Countries. What should I speak of the Romans, who with Garrisons of their Legions fortifie their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their Dominion beyond these very Nations. But the Kingdom and Name of Christ reacheth further still, it is believed in every place, and is worshipped of all those People above named, &c.

43. But our Ecclesiastical Writers (thus Cambden proceedeth) who have employed both time and diligence in the consideration of this point, endeavour and labour to prove, and that out of ancient Fathers of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and infancy of the Church, Britain had received Christian Religion: and namely that Joseph of Arimathea, a Noble Senator, sailed out of Gall into Britain, and that Claudia Rufina the wife of Aulus Pudens (which woman as is credibly thought St. Paul nameth in his later Epistle to Timothy) and whom the Poet Martial so highly commendeth, was a Britain born. They cite the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsis hath recorded, that Simon Peter having travelled through Mauritiana, was at last slain and buried in Britain, as also that Aristobulus, whom St. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romans, was made Bishop of Britain (to which Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he speaketh of Britania and not of Britania. They report likewise upon the authority of Simeon, that great Metaphrast, and of the Menology of the Greeks, that St. Peter came hither and spread abroad the Light of Gods Word: out of Sophronius also and Theodoret, that St. Paul after his second imprisonment in Rome, visited this our Country. Whereupon **Venantius Fortunatus* wrote of him, (except he speaketh of his Doctrine) if he may be believed as a Poet. But to this purpose, saith our Author, maketh especially, that which ere-while I alleged out of Tertullian, as also that which Origen recordeth, how The Britains with one consent imbraced the Faith, and made way themselves to God by means of the Druids, who did alwaies bear upon this Article of Belief, That there is but one God. And verily of great moment is that with me, which Gildas writeth, after he had mentioned the rebellion of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof. In the mean while, saith he, Christ that true sun shining with his most glittering brightnesse upon the universal world, not from the temporal skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of Heaven, exceeding all times, vouchsafed first his beams, that is to say, his precepts and doctrine, in the time, as we know, of Tiberius Cæsar, unto this frozen Island full of ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible Sun. Chrysostome likewise, to note so much by the way, writeth of the Christian Religion in this Island as followeth. The British Islands seated without this Sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the Word (for even there also be Churches founded, and Altars erected) of that Word I say, which is planted in the Souls, and now also in the lips of all People. And the same Chrysostome in another place: How often have People in Britain fed of mans flesh: but now with fasting they refresh the Soul. Likewise St. Hierome: The Britain divided from our World, if he proceed in Religion, leaving the Western parts towards the Suns setting, will seek Jerusalem, a City known to him by form only, and relation of Scriptures.

Hereticks.

44. As for Hereticks which lived in the time with the forementioned Bishops, and the reigns of Marcus and Commodus: There were the Secundians, called so from Secundus, who together with *Epiphane*s and Isidorus taught the same with Valentinus. In life they were beastly, all women among them were common: they denied the resurrection of the flesh. Ptolomæus of whom were named the Ptolomæi, taught the heretical opinions of the Gnosticks and of Valensinus, adding thereunto of his own certain heathenish doctrines out of Homer. Marcus of whom the Marcofi, Colurbasus of whom the Colorbasii, and Heracleon of whom the Hereticks were called Heracleonites, sacrificed with witchcraft; to amaze their auditory they pronounced Hebrew words. Many women coming to Church, under colour of receiving the power of Prophecy from them, confessed they were abused by them. Marcus ran away with another mans wife. They poured oyl and water upon the head of the deceased, hoping so to redeem them. They said, that the life and generation of man consisted in seven Starrs: that Christ suffered not indeed, and that there was no resurrection of the flesh. Alcibiades refraining the use of Gods Creatures, was reformed by Aitalus the Martyr. Archontici, Hereticks in Palestine, referred all things unto mans powers. They said, the Sabbath was the God of the Jews, and the Devil the son of the Sabbath. (b) Tatianus the Scholar of Justin Martyr gave original to the Encratites, so called from continencie. For they abhorred marriage, forbade the use of living creatures, offered water instead of wine in the Sacrament, and denied that Adam was saved. Severus of whom were named the Severians, added to the opinions of Tatianus, reviling Paul, rejecting his Epistles, and the Acts of the Apostles. He said, that a woman was of the Devil, that man from the middle upwards was of God, and beneath of the Devil. Apelles, Pontinus, and other Marcionites, about this time also disturbed the Peace of the Church.

45. There were also certain Hereticks of Galatia and Cappadocia called Pepuzians, as also Quintiliani and Priscilliani, because they said, that Christ in form of a woman being the bed-fellow of Quintilla or Priscilla, revealed unto her Divine Mysteries. Women were Priests amongst them, and their sacrifices were alike to the Momanists, of which Sect they seem to have been, seeing also his Prophetesses were of the Town Pepusa. Ariotyrita were Hereticks which offered bread and cheese in the Sacrament. Alogi denied Christ to be the Word, condemned John's Gospel, and said, that Cerinthus the Heretick wrote the Revelations. Theodotus a Momanist through Sorcery took his flight towards Heaven, but down he fell and died miserably. Adamires devised a Church after the fashion of an hot-house, to keep them from cold for the space of an hour or Service time: they were all naked men and women: Virgins preached unto the rest: their Church they called Paradise, and themselves Adam and Eve. (a) Florinus and Blastus fell from the Church, and taught at Rome, that God was the Author of evil, whom Irenæus confuted. (b) Theodotus a Tanner denied the Divinity of Christ; he was the first Author of the Heresy of Artemon, for which cause Viator Bishop of Rome excommunicated him. Artemon his disciple accounted Christ but a bare and naked man. He lived in the time of Victor and Zephyrinus. His companions were Asclepiodorus and Natalius, who repented and fell at the feet of Zephyrinus Bishop of Rome for absolution. (c) Marcianus the Heretick maintained an heterodox opinion, out of the pretended Gospel of Peter, whom Serapion Bishop of Antioch confuted. (d) Noetus denied there were three Persons, saying, All three were one. He called him-

CHAP. V.

From the death of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to sale, to the death of Maximinus the first elected Emperour without consent of the Senate, the space of 45 years.

1. THE Soldiers having murdered Pertinax, got them to their Camp, and set the Empire to sale, proclaiming, that they would prefer him that should offer most. Two there were found who bade money for it: first Sulpicianus a man of Consular dignity, Governour of the City, and Father in Law to Pertinax, and Didius Julianus of the same degree, a great Lawyer, and exceeding rich. The Soldiers being jealous lest the former should have an intention to punish them for the murder of Pertinax, accepted the offer of Julianus, who promised what they would ask, having, as he said, treasures of Silver and Gold. Being by a ladder received up to the wall, and so into the Camp, he promised to restore the honours and Statues of Commodus, to grant them what liberty they enjoyed under that Prince, and to give them more than they could ask or expect, he was carried into the Palace, the people by the way cursing and upbraiding him with his purchase. Having thus invaded the Empire, he gave himself up to all Luxury, but being unable to perform his promise to the Soldiers, lost their favour, and fell into the contempt of all men, the people desiring another Prince. At this time Pescennius Niger was Governour of Syria, who as well for the greatnesse of his place (his Province containing all from Phœnicia unto Euphrates) as for his popularity, was most eminent: him did the People extol, and they implored his assistance. He being glad of this opportunity, easily perswaded his Soldiers to accept of him for their Emperour, and entertained Ambassadors which now had recourse to him as the lawful Prince. But then giving himself up to idleness, he neglected to settle and confirm his state by going to Rome, and (what was more) by drawing the Army in Illyricum to his side, and so lost all.

2. At this time governed both the Pannonias L. Septimius Severus an African born, a man forward and crafty, who seeing the Roman Empire thus obnoxious to every man's carch, resolved to venture for it amongst the rest, especially in regard that of those two who had seized on it, the one was negligent and secure, the other hated and despised. Being also encouraged by some dreams, he first of all inveighed against the Prætorian bands which had killed Pertinax, whom knowing to be much beloved by his Soldiers, he highly extolled him, and easily perswaded them to revenge his death, who once was Lieutenant of the forces in Illyricum. Then presently (though he pretended he sought it not) was he saluted Emperour, and took upon him the name of Pertinax, which he knew was acceptable to all. After this he marched with great speed to Rome, the Italians (who ever since the dayes of Augustus had not been used to War) receiving him in all places, and Julianus his soldiers very slowly providing for resistance, though he had now distributed to them all the money he could by any means compass. Severus conveyed his Soldiers in a disguised manner into the City, which was full of them privily armed ere Julianus or the People were aware; whereupon Julianus wrote to him, to signifie he was willing to receive him into participation of the Empire, and afterwards desired he might resign it. For the Senate seeing him so timorous, and the other now at hand, being called together according to the ancient custome by the Consuls, decreed death to him, and the Empire to Severus. Julianus held the dignity seven moneths, having purchased death at an excessive rate.

Severus obtained it.

3. Severus having thus obtained the Empire, that he might not at first crack his credit by falsifying his word, got those Soldiers into his power that had slain Pertinax, & making them be stripped of their Military Cloaths, banished them 100 miles from the Citie. Then entering the Court, he promised great things to the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the pre-script of Marcus, and not onely to take the name, but also disposition of Pertinax, although there were some who so well knew him that they could not be deceived. After this he prepared for an expedition against Niger, but fearing to leave an Emulator at his back, he endeavoured to prevent him. This was Clodius Albinus, who at this time governed Britain, was of Patrician rank, and had a strong Army at his Command. He flattered him with the title of Cesar, beseeching him, as the fittest person, to take care of the Empire, for that he himself grew old, and his Children were Infants. Albinus overjoyed that he should obtain what he had desired without any trouble, fooled himself in his vain confidence, especially for that Severus had written to the Senate in the same strain, had ordered money to be stamped with his Image, erected him some Statues, and did him honour otherwile, to deceive him.

4. Niger much troubled at his coming towards him, took care for securing the passages into Asia, gathered together all the forces in those parts, obtained aid from the Parthian and Armenian Kings, seized on Byzantium, and fortified the Straights of the Mountain Taurus. Severus therefore directed not his course towards Byzantium, but marched for Cyzicus, where Æmilianus General to Niger met him, and either for that he was over-matched, or desirous to save his Children (whom Severus, as also others of his adversaries had got into his hands) betrayed his trust, and lost his Army. Then did Severus invade Bithynia, wherein they of Nicomedia revolted to him; but the Inhabitants of Nice stuck close to Niger: thence he proceeded into Galatia, and so into Cappadocia to passe over Taurus. The passage was so fortified and defended, that no hope there was of breaking through, till abundance of Rain-water falling down from the Mountains broke down the Wall, whereupon the Defendants fled. Then came Niger with an Army very numerous, but not to be compared with the Legions of Illyricum for skill and valour, and they met at Issus, where Darius was overthrown by Alexander. Here Niger had the same fortune in a great and bloody battel, after which going back to Antioch, and being pursued by a party of horse, his head was cut off, having brought himself to this end by his delay and idlenesse. Severus having thus removed him, now cast his thoughts towards his friend in Britain.

5. He now consulted how he might secure the Empire to his family, which could not be done as long as Albinus continuing Cesar had some title to it, and to whom in his absence the great ones had demonstrated their affections, as to a man of great nobility, and far more worthy of the Sovereignty than he who at present possessed it: he therefore resolved to remove him out of the way. By open War he thought it not convenient to do it, and therefore at first attempted his design by treachery, sending some who under colour of bringing Letters should make him away. Albinus having warning to beware of him, this succeeded not, so that he betook himself to force, and with incredible expedition returned into the West. Albinus terrified at his hasty retreat made all possible Provision for resistance, and passed over into Gaul, where after many skirmishes they joyned in a pitch battel near Lugdunum. Victory at the first so far inclined towards Albinus, that Severus cast off his Robe, and hid himself, but by the coming in of Leius, who designed to destroy them both, and set up for himself, the fight was so changed, that Albinus was routed, and flying to the Citie, there had his head struck off. Then returned Severus to Rome with all his Army, which to reward, he not onely bestowed money upon them, but also such privileges, which though to him they might procure respect and service, yet proved the bane of the Commonwealth. For the Soldiers having formerly through the loosenesse and neglect neglect of some Emperours, contracted sloth and covetousnesse, were thence more animated to violate the Sovereignty, to depose, and set upon whom they pleased. Now he adding more fuel to this flame increased their allowance of Corn, gave them license to wear Rings of Gold as Knights, and to marry and maintain wives, which broke in pieces the Relicks of the anient Discipline, and effected that we shall hear more of them upon very sad occasions.

The fifth per-

Coming into Britain,

6. He made another expedition into the East to be revenged upon such as had assisted Niger. Peircing into Arabia he besieged Aira the Metropolis of the Arravi; but found such entertainment as glad he was to retreat without any thing performed, and onely by chance as some say saved his reputation. For in his return being driven by Tempests into Parthia, he was constrained to land near Ctesiphon, the chief Citie where Artabanus the King then resided. Artabanus struck with the suddenesse of the thing fled again, and Severus taking the Citie with ease, got great Treasures, with multitudes of Captives, and returned to Rome in a Triumphant manner, having more by good fortune than policy atchieved this Enterprize. When he had done these great things abroad, and (considering the Princes by him defeated, and the wonderfull expedition he used at all times) had approached near unto the greatest Military glory of the most famous Captains, he lay idle at home, or spending his time in judicial affairs he let fall the vizard of goodnesse, which in the beginning he had put on. His extraordinary covetousnesse increased his innate cruelty, so that under pretence of taking off his Enemies, he put to death unheard 43 persons of chiefest rank. In despite of the Senare he Canonized Commodus for a God, cast Narcissus, who strangled him (as he had deserved) to the Lyons, called himself his brother, and to his son Bassianus, whom he made partner with him in the Empire, he gave the surname of Antoninus. His cruelty was also extended to the Church, against which he raised the fifth persecution in the 10th year of his reign, wherein perished many.

7. Severus after the overthrow of Albinus, sent first Heracianus to seize upon Britain, and to rule it: then Virius Lupus as Proprator and Lieutenant (whom Ulpian the Lawyer calleth President of Britain) who being wearied with the inrodes and insolences of the Meate, sent for the Emperour himself over. He was glad of this occasion, not onely for desire of glory, but also to draw away with him his two sons from the Citie, where they gave up themselves to licentious rioting, and exercised irreconcilable enmity betwixt themselves. The Britains sent Ambassadors to him to beg peace, but he detained them till he had made sufficient Provision for War, and then dismissed them without granting their requests. Leaving his son Geta (whom at his arrival he also created Augustus) in the hithermost part of the Province (which continued in obedience) for the civil Jurisdiction and Administration of affairs there; he himself with Antoninus went into the further parts, where being busied in cutting down Woods, making Bridges, and drying up the Meers, he fought no battel, but whar with the Enemies ambuscadoes, and with sicknesse lost 50000 men, according to Dio. Herodian writeth that the Britains found him work enough, being able to retreat where the Romans could not follow by reason of the Fens, which the Natives easily passed being naked, very nimble and skilfull in the places, so that by ambuscadoes laid in the Caledonian Forest, and through the unwholesomnesse of the Meerish grounds he lost many thousands of his men; but he forced them to Peace with delivery of a good part of their Countrey and their Arms. For these victories he stamped certain pieces of money with this inscription Victoria Britanica, assumed the surname of Britannicus Maximus, and his son Geta was also surnamed Britannicus, as appeareth by his Coins, saith Cambden. But shortly after they revolted, whereupon he brake out into such a rage that he gave his Soldiers charge to make a general Massacre of them all, and returning, though much tormented with the Court, against them raised a Wall 130 miles in length crosse the Island to separate betwixt the Barbarians barians and Romans, which Bassianus afterwards increased. When he had in some sort repressed the Rebels, he sickned, not so much out of any bodily distemper, as for grief, and sorrow of mind, by reason of the desperate and unreclaimable demeanour of his son Antoninus, who once or twice gave the attempt to kill him with his own hand. These were his last words: A troubled State of the Commonwealth I found in every place, but I leave it in peace and quietnesse even amongst the Britains. He died at Eboracum, now called York (having tried as he said all sorts of lives, and condemned all of vanity) on the day before the Nones of February, having reigned 18 years, and almost lived 66. *A. rours.

8. Severus his body was in a Military sort carried forth by his Soldiers to the funeral fire, and honoured with a solemn justing and running at tilt performed by his Sons and Soldiers. He was also Canonized a god after the ordinary manner of the Apotheosis of the Roman Emperours, which being not formerly touched its convenient in this place to describe, as we have it from Herodian. A custom, saith he, the Romans have to consecrate those Emperors that die, their sons or successors surviving. And whosoever are thus honoured, be canonized, and registred in the Roll of their Divi or gods. During this complement they hold a general mourning through the whole City, and the same mixed with a festival solemnity. For the dead body they bury with a sumptuous funeral, according to the manner of other men. But they frame an Image of wax, resembling in all points the party deceased, and lay the same openly at the Entry of the Palace, upon a most ample and stately bed of Ivory erected on high, and covered with Cloath of Gold. And verily that Image lieth with a pale colour like unto a sick man. About the bed there sits a good part of the day the whole body of the Senate on the left hand arrayed in their blacks; and on the right hand certain Matrones honorable by the Dignity of their Husbands or Parents. And there is not one of them seen to wear any Gold about them, nor to be adorned with Jewels, but clad in white and slender Garments they represent mourners. This they do for seven dayes together: during which time the Physicians resort daily to him to feel his pulse, and consider of his disease, and thereupon as of their Patient judicially pronounce that he groweth worse and worse. Then when he seemeth to be dead, certain of the noblest, and most choice young men, as well of Senatorian as Equestrian rank, take up the bed, and carry it through the Via Sacra into the old Forum, where the Roman Magistrates were wont to lay down their Offices. Here on both sides are certain steps raised in manner of stairs; upon which on the one hand are placed a quire of boyes of noblest birth and Patritian dignity, and on the other a Company of women of noble parentage, singing in commendation of the deceased Prince, Hymns and Sonets: tuned to a solemn and mournfull note.

Lib. 4. ad initium.

9. These things done, they take up the bed or hearse again, and carry it out of the City into the Campus Martius, where in the broadest place thereof a frame or turret four-square, with equal sides, is raised, and made in manner of a Tabernacle, of no other matter than great pieces of Timber. Now this within is all filled with dry fuel: but without adorned with rich hangings interwoven with Gold wire, with divers Ivory portraits of Imagery, and sundry curious pictures. Over this frame stood another somewhat lesse; but in form and furniture like unto the former, with windows and doors standing open. And so a third, and fourth Turret, smaller every one than that next beneath it, and others like it still one after another, till you come to the last, which is the least of all the rest. The manner of this building you may compare to those Lanterns, or light Towers standing by Haven sides, and commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct ships at Sea in their course to safe Harbours. The Hearse then being mounted up into the second Tabernacle, they get together spices, and odours of all sort, as also all the sweet smelling fruits, herbs, myces, and liquors, that the whole World will afford, and thereon pour them by heaps. For there is no

Na.

Nation, City, or State, nor any person of rank and quality, but strive every one to bestow in honour of the Prince, these last gifts and presents. Now when there's a mighty heap of spices raised, and the whole room is therewith filled, then all of Knights degree first ride about the adifice, marching in a certain measure: and therewith in their courses and reconourses observe a warlike kind of motion round, in just measure and number. Chariots are also driven about by such, as sitting in them are clothed in purple, and represent all the famous Roman Captains and Emperours. These things thus performed, he that succeedeth in the Empire takes a torch, and sets it to the tabernacle: then all the rest on every side put fire under, and every place being filled with that drye fuel and odors, instantly are taken with a vehement fire. Then presently from the last and least tabernacle, as from some high turret, when the fire is put underneath, an Eagle is let flye, which is believed to carry the Princes Soul up into Heaven. And so from that time forward the Emperour is adored amongst the rest of the gods.

10. Severus left his two son Antoninus Bassianus (called also Caracalla Leg. Herodian. l. 4. from a barbarous habit he gave to the people, as Spartianus writeth) and Geta Aurel. Vict. Spartian. Eutrop. l. 9. Dion. lib. 77. Orosium l. 7. c. 8. equal sharers in the Empire. They after his death left not off their former contentions, but increased them to that height, that they could neither live nor reign together, but thought of parting the Empire betwixt them; but their mother Julia (Spartianus maketh her the step-mother of Antoninus, and to have loved him better than her own son Geta, nay filthily, inso much that she married him afterwards) by her passionate interposition hindred it. They then betook themselves to secret conspiracies, which succeeding nor, Antoninus resolved though it were by open force to kill his brother, whom he perceived to be far better beloved than himself, and either breaking into his brothers chamber, or getting in by his mothers means, under pretence of reconciliation to be made, killed him in her bosom. This done, he secured the Empire to him by bribing the Soldiers, to whom he was so profuse, that in one day he bestowed on them, what his father had been unjustly scraping together for eighteen years. Then falling like a savage beast into cruel courses, he cut off all Geta's friends and acquaintance, all the Senators of any considerable rank or wealth, the Lieutenants and Governours of Provinces, with the Vestal Virgins, and for the Soldiers to kill the people beholding the Circensian Games. After this going into Germany, to please his Army he lived an hard and labouring life; and thence passing into Thrace, he there imitated Alexander the Great, whom he ever much affected to talk of, and pretended to emulate. He went thence to Illyrum, where he counterfeited Achilles, and so to Alexandria, where he made the Inhabitants dearly repent of their rathnesse and folly. Olymp. 247. an. 4. V. C. 965. A. 11. Being naturally given to much carling, they had formerly tailed against him for his cruelty towards his brother, and despised him, for that being a man of so contemptible stature, he compared himself to their Alexander. Resolving then to be revenged on them, he first entertained them very plausibly, but afterwards drawing forth all the youth by a wile, he compassed them in with his Army, and killed them all. After this desirous to become famous by some great exploit, he sent to the Parthian for his Daughter, and pretended that he himself would come and marry her, whereby that King being perswaded to meet him with a great number of people, he fell upon them and made a great slaughter, for that they thought it needlesse to come armed to a wedding; and Ariabanus himself with difficulty escaped. Getting here much booty, and as he thought much glory, he returned into Mesopotamia, where he received punishment from above, for his manifold cruelty. There was one Opilius Macrinus an African born, and one of his Captains, whom he unworthily used. This Macrinus receiving a letter from Maternianus directed to the Emperour (who had commanded him to call together the Magicians, and consult them about his end, and whether any lay in wait for the Empire) wherein Antoninus was advised to cut him off, as aiming at the Sovereignty, when he had ventured to open it, perceiving that either he or his Master must dye, and therefore procured one Martialis to kill him. This man being intraged against the Emperour, for that he had condemned his brother without sufficient hearing, slew him as he was making water, on the sixth of the Ides of April, after he had reigned six years, and two moneths, in the first year of the 249 Olympiad, A. V. C. 970. A. D. 217, Brutius Pre-sens and Exericatus being Consuls. Amongst many others Caracallus put to death Papinianus the great Lawyer, as its said, because he would not defend his paricide.

Bishops,

12. In the first year of Severus (that we may continue our method concerning Ecclesiastical matters) died Victor Bishop of Rome, on the fifth of the Calends of August, and Zepherinus succeeded, the fifteenth Bishop of that Sea, according to Damasus. In the last of Antoninus Bassianus, Zepherinus died on the seventh before the Calends of September. The Sea was vacant five dayes. Then succeeded Callistus, who therefore was elected, the day before the Calends of September, on the first feria. After Dios Bishop of Jerusalem whom the Bishops of the neighbouring Churches had ordained after the departure of Narcissus, Germanion succeeded, and after him Gordius, in whose time Narcissus shewed himself again, as if he had been risen from the dead, and was intreated by the brethren to enjoy his Bishoprick, being much marvelled at for his departure, for his Philosophical course of life, and especially for the vengeance and plagues of God poured upon his accusers. And because for his great age he was not able to supply the place, Alexander Bishop of Cappadocia was joyned with him, and governed alone after his death. In the Church of Antioch, Asclepiades was Bishop after Serapion, about the first year of Caracalla, and was succeeded by Phileus about the last of that Prince's reign.

Tertullian.

13. Upon Zepherinus Bishop of Rome falleth very foul Tertullian a Presbyter or Priest of Carthage in Africk, for that he was more severe against such, as through fear had sacrificized to Idols, than against Whoremongers and Adulterers, wherein not without cause truly (saith Cappellus) but yet without measure he blameth Zepherinus, and the whole Roman Clergy, the manners of whom were even now very corrupt, if we may believe Tertullian. But really not so much out of hatred to their vices, as out of prejudice to the truth he calleth the Roman Clergy Psychicus, as well in his book de pudicitia, as in that de monogamia, which he thus beginneth, Heretici nuptias auferunt Psychici ingerunt. He pretendeth therein onely to condemn second mariages, but indeed most of his arguments respect both first and second, although he himself had married a wife, and retained her in his Presbytery. But marriage which he had learnt of the Orthodox to approve, he learnt of Montanus to despise, to whom he would have more revealed than to the Apostles, because they as yet (or for certain the Church) could not bear the yoke of fastings and calibate which Montanus brought in, and he as a Montanist would inculcate. This humour at length so possessed him, that neither content with the title of Christian, nor that of Presbyter, he put on the Philosophick Pallium, as a token of a more austere life, wherein he would be eminent not onely amongst Christians but also Montanists. The Africans either being amazed or laughing at this novelty, he wrote an elegant but most obscure Book de pallio, which before being miserably lacerated, hath been of late dayes restored by the most learned Salmasius. He wrote his Book de prescriptionibus about the eighth year of Commodus, as Cappellus gathereth, because in the end thereof making a Catalogue of Hereticks, he mentioneth Theodotus (who was censured by Victor Bishop of Rome, for holding Christ to have been a meer man) but not Artemon the Heretick who appeared shortly after.

14. His book de corona militis acquainteth us with the occasion of the persecution of the Christians, in the reign of Severus. The Emperour ere he marched into the East (in that Expedition wherein he overthrew the Parthians) made his elder son his partner in the Tribunitial power, and by his liberality pleased the People formerly intraged by the many punishments he inflicted.

dicted. By occasion of this liberality, as it seemeth, a Christian Soldier holding a certain garland or crown in his hand, as if it were wickednesse for him to set it on his head as the rest did, was asked why he did so, and answered, that he was a Christian. This was the occasion of the Emperours rage. About the fifteenth of Severus he wrote against the Marcionites, whom he so impugnerh, as yet underhand he inculcath his Montanism. For saith he: Amongst us spiritual reason derived from the Comforter, persuadeth in the Faith single matrimony. But we must not forget, that about the fourth of Severus he wrote a most excellent Apology for the Christian Faith. At the same time with Tertullian flourished Clemens Alexandrinus, because a Philosopher of Alexandria, the Scholar of Pantenus, and Master of Origen. Eusebius mentioneth him, and Pantenus in the second of Severus, at which time it's probable he wrote his Stromata; for not intending his Chronology beyond the time of Commodus, he seemeth not long after his death to have begun that Work. At this time also lived Minutius Felix an eminent Lawyer, and the Author of that excellent Book intituled Octavius, which, as Lactantius writeth, doth declare how fit an assertor of the truth he might have been, had he applyed himself wholly to that study. This Book being intended as an Apology for Christian Religion, acquainteth us what thoughts the Heathen at that time had thereof, as also do the Apologies of Justin Martyr, the Books of Origen against Celsus, and especially that of Tertullian. We have already shewn the rise and increase of Christian Religion, we have delivered the series of the most eminent Bishops and Fathers thereof, as also of the several Hereticks which from within disturbed the peace thereof. We have also given an account of the several fiery cryals the faithful underwent. But what opinions the Infidels had of Christians and Christianity, of what crimes they accused them, whence their hatred proceeded, whereupon the Emperours grounded their bloody Edicts: what the Primitive Saints did in the mean time, how they behaved themselves under these pressures, how they caried it towards their Enemies, how they stood affected in duty towards their Princes; in sum, what their conversations both as men and Christians were, is most worthy to be considered, and those things in short out of the Apologies aforesaid, and other Authors, we shall endeavour to discover.

15. The first thing that the Heathens cavilled at in Christianity was the newnesse of it. (a) St. Paul seemed to them to be a setter forth of new gods. And there was an ancient Law at (b) Rome which forbad introducing new ceremonies into Religion, as worshipping strange deities, unlesse approved by the Senate, and this was an inviolable Law, which binding Emperours as well as others, Tiberius could not as he desired receive Jesus Christ amongst their gods; for the Senate would not approve of a God they did not know. This prejudice (which yet in Idolatry often effected nothing amongst the Romans) was increased by a misapprehension of our Lord and Saviours sufferings; his being crucified made them despise both him and his. Hence (c) Tacitus telling the original of the Christians, will let the World know, that Christ from whom they derived their name, was Tiberio imperitante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio affectus. And hence Trajan (d) in his discourse with Ignatius, when he would mean Christ, called him Crucifixus, the Crucified, in way of contempt. This contempt was increased into disdain, by reason that Christ would have no other Gods (as they accounted them) sharers with him in worship, and this disdain was heightened into rage, when Christians preaching this saving doctrine, declaiming against Idolls, proving the Heathen gods to be devils, and striking at the root of Paganism, endeavoured to draw even the whole World from superstition and Idolatry so ancient and universal. You say, we do not worship the Gods, saith (e) Tertullian. This was accounted a crime of sacrilege, and worthy of death; much more then to dissuade others from doing it. Quid, (f) Apol. c. 10.

16. Prejudice and hatred being risen thus high invented false accusations, and caught hold of idle surmises, nothing ill seeming incredible concerning those that are already odious. (a) Athenagoras saith, that three things they objected against Christians: Atheism, Thyestes his feasts, and the Copulation of Oedipus. The two later (whereof as much as concerneth Thyestes and Oe- dipus we have spoken above in their due places) (b) Tertullian thus explaineth.
 ‘The Crimes pretended against us (the horror of which makes us passe for ‘wicked in the opinion of the people) are, that we meet together to sacri‘fize a Child; that after we have taken away his life by a barbarous supersti‘tion, we devour his body, and when we have eaten the flesh of this in‘nocent, we commit Incests. They add, that we have Dogs, which serve to ‘overthrow the Candles, and doing the Office of those infamous Merchants ‘of modesty, make us lose all shame in taking the lights from us, and co‘vering our actions under the veil of darknesse, embolden us to seek the use ‘of ungodly, and sacrilegious pleasures. Calicius maketh beginners initia-‘red by the blood of an Infant, which they all licking up, and dividing his Members amongst themselves, by so horrid a Ceremony confirmed their league, and the Covenant of their mutual secrecy. “These Sacra (saith he) are more ‘abominable than all sacrilege. And as for their feasting, ’tis known suffici‘ently, all speak of it in all places: the Oracion also of our Cerentius doth ‘witness it: They meet together to eat on a set day with all their Children, ‘Sisters, Mothers, Persons of every Sex, and every age. There, after much eat‘ing, when the feast is now grown hot, & the heat of incestuous lust is kindled ‘by drunkennesse, the Dog that is tied to the Candle-stick is provoked, by ‘casting a piece of meat beyond the length of the string by which he is bound,
 ‘to a violent leap. Thus the conscious light being overthrown and put out, &c.
 so he proceedeth to the same purpose, but in worse terms. And Justin Mar- tyr in his Conference with (c) Tryphon the Jew demandeth of him after this manner. ‘Do you also believe concerning us that we devour men, and af- (c) Pag. 227.
 ‘ter meat the lights being put out, use wicked and promiscuous Copulation? B.
 Lastly, Theophylus Patriarch of Antioch in his third book (d) to Antolycus against Calumniators of Christian Religion, summeth up what we have alrea- (d) Pag. 119.
 dy said, in these words. ‘They say that our wives are common, and accuse D.
 ‘us that we use promiscuous Copulation. Besides, they lay to our charge that ‘we do not abstain from our own sisters, but rashly dare to violate those with ‘incestuous lust. But this is most cruel and brutish of the Crimes they ob‘ject against us, when with an impious mouth they prate, that we eat mans ‘flesh: neither do they cease to traduce our Religion or Doctrine as of yester‘day, and destitute of all truth, which neither we our selves, if a controversie ‘arise are able to defend with clear demonstrations. Further, they say that our ‘Doctrine is nothing but folly, and meer toys.

17. That malice which invented these impious adjuncts of Christian Religion, found out a suitable object of worship; for the Romans had so far forgotten their own antient custom of serving their Gods without Images, or resemblances (for Numa, as Plutarch telleth us, and the antient Romans for many years admitted no Images in their Temples, because the Deity cannot be made out by any external resemblance) that they thought it impossible for any Religion not to be guilty of Idolatry towards some visible thing. Hence came that fable related by (a) Lactius (an Author guilty of malice against both Jews and Christians) "that the Jews consecrated the Image of an Ass, because (forsooth) being pressed sorely with thirst in the deserts of Arabia, certain wild Asses shewed them the Fountains where they were wont to drink; although this Author, who saith he lies not, writeth, that Pompey having taken Jerusalem, and entered into the Temple to see the mysteries of the Jewish Religion, saw there no Image at all. (b) Tertullian conceiveth, that from this tale sprung that conceit that the Christians (the Religion of whom was drawn from that of the Jews, and succeeded it) worshipped the Effigies of an Ass. "I hear, (saith Cecilius) that they worship a Consecrated head of an Ass, the most filthy of all sorts of Cattel, I know not out of what foolish persuasion; a Religion worthy of, and descended from, such manners. But he goeth further, and relateth a report, that the very object of their worship was also obscene. (c) Tertullian further writeth, that some were of opinion they worshipped the Crosse, and Cecilius, from the ignominious death of our Lord, and this instrument of it, argueth to the infamy of Christian Religion in an abominable manner. Tertullian in the same place telleth us, that some with more apparent reason believed the Sun to be their God, and sent them to the Religion of the Persians, herein suspecting them for so doing, because when they prayed they turned themselves toward the East. [And after an answer to this lye he addeth:] "The calumnies invented to cry down our Religion arose to such excesses of impiety, that not long ago in this Citie, a picture of our God was shewed by a certain infamous person that got his living by exposing to the sight of the people, wild beasts: who by a strange faculty gotten by him to avoid their bitings, making use of his craft, shewed also the aforesaid picture to all comers, with this inscription thereon, This is Onochoetes the God of Christians. This supposed God of the Christians pretended by him, had the ears of an Ass, an hoof on one of his feet; carried a book, and was clothed with a Gown: we laugh at the barbarousness of this name, and the extravagancy of this figure. Such were the blasphemies of Pagans against Christian worship, and as an argument for them they produced the secrecy of Christian meetings, which their own cruelty and rage had made necessary. "They (d) talked of nothing more than the excesses of the Tables of the Christians. And after all this they (e) objected, that they were not any way profitable in the commerce of the World.

18. As to their outward demeanour they accused them of Sedition as well as Atheism. Let (a) Tertullian speak upon what frivolous grounds: "You say we worship not the Gods; nor for the welfare of the Emperours offer sacrifices to them. The one of these two Crimes whereof you accuse us must necessarily follow upon the neck, or in consequence of the other: for, being resolved to render no manner of worship to your Deities, we must necessarily in like manner be resolved not to sacrifice at their Altars, whether for our selves, or for what person soever it be. Hereupon you conclude us guilty of Sacrilege and high Treason. Pliny was wont, as appeareth from his Epistle to Trajan, to try Christians by supplications made to the Images of the Gods, and amongst these to the Emperour's picture, by Frankincense and Wine. This burning incense was an ordinary tryal in all ages. They were also counted singular and factious, for that they would not swear by the Fortune or Genius of the Emperours. This the holy Martyr (b) Polycarp was bidden to do by the Proconsul a little before his suffering. These prejudices and false opinions being heightened and irritated by the malice of Devils, who found themselves nearly concerned therein, procured wonderfull enmity and malice in the hearts of Pagans against the faith.

19. "Is it not strange (saith (a) Tertullian,) that the hatred wherewith this name is pursued, in such manner blinds the minds of most men, that when they witness the probity of a Christian, they mix in their discourse as a reproach that he hath embraced this Religion. One saith, truly, he of whom you speak is an honest man, if he were not a Christian, and his life would be free from blame. Another, Do you know such a one, who had the reputation of a wise and discreet man? he is lately turned Christian. [Again] "These people by an extreme blindness of hatred speak to the advantage of the name Christian, when they strive to render it odious. For, say they, How pleasant, and of what a good humour was that woman? How sociable and jovial was that man? 'Tis pity they should be Christians. So they impute the amendment of their lives to the profession of Christianity. Some of them also purchase the aversion they carry against the name Christian, which we bear, with the price of what is most precious to them, rather desiring to lose the sweetness of life, tranquillity of mind, and all sorts of commodities, than to see in their houses that which they hate. A man who heretofore had his mind full of jealousy, can no longer endure the company of his wife, what assurance soever he hath of her chastity, after once he perceives her to be turned Christian, and parts from her now when her actions full of modesty have extinguished all suspicions wherewith he was heretofore moved. A father who of a long time endured the disobedience of his heathenish son, resolves to take from him the hope of succeeding him in his inheritance for turning Christian, when at the same time executing his commands without murmuring. A master that used his slave gently when his carriage gave him some cause of distrust, now puts him far from him for a Christian, when he hath most assurance of his fidelity. 'Tis committing of a Crime to correct the disorders of a man's life by the motions of an holy conversion to the Christian faith, and the good which is produced by so happy a change works not so powerfully in the minds of men, as the hatred they have conceived against us. Indeed this hatred is strange; and when I consider that the name of Christian onely makes it to be so, I would willingly know how a name can be Criminal, and how a simple word can be accused? Thus much (and enough I suppose) to discover hatred it self.

20. And the fruits of hatred abundantly manifested themselves. "1 In fasting Christians to Crosses & pieces of wood. 2 Hanging them up as public spectacles unto all men upon Gibbets. 3 Piercing their bodies with Irons. 4 Cutting off their heads. 5. Exposing them to the rage of wild beasts. 6. Throwing them into flames. 7. Condemning them to work in Mines, and 8. confining them to Islands; "all which sorts are expressed in one (a) Chapter of Tertullian's Apology. In another (b) place he thus writeth. How often do those people being our Enemies, of their own accord, without your authority, assault us with stones, or burn us? They are verily so enraged against us, that during the furies of the Bacchinales, they spare not even Christians that are dead, but trouble the rest of their Graves, they violate their Sepulchres which are as Sanctuaries of the dead, they draw forth their bodies not to be known whose bodies they are, after mangled by them, which with extreme inhumanity they tear, and drag in the streets. (c) [Elsewhere;] How many are there among you, O ye people, that are this way greedy of the blood of Christians? and also among you, O ye Magistrates, after you appear such Justiciars by the severity you treat us with, whose consciences I would strike with true reproaches of having procured the death of your own Children? Yet if you did but simply put them to death, it were something; but by a strange excess of cruelty you throw them into the water, you expose them to the rigour of cold and hunger, and the rage of Dogs; you will not take their lives away with the sword, because too gentle a death, and which men of the age of discretion had rather suffer, than any other that hath violence in it.

21. But, when the time of persecution drew towards an end, then especially did the Devil rage with variety of torments against the Primitive Saints. For besides those formerly mentioned, (d) Serapion was thrown down, and had his neck broken. Some having their flesh rent in pieces with the lash of the whip were broyled upon Gridirons; others having their skins razed, and scorched, being tied by one leg were hanged on Trees with the head downwards wards. They pulled out the right eyes of others, searing the empty place, and sawing off the left legs of others, seared their hams, and condemned them to the mines, which usage was accounted clemency. Some they scourged to death, cut out their tongues, and strangled them. One Apphianus, being all disfigured with stripes, had his feet wrapped in flax, oyled all over, which being set on fire, it ran over his flesh and consumed it, and peirced into the marrow within the bones, so that his whole body distilled like to melting wax. Three dayes he was suffered to remain in prison after this torture, and when, by reason of his wounds he was ready to yield up the ghost, then was he thrown into the Sea. Others were forced by buckling, jussing, and buffering, to kill one another. Others of mens estate were gelded and condemned to the quarries. Others were tormented grievously and chastized with imprisonment and fetters, of which number was Pamphilus, of all my familiars my dearest friend, a man who among all the Martyrs of our time, saith Eusebius, excelled in every kind of virtue. He had his sides mangled with sharp razors, and then was ordered to be kept in the noisom stench of the close prison, where the rest of the Confessors remained, till at length he was put to death, being a Presbyter of the Church of Cæsarea, concerning whose life Eusebius wrote three books, and for his familiarity with, and affection to him, had the surname of Pamphilus. This variety of the torments of Christians, appeareth from several passages in the seventh and eighth Books of his Ecclesiastical History, which so far exceedeth all inferiour punishments, or (that I may speak in the phrase of Lawyers) the diminutiones capitis, that we need not mention how Christians were denied the title of (b) Roman Citizens. But one kind of punishment far more grievous than the rest there yet was, which more tormented Christians than all other tortures put together: and that was the loss of their chastity. This Engine battered the fort of Origen's constancy, who chose rather to sacrifice to idols than be abused by an Ethiopian, as Suidas writeth. (c) Tertullian giveth us another instance, that we may enquire no further. "And indeed a few dayes since, (saith he) you condemned a Christian maid to be rather prostituted to an infamous corrupter of her chastity, than to be exposed to the rage of a Lyon; you acknowledge ~~there is no punishment nor kind of death, which is so intolerable to Christians, as the loss of their chastity.~~

Such was the entertainment Christians found in this World, now let us see how far they deserved it, as to their demeanour, and carriage; for there is no need to speak here to the two first objections. "The Heathens (a) believe a man could not make profession of Christianity, without being tainted with all sorts of crimes, without being an Enemy to the gods, to Princes, to the Laws, to good manners, and to nature, and that a Christian could not be acquitted, unlesse he denied himself to be such an one. "But their carriage was so quite contrary to all these surmises, except that concerning the worship of Heathenish vanities, or Devils, under the name of gods, that they onely were the servants of the true God, they onely were free from all sorts of crimes, were the best friends and Subjects of Princes, of the Laws, good manners, and nature, and truly affirming themselves Christians, might justly in this respect have been acquitted from these accusations. "They (b) assembled together by troops in their prayers to God, as if thereby they would carry by force the grant of whatsoever Prayers were presented to him, this being a violence agreeable to him; they prayed to him for the Empires, their Ministers the Magistrates that had the exercise of their power, for the State, the tranquillity of the Empire, and the retarding of the general dissolution that must put an end to all things. They assembled together to read the Holy Scriptures, and they read them according to the condition of the times; what served either to admonish or confirm the faithful. In effect, the Scriptures nourished their faith, lifted up, and assured the confidence they had in God, nevertheless they ceased not to confirm their discipline by the strength of precepts they continually repeated. In these Assemblies, (saith Tertullian, for the former are also his words) we make exhorta-

blameable demeanour of Christians in their Assemblies.

‘ exhortations and threatnings, and exercise Divine censure, which banisheth ‘ sinners, and excludes them from our Communion : we judge them with very ‘ much circumspection, because we know that God is in the midst of us, and ‘ sees what we do ; and certainly it is a great foretelling of the judgment that ‘ God will one day pronounce against the wicked, when the Church moved ‘ with the enormity of their crimes, darts out upon wilful sinners the Thun-‘ derbolts of excommunication, and deprives them of the participation of it’s ‘ prayers, it’s society, and all sorts of holy commerce with it.

‘ 23. In our assemblies there are Bishops that preside, and have authority over ‘ all the faithful committed to their charge ; they are approved by the suffra‘ ges of them whom they ought to conduct, and it is not bribes that acquire ‘ them this honour, but testimonies given of their good life. For in the ‘ Church of God nothing is done by the allurements of gifts ; if there be ‘ among us any kind of treasure, the money laid up makes our Religion not ‘ ashamed. And every one contributes a little sum at the end of the moneth, ‘ or when he will ; but it is if he will and can ; for none are constrained to ‘ give. If we get any alms it is of good will, riches gathered in this man‘ ner are as the pledges of piety ; we do not confound them in eating and ‘ drinking with excess ; we make not use of them for the foul and loathsome ‘ exercise of gluttony : but we employ them in feeding the poor, burying ‘ them, in comforting poor Orphans, in helping old men who have spent their ‘ best dayes in the service of the faithful, in helping the poor that have lost by ‘ shipwrack what they had, and in assisting them that serve in the mines, are ‘ banished into Islands, or shut up in prisons, because they professe the Reli‘ gion of the true God, that during the time they suffer for the confession of ‘ his name, they may be nourished by the stock of the Church. But it’s a ‘ strange thing, that this charity among us gives occasion to some to blame us.
 ‘ See, say they, how they love one another ; this astonisheth them, because ‘ they hate one another. See say they, how they are ready to die one for ano‘ ther ; but as for them they are ready to kill one another. [A little after :]
 ‘ As we live with the same intelligence, as if we had all but one spirit and one ‘ soul ; we have nothing in particular but our wives, of all things in the ‘ World there is nothing but wives, whereof we reject community ; and on ‘ the contrary, among them of their wives onely there is a community with ‘ other men. [Again] : Now seeing we live together with so much charity, ‘ that all our goods are common, why should they wonder if we make good ‘ cheer ? for it’s one of the excesses you reproach us with ; besides the infam‘ ous crimes whereof you accuse our repasts, you charge it with prodi‘ gality.

24. In the same place : “ But you need but consider the name given to our ‘ repasts, to know the quality thereof. They expresse themselves with the ‘ same word that signifies Love with the Greeks ; whatsoever the cost is that ‘ is made, it is profitable, for they gain alwaies in this expence, because it ‘ hath piety for it’s foundation. Its a sweetnesse wherewith we comfort the ‘ want of the poor, but we do not treat them as you those infamous gluttons, ‘ who glory in selling you their liberty for the price of their good bits, where‘ with they fill their bellies in the midst of a thousand indignities. But we ‘ will have the least served with our goods, because they we know, amongst ‘ all men, are the most acceptable unto God. Then seeing our feasts have so ‘ honest an end, consider what our discipline should be in the rest of our acti‘ ons, even those which more concern the duties of Religion ; it permits no‘ thing that is dishonourable, nor far from modesty. Before we go to table
 ‘ we are fed with heavenly meat, which is the Prayer we make to God ; we ‘ eat as much as is necessary to satisfy one’s appetite, we drink as much as is ‘ permitted to persons that have a care of their purity. They that sit there, take ‘ their refection with so much temperance, as they may remember they are ‘ obliged to worship God even at night. They entertain one another as People ‘ that know God hears what they say. After the repast done, they have washed ‘ their hands, and lighted the candles, they are invited to praise God and sing Psalms

As down.

‘Psalms taken out of the holy Scripture, or Hymns every one composeth according to the capacity of his mind. By this it may be known, if they have committed any excess at table; as the repast began with Prayer, so it ends; they go forth not in divers troops to defile their hands with the blood of men, nor in several bands running in the streets, nor to do insolencies; but with the same care they had in coming in, preserve their modesty and chastity.

‘25. Finally, Christians retire with so much stayednesse, that we may very well see they are not fed so much with corporal meats as the substance of heavenly and holy discipline. Certainly, it were but reason that this society of the Christians should be reputed unlawful, if it were like to that the Laws forbid; it were but good reason it should be condemned, if it were not different to that which deserves to be condemned; if one would reproach it with the same things wherewith they accuse factious societies. But tell me, Did we ever assemble to procure the hurt of any one? we are the same in a body, as when separated: as we are in particular, so we are in general: that is to say, in whatsoever estate we are found, we injure no body; when any virtuous or godly People are associated, when any pious or chaste persons assemble together, their union should not be called a faction, but a lawful society. Thus Tertullian, to whose words, as to the harmlesse carriage of the Christians in their Assemblies, Apostates witnessed, as appeareth from what Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan. As for the crimes supposed to be committed by them, they ever challenged any witnesse to be produced of them, and sufficiently confute the vain reports in their Apologies. They laughed at the fiction of the Asles head, and such like stuff, and as for worshipping Crosses, Octavius in his answer to Cecilium saith, Crucis etiam nec colimus nec optamus. Crosses we neither worship nor wish for. Neither did they meet for seditious ends, as for the alteration of Governments, destruction of Princes, or changing of Magistrates. Though they rather than any of late time might pretend to Saintship, yet did they not make it an advantage to raise themselves; whereby they laid no claim to the riches, power, or dominion of the World; they did not hold that temporal dominion was founded in grace, nor that the true and spiritual Kingdom of Jesus Christ destroyed the right and interest of earthly Princes. They made no insurrections, covered on rebellious designs with the name of Religion, neither did by violence attempt a reformation; although they were so many thousands, as in all probability they might have born down all before them; though they filled all places, consisted of all degrees, and hereby shared in all interests, in power and intelligence, and by their combinations might have taken their opportunities, and easily by force of arms made way for their designs; yet obedience to their Princes they ever held most inviolable by the Principles of their Religion, and made use of no other weapons than prayers and tears, though for their own safety and preservation. Hear to this purpose what challenges Tertullian makes to such, as if he had not had truth on his side, would have been sufficiently ready to instance wherein the Christians offended, which they yet never adventured to do.

‘26. In the midst of all these outrages have you observed that these People, who (as you think) have framed so strange a conspiracy, and on the other side might be animated enough for revenge, by the punishments wherewith you take away their lives, endeavoured any thing against you to resent the evil treating they have received? Think you that they want an occasion? Tertul. Apolog. c. 37. when in one night onely a small number of torches would be enough to satisfy their Revenge, if with us it were permitted to render evil for evil; but God forbid we should do so. A Religion that is all divine, ought not to revenge by the instigation of men, and must not think it strange to suffer that which is made use of to prove them. If we would declare against you as open, rather than pursue you as secret Enemies, might we not have forces and troops enough? It may be the Moors and Marcomanns, the Pavthians, or whatsoever People they are shut up in the bounds of the Country they inhabit,

inhabit, make a greater number of men than they that are spread throughout all the Universe, and have no other limits than that of the World. Our Religion is but of late, and we fill already all that your power acknowledgeth, Cities, Fortresses, Isles, Provinces, the Assemblies of the People, the Armies also, the wards and tents of Rome, the Palace, the Senate, and the Publick places; Finally, we leave you but the Temples. What Wars were we not able to undertake? with what readinesse might we not arm our selves, although we should be the weaker? we that suffer our selves so willingly to be killed, if in our Religion it were not rather lawful to let our selves be killed than to kill others, we could also make War against you without taking up arms, by casting our selves into a revolt; it were enough not to live with you, and to separate our selves, our divorce would print shame in your foreheads. For if Christians, who make so great a multitude of all sorts of persons, should abandon you to retire unto some Country of the World dispersed from all society; truly the losse of so many Citizens, of what condition soever, would disparage your Government, and also our retreat would be a rude punishment to you; without doubt this solitude that would remain with you, this silence of all things, this general astonishment of nature, even as if all the world were dead, would frighten you; you might go seek Subjects to command, there would remain to you more Enemies than Citizens: now you have more Citizens than Enemies, because there are a greater number of Christians among you.

27. Thus we see their peaceable demeanour, how their minds stood affected towards their Princes, let Tertullian also inform us. 'As for us, in the prayers we make for the Emperours, we call upon the eternal God, the true God, the living God, &c. [In the same place:] It is to him to whom we Christians addresse our prayers, make them with hands opened and lifted up, because innocent; the head bare, because no cause to be ashamed when we pray to God. There are none tellerth us the words we are to say, because it is our heart that acteth rather than our tongue. We pray for all the Emperours, and ask of God that he would give them a long life, that their Empire enjoy a profound Peace, their house happy concord, their Armies be innumerable, themselves assisted with good Councils, the People remain in their duties, no trouble arise in the World against their authority. In conclusion, we forget nothing the Prince can wish for, either as a man or as an Emperour. [A little after:] Whilst we implore the grace of God for the Emperours with our hands lifted up, and stretched towards Heaven, let irons pierce us, let us be put on gibbets and crosses, fires consume us, knives cut our throats, beasts devour us: A Christian while in prayer lifting up his hands to God, is in a condition fit to receive all sorts of punishment; and therefore continue O Magistrates so affected to Justice; ravish our Souls whilst they are in prayers for the welfare of the Emperours, and make a crime of Truth and the Service of God. [In the following Chapter] We intreat them who believe our Religion takes no care of the preservation of the Emperours, to examine the Laws of our God, to read our Books which we hide not, and which by divers accidents fall into other hands than ours. They will learn there, that it is commanded by a superabundant charity, to pray to God for our Enemies, and to wish good to them that persecute us. Now have we greater Enemies, and ruder persecutors, than those who make offended Majesty the ground of the crime they impute unto us? Holy Scriptures content not themselves with this commandment, they have another more precise and clearer. Pray, say they, for Kings, Princes, and Powers, that you may live in peace in the midst of publick tranquillity. [In another place:] But why should I stay longer in making known with what sence of Religion and Piety Christians honour Emperours? It sufficeth to say, we are obliged to render them our duties, as to whom our Master hath commanded us so to do.

Chap. 32.

28. As these Primitive Saints were good Christians in the exercise of their Religion, and dutiful Subjects towards their Princes, so also good men, free from from vice, and adorned with Virtues; or if any were noted to be of contrary practice they were disowned, and the Censures of the Church cut them off from it's society. "We speak as boldly (saith Tertullian) of the Christians you put to death, for we have an unreprieveable testimony of their integrity, which we take also from your Registers. You who are employed every day in judging those that are kept in prisons, and who terminate their processes by the sentences you give against them, of all the malefactors accused before you of so many sorts of crimes, is there any of them charged with Murther, Robbery, Sacrilege, and other faults, to whom they impute also that he is a Christian? either, when Christians are presented to be punished as Criminals, because they are Christians, is there any amongst them whose life is like that of other prisoners? all the Malefactors wherewith your prisons are so filled, that they are overcharged, are of your Religion; they are also of your Religion that make the Mines grone under the weight of their strokes, they are the wretched creatures of the same Religion you are, wherewith the wild beasts fill their bellies. All those poor Criminals which your Citizens keep to make them cruelly kill one another before a bloody people, have the same opinion you have of the Deity. Finally, among all those wretched creatures there's not one Christian, unlesse he be charged by justice, because of his name Christian: Or if there be a Christian found attainted of the same crime, he hath no more the name Christian, because he hath lost that divine quality in losing his innocency. [Elsewhere:] But some will say, even among us there are a people that give themselves the liberty of doing evil, that free themselves from subjection to our Laws, from any what ever exact observation of what is legally commanded by us. It is true there are some such, but so soon as they fall into this disorder, we hold them no more for Christians. The fear of God, and purity of his precepts constrained them to this holy demeanour; for opinion of men and their rules, as this our Author observeth, cannot reach the heart, nor procure that Virtue which is truly good. "The admirable fruits their doctrine produced (the knowledge wherof became publick by the commerce they had in the World) made so down-right a conflict with rude incredulity, that to defend herself she was forced to say, that their profession had no Divine matter in it, but was only a Sect of Philosophy, that obliged Christians to rank themselves there in the exercise of Moral Virtues.

Chap. 44.

Chap. 46.

And good men.

They were eminent for love and unity of affection.

29. Though there was some diversity of opinions amongst them, yet as we shewed before, they maintained mutual Love; and that herein they were highly eminent as to all pious effects, is already evident. Origen in his Work against Celsus (wherein he especially answereth to cavils raised against the Author and Doctrin of Christian Religion) takes off that prejudice that might arise from diversity of opinions, by a comparison of this difference with the numerous (or rather innumerable) Sects of Heathen Philosophers. Tertullian layeth the great guilt of Heresie upon such, who being animated with the spirit of Philosophy, infected the purity of the Gospel with the corruption of their own opinions. In the same place he acquainteth us what was the Primitive touch-stone of Doctrines most worthy now to be considered. "These People (saith he) that are separated from us have violated the Faith of Jesus Christ, and we beat down their errors by this onely exception, that the true rule of Truth is, that which hath been taught by our Master, and transmitted to us by those holy persons, who had the happinesse to hear his Word, and receive his Divine Institutions; we shall shew in another place, that all which is not conformable to this rule, hath been invented by new Doctors, who came not till after the blessed companions of the Sonne of God.

Apologi. c. 47.

They forced Devils out of bodies, and to confesse the truth.

30. All these excellent qualities in those holy persons, might have sufficed to stop the mouths of Calumniators, and had weight sufficient to have moved the minds of all men to the truth. But that Victory which Christians obtained over Devils, might much more have convinced them of the power which was superiour to that of their false Gods. " Christians were wont to drive away these Devils from the bodies of men, forced them to confesse that they were no other than Devils, and that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and his way the true Religion. [As to the former, first hear Terullian:] But if we were not near you, who would snatch you away from these secret Enemies, whose malignant operations make so strange a confusion in your minds, and so horrible an alteration of your healths? I have heard speak of the possession of Devils, wherewith you are tormented, from whence we deliver you freely, and without reward; if we had the spirit of Revenge, it were enough to satisfie us, that these corrupted spirits might at all times seize on your bodies, and that entrance therein were alwayes open to them. But as you do not think of that you ought, viz. so dear a protection, you cease not to declare a People to be your Enemies, who do you no hurt, whose assistance is so absolutely necessary for you. It is true, we are Enemies, yet not of men but of their errors. [In another place:] As for Devils or Genies, we are wont to conjure them, to drive them away from the bodies of men, whereof they are seized, and render them not the honours due to God only, by swearing by them. [Justin Martyr in his fifth Apology:] Δαίμονιοι ἵπταται γὰρ πολλὰς, &c. For many possessed with Devils throughout the World, and this your City, whom many Exorcists, Inchanters, and Conjurers could not cure, Many of our men through the name of Jesus Christ crucified under Pomius Pilate have healed, and now also do heal, disarming and driving out of men those Devils that had possessed them. [In his Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew:] Κατὰ γὰρ τὸ ὀνόματι τοῦ, &c. For in the name of this the Son of God, the first-born of every creature, and born of a Virgin, and made a man subject to suffering, and crucified by your people under Pomius Pilate, who died, arose from the dead, and ascended into Heaven, every Devil adjured is overcome and subdued. [In another place of this Apology:] And now we who believe in Jesus Christ our Lord crucified under Pomius Pilate, adjuring all Devils and malignant spirits, have them subject under our power. He affirmeth the same thing in other places.

21. That Christians constrained Devils to confesse themselves such, and to acknowledge the truth of the Gospel, in this matter hear also Terullian: " If a man should bring before your tribunals one that were truly possessed of a Devil, if a Christian should command him to speak, this wicked spirit will confesse that he is a Devil, with as much truth as he saith falsely at another time he is a god. Let them present any one of these they believe to be wrought upon within by a deity; that in the ceremony of the Sacrifices they offer on the altars have the virtue of a God, in sending the smell which goes out of the Sacrifices; who with force belch out words out of their stomachs; within breathing declare Oracles; if this heavenly Virgin that promiseth rain; if this Æsculapius who reacheth the secrets of Physick, who preserves the lives of them that must lose the same soon after, confesse not by the mouths of these Impostors, the feigned inspirations of whom deceive the World, that they are but Devils, if the presence of a Christian takes not from them the boldnesse of lying, we are willing, that in the same place you shed the blood of this Christian, and punish him as a wicked person. [In the same Chapter:] Now seeing by our means your gods discover to you that they are no gods, and that all the other to whom men erect altars are none in like manner; but this at the same time they make you know, who the true God is, if it be this onely God whom we that are Christians worship, if we must believe of him what the Christians believe, if he must be served as their Laws ordain. When you conjure your gods in the name of Jesus Christ, do they ask who is that Jesus Christ? do they call the History of his life a fable? do they say he is a man of the same education as other men? that he was a Magician? that after he was dead, his disciples took away his body privately from the Sepulcher? and that he is now in Hell? say they not rather, he is in Heaven? that he must descend to the terror

'terror of all the World? with horreur to the Universe? with the lamentation of all men but Christians? and that he shall come down on the Earth full of Majesty, as the Virtue of God, the Spirit of God, the Word, Wisdom, Reason, and the Son of God?

Whence they had this strength against them.

32. Whence Christians came to be so strong, as to wrest these confessions from them, hear him in the same place. "Now all the power we have of them, is the name of Jesus Christ who gives it us, it is the threatening we give them of the evils God is ready to pour on their heads, and which one day Jesus Christ must declare unto them. As they fear Jesus Christ in God, and God in Jesus Christ, they are under the Government of the servants of God and of Jesus Christ: so by the onely touch of our hands, and breath of our mouthes, the Devils seized with fear at the sight of the flames that environ them are forced to obey us, to come out of the bodies they possesse, in despite of them, and with murmuring to suffer this shame in our presence. You that are wont to believe them when they lie, believe them when they speak of themselves. None will tell a lye to get shame by it, but rather to gain honour; one will sooner believe them that confesse against their own interest, than those that denie to their advantage. These testimonies which we have of your gods make men to be Christians; for we cannot give a full belief to what they say, without believing in Jesus Christ our Master. Your gods kindle in our hearts the Faith which the holy Scripture teacheth us, they strengthen our hope, and confirm us in the assurance we have of our Salvation. As for you, to honour them, you offer them also the blood of Christians; and if it were permitted them to lie when Christians inter-rogate them, and labour to make you know the truth by their confession, they would take good heed of discovering your errors to you, as well for keeping the profit they have of them, and the honours you render them, as for the fear they might have, that in becomming your selves Christians, you drive them away as we do, from the bodies they torment with so much rage. [In the beginning of the following Chapter:] "We need nothing but the acknowledgement we have from your gods, when we make them confesse they are no gods, and when they answer us, there is no other God than the onely God we serve, to purge us from the crimes of high-treason and impiety to the Roman Religion."

33. No wonder then that these impure Spirits enraged at Christians, sought all manner of wayes to destroy them. But yet in their deaths they overcame them, and in all sorts of indignities and tortures triumphed over their implacable adversaries; for The blood of the Martyrs was the seed of the Church. That this was so indeed, Tertullian also informeth us, the veracity of whom, as to these things alleged is unquestionable, because appealing to his adversaries, he must needs in behalf of his cause produce such things as were most certain: the contrary whereof would have Apologized sufficiently for what he laboured to confute. We shall with the last words of his excellent Apology conclude this most delightful Subject. "But do what you please, all inventions the most exquisite cruelty can advise you unto are to no purpose; so far are they from profiting you, that contrarily they draw all the World to our Religion. The oftner you make an harvest of the Christians, the oftner their number increaseth: their blood is a seed which dies not on the earth, but puts forth prosperously. Many among you have laboured to perswade men to suffer constantly pain and death, (as Cicero in his Tusculans, Seneca in his Treatise against casual things, Diogenes, Pyrrhon, and Callinicus) but Christians have better taught constancy, by the examples they have given, in supporting patiently so many evils, than all the Philosophers with all their discourses. This same obstinacy, wherewith you reproach us, is an excellent mistresse of truth which we believe: for who is there not that striveth with contemplation to seek what it is? who after his search made, comes not on our side? who having imbraced the Faith of Jesus Christ, desires not to suffer for him, that by his sufferings he may get the infinite treasures of the grace of God, and that in the price of his blood,

They triumphed over their enemies in their very sufferings.

‘they may obtain the pardon of their faults; for the remission of all our sins, ‘is the assured recompence of our punishments. This is the reason that when ‘they read your sentences of death unto us, we render you thanks; because ‘by an happy emulation that meets between the Judgements of God, and the ‘judgement of men, at the same instant when you condemn us here below,

34. The Soldiers being at a stand after the murder of Antoninus Bassianus, were without an Emperour for two dayes. Then hearing that Artabanus, the Parthian, was coming to revenge the injury offered to him, they made choice of Ardentius one of their principal Officers, but he excused himself by his age, and the dignity was conferred on Macrinus, by the especial indeavour of the Tribunes, who alone were conscious of the fact towards Antoninus. He gave battel to Artabanus, and made incredible slaughter of men for two dayes, during which time, the Parthian knew nothing of his Enemies death, but on the next day being certified thereof by Macrinus, he received the Captives with the spoil taken in his Country, and making a League with the Roman Emperour, departed into his own Kingdom: Macrinus returning to Antioch, by letters gave the Senate an account of his succeſſe, and endeavouring to remove all prejudice which might arise from the obscurity of his birth, promised to rule with as much moderation as any. He was cheerfully owned, not so much out of respect to himself, as hatred towards his Predecessor. During the time he reigned, things were well reformed; but lying idle at Antioch, he gave up himself to pleasures, and keeping there the Soldiers against their inclination, thereby drew contempt and hatred upon himself, which wrought his destruction.

35. Mesa a Phœnician, sister to Julia the wife of Severus, had two daughters, Soamis and Mammaea. The former had a son named Bassianus fourteen years old, and the later one called Alexianus two years younger. Both these boyes were Priests of the Sun, in the Phœnician language called Heliogabalus, and the elder being the chief, was also a youth of an excellent beauty, and for it was very much admired by the Roman Soldiers. Their Grandmother Mesa hereat took occasion to affirm (whether truly or otherwise) that they were both the sons of Antoninus, who had been familiar with both her daughters, dwelling with her under the same roof. Having got great store of wealth by living at Court in her sisters time, she promised large sums to the Soldiers, in case the Empire could be devolved upon one of them. The Soldiers gladly closing with her offer, received them into their Camp; which Macrinus hearing of, neglected it, onely he sent Julianus with a party against the Revolters; but this party allured with the sight of the boy and money together, cut off their Captains head, and sending it back to Macrinus, were also received into the Camp. After this a battel was fought in the confines of Syria and Phœnicia, wherein Macrinus having the worst fled towards Italy, but was taken at Chalcedon, where he fell sick of his journey, and his head was struck off after he had reigned about fourteen moneths. He was more sharp towards his Soldiers than was suitable to his condition, being otherwise also very severe, so as he burnt Adulterers quick with their bodies joyned together. He was slain in the 54 year of his age, together with his son Diadumenianus, to whom he had given the title of Cæsar.

Heliogabalus.

36. Antoninus Heliogabalus succeeding Macrinus, continued still in his Office of Priest, wearing the ornaments belonging to it, and dancing continually in that Antick habit. He gave up himself to all filchinesse, luxury, and uncleannesse, and killed many that talked against his courses. He married the Image of Pallas (which never had seen light, except when the City was burnt, since its bringing from Troy) unto his god, as also that of Urania (by which the Africans meant the Moon) reported to be brought out of Phœnicia by Dido. He built a sumptuous Temple for his god, who was brought into it in a charior adorned with gold and precious stones, the Priest himself leading the horses, and going backward all the way. He painted his face though he had much natural beauty, wore Pearls in his shoes, never supped under the rate of thirty pounds, was drawn by Dogs in a Chariot up and down the Palace, always sat either amongst Flowers or sweet Odours, and when he journeyed had no less than 600 Carriages in his train. Being told by the Syrian Priests that he should die a violent death, he provided silken Halters, Golden Knives, and a Turret floored with Gold and Pearl, saying, his death should be costly and luxurious, that it might be said, No man died in such a sort. Of his mother he was so fond, that he would do nothing without her, and carried her with him into the Senate-house. But these courses occasioned the ruine of them both.

37. His Grand-mother fearing these courses would bring him into contempt with the Soldiers, prevailed with him, though otherwise heady enough, to adopt Alexianus his Cousin German, that all might not miscarry together with him. She persuaded him to it, by shewing how hereby he might provide for his pleasures and attendance on his God, the other taking care of State affairs. He sought to train up Alexianus, now called Alexander, in his own way, and Mammaea having provided him Tutors, able men to bring him up in good literature, he either put to death or banished the chief of them, as corrupting his son. He preferred none but Players to publick Dignities, and gave the governments of Provinces to the filchiest amongst his slaves. By these things he drew more and more upon him the hatred of the Soldiers, who all inclined to Alexander as a youth of good hope, who also had money from his mother for a bait, without which all had been nothing. Antoninus knowing this, endeavoured all wayes to poison him, and this succeeding not, he gave out he was dead, to see how the Soldiers would take it, who hereupon mutined. To appease them, he took him along with him in a Chariot beautified with Pearl and Gold to the Camp. Here was Alexander saluted and honoured alone, no respect being given to Heliogabalus, who being incensed thereat, went about to animadvert upon such as made acclamations; but the Soldiers catching at this advantage, slew him, together with his mother, and those that accompanied him, their two bodies being tumbled up and down the streets were at length cast into Tiber. He thus died having lived 18 years, and reigned five; A.V.C. 975. A.D. 222.

38. Alexander then was received as Emperour, and ruled with great moderation and clemency, being kept from ill company by Mammaea his mother, and otherwise of his own inclination abhorring blood, so that in all his time not any one was put to death innocent and unheard. He carried himself with great courtesie towards all; nay, Camillus attempting new matters, he onely thanked that he was willing to receive that burthen which good men refused. His saying was, Quod tibi fieri non vis alteri ne feceris. What thou wouldst not have done to thy self, do not to another. Although the peace which Marcus had made with the Parthians was disgracefull to the Roman Empire, yet it pleased not the Parthians, who thought the perfidiousness of Bassianus deserved much greater punishment. Thence arose dissatisfaction, contempt, and hatred amongst the subjects of Artabanus, the issue whereof was, that Artaxares or Artaxerxes stirred up the Persians to the recovery of their ancient honour, and translated the Kingdom from Artabanus, and the Parthians, upon himself, in the fourth year of this Alexander, 538 years after Alexander the Great, or rather in the 538 year of the Selencide. Not content herewith, he sent to Alexander to demand whatsoever the Romans had taken from the Persians, and having a great ambition to recover what ever had belonged to that Empire, invaded Mesopotamia, giving out he would reduce all Asia unto his power. Alexander was constrained to march against him, and so repelled and weakened him, though with great losse of his own men, that for divers years no more was heard of him. By his Lieutenants he prospered in the Wars of Mauritiana, Illyricum, and Armenia, but being called for against the Germans who wasted Gall, either because he was despised for want of success in this expedition, for his severity, or rather for that the Soldiers loved to fish in troubled waters, he was traiterously murdered, together with his mother, ther, and Maximinus was set up in his stead. Mammaea his mother was first instructed in Christian Religion by Origen, whom she called to her at Antioch, but afterwards learnt of the Gnosticks, 1. Openly to deny what she privately owned, and 2. to keep, and worship images of Christ. She instructed her son in the same Doctrine, who would have made a Temple for Christ, but was prohibited saith Lampadius; that is, would have made one if he could have done it with the good will of the Romans. Ulpian the great Lawyer was his chief Justice, and was slain by the Soldiers. Paulus also, Pomponius, and Modestinus flourished in his time, which abounded with able men of this profession. Alexander was slain in Gall near Moguntiacum, on the fourth before the Nones of October, having lived 29 years, and reigned 13. A.V.C. 988. A.D. 235. *L. 39. Maximinus by whose procurement Alexander was muredred, was born in Thrace, his father being a Goth, and his mother an Alane. Being at first an Herds-man, he was for the vastnesse of his body made a Soldier, and by degrees was preferred in the Army. He had been set over the new raised Soldiers, to train, and exercise them; and by his great valour, and enduring all labour and toil together with them, procured their favour, and hereby his own rise. As he was a man of stupendous bulk and proportionable diet, so also of avarice and cruelty, to the later whereof he was the more provoked by a conspiracy or two, which were discovered ere they took effect. He overthrew the Germans, and wasted their Countrey, threatening also to subdue all the Northern Nations as far as the Ocean, and had his other carriage been answerable to his valour, he might have enjoyed time and opportunity for the performance of much. This occasion of revolt from him was first given in Africk by his Officer at Carthage, whose rapacity so far incensed certain young men, that they killed him, and compelled Gordianus the Proconsul to take upon him the Purple, who being of the age of 80 years, was joyfully owned both by Senate and People. But he going about to revenge private injuries, destroyed himself, by confining Capellianus who governed Mauritiana to come upon him with an Army, wherewith being worsted he hanged himself, his son having perished in the fight at the age of 46. They scarcely enjoyed the title 36 dayes.

The Senate, that they might have some to oppose against Maximinus, chose two Emperors, Maximus and Balbinus; but the people not being satisfied therewith, and being desirous to have a Prince out of the stock of Gordianus, they gave the title of Cesar to Gordianus his Grandson by his daughter, a boy of 13 years of age. A little after it hapned that two old Soldiers vvhich had belonged to Maximinus going to the Senate-house to hearken for news, vvere slain by two Senators, vvhich thing raising a great tumult, the Soldiers in Town set the Citie on fire, vvhereby a great part of it vvas burnt down, and got them to their Camp. Balbinus vvas appointed to take care of Rome, and Maximus went into Italy to raise forces against Maximinus, vvho now marched fast for Rome. Finding no resistance at the Alpes, he accounted himself most sure of victory, but found so much at Aquileia as stopped his journey; for the Inhabitants furnished by the commodiousnesse of the place vvith all sorts of Provisions most stoutly defended themselves. They threw down so much scalding Pitch and Sulphur upon his Soldiers, that they vvvere not able to continue the storms, and the vvomen, 'tis said, cut the hair from their heads to make Provision for bovv-strings. 41. Now to our continuation of Ecclesiastical matters. In the first year of Alexander or the last of Heliogabalus, the day preceding the Ides of October, Callistus Bishop of Rome was crowned with Martyrdom. The Sea was vacant six dayes, and then succeeded Urbanus the seventeenth Bishop, according to Damasus, on the twentieth of October, and first Feria. In the tenth of Alexander, on the eighth before the Calends of June died Urbanus. The Sea was vacant thirty dayes, and then Pontianus succeeded on the eighth before the Calends of July, the sixth Feria. In the first of Maximinus, Pontianus being banished into the Island Sardinia, there died on the thirteenth of the Calends of December, and Antherus succeeded him, who in the year following on the third of the Nones of January was crowned with Martyrdom, because he had diligently gathered an History of the Martyrs, and laid it up in the Church. The seat was vacant thirteen dayes, and then was Fabianus elected on the seventeenth of January, and the first Feria, being the twentieth Bishop of Rome, according to Damasus. And about the eleventh year of Alexander, Heraclas who once was Origen's Usher in the School of Alexandria was Bishop of that Sea, where he continued sixteen years. Damasus. Euseb.

CHAP. VI.

From the death of Maximinus the first created Emperour without consent of the Senate, to the Monarchy of Constantine the first Christian Emperour, who reformed Religion, and translated the Imperial seat to Byzantium, the space of 86 years.

I. THE news of Maximinus his death being brought to Rome, filled the City with extraordinary joy, having taken Maximus as he was lifting men in Italy, who thereupon went to Aquileia, and received the Army, to which he pardoned all things past. Then returned he to Rome, where he and his Colleague managed matters with discretion enough, could they have agreed betwixt themselves; but the one being jealous of the other, and both endeavouring to grapple all the power into their own hands, thereby wrought to themselves sodain destruction. The Pratorian bands hated them both, as created by the Senate, and resolved for the removal of such an indignity offered to the Army, to make them away, which Maximus understanding, would have sent for the Guard of Germans, which he knew both to be faithful to him, and able to resist the power of the other; but Balbinus suspecting that he intended something against himself, would not suffer it; and so the Soldiers entering the Palace haled them out, and after all sorts of indignities offered to their persons, upon report that the Germans were coming, slew them both. Now knowing no fit person whom they might prefer, and being assured it would be very acceptable to the People, they made choice of Gordianus, who had been formerly made Cesar. At his beginning so great an Eclipse of the Sun happened (April 2. on the second Feria, as Cappellus agreeth with Mulierus) that the day seemed to be turned into night, and nothing could be done in houses without candles. Sabinianus in Africk attempted new matters, but was slain. Gordianus being ver very young undertook an Expedition against the Persians, over whom Sapores in his third year began to reign, having succeeded Artaxerxes their first King. By the good conduct of Misibheus his Father-in-Law he prospered very well, but he being being slain or made away, the Soldiers not enduring the rawnesse of Goraiamus, transferred the Sovereignty unto Philip, and killed him, after he had reigned six years. Its observed, that all those nine that slew him perished by their own hands, their own swords, and the very same with which they destroyed him.

M. Julius Philippus.

2. M. Julius Philippus was by birth an Arabian of Trachonitis, his Father being a notable Captain of thieves in that Country. He made his son partaker with him in the Imperial dignity. In his fourth year fell out the the 1000th of Rome, which was celebrated with great pomp, and all manner of Games, from April 21 to April 21 of the following year. Eusebius reports of him, that he was the first Christian Emperour, and that being desirous to joyn with the multitude in the Ecclesiastical Prayers, he could not be admitted till he had first rendred an account of his Faith, and joyned himself with such, as for their sins were examined, and set in the place of penitents, therefore because he was faulty in many things, saith the Historian, he willingly obeyed, and declared by his works his sincere and religious mind towards God. The Martyrologies will have him and his son converted by occasion of the solemnity of the 1000th year, and being baptized by Fabianus Bishop of Rome, after confession of his sins, to have been admitted to the Communion. But saith Cappellus, if any of this had been true, would the Senate that was so set against the Christians have reckoned him amongst the gods? At least would not Decius have objected this as a crime against him? The Scythians in his time infesting the Empire, he repelled by his Lieutenants. Marinus raising a Commotion in Pannonia, he sent Decius to quiet the Soldiers, who put the purple upon him. Philip then led an Army against this Usurper, and they met at Verona, where the old Emperour was defeated and slain, which news coming to Rome, his son a child of twelve years of age was murdered by the Pratorian bands, after they had reigned about five years.

3. Quintus Trajanus Decius, as Orosius calleth him, was born in Pannonia. According to the custom he assumed his son into participation of the Empr. He quieted at his beginning some motions in Gaul, but raised a great one against the Church, being Author of the seventh Persecution out of hatred to Philip, or as others say, having conspired against Philip, out of hatred to Christianity: by his edicts many were put to most cruel deaths. He received his reward after a short time; for now the Gothes (originally inhabitants Scanzia) invaded Thrace, and other places, both by Land and Sea, because such of them as served in the Wars had been defrauded of their pay. At the desire of the Senate, to which he commended the Commonwealth in his absence, he marched against and overthrew them in several battels (notwithstanding that he lost his son, and Priscus Governour of Philippi revolted) and had perfected his Victory, but that he was betrayed by Gallus Hostilianus Governour of the lower Mesia. He perswaded him to fight in a fenny ground, and then revealed his intencion to the Enemy, by whom he was beset, and was swallowed up in a bog, so as his body could never be found. He was courteous enough to all but Christians, and gave satisfaction to Senate and People. He reigned two years and an half.

4. Vibius Gallus Hostilianus succeeded him, both in his Empire, his malice towards Christians, and his punishment. He clapped up an ignominious Peace with the Gothes, unto whom he promised money, a thing scarcely heard of before amongst the Romans; and this not being long kept, the Gothes and Scythians made incursions into Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, and also into Asia, making great spoils in all places. Many other Nations after their example rebelled, and made havock of the Provinces: the Parthians also peirced into Armenia, and thence expelled Tiridates the King. The Scythians proceeded so furiously, that they seemed to carry all before them, till that Emilianus a Moor, and who commanded the Legions in Pannonia, by promises drew on his Soldiers against them, and so repelled them, that he invaded their Country, for which service he was saluted Emperour by this Army. Gallus hearing of this, went presently against him, but was slain together with Volusian his son and partner in the Empire. Such was the end of him who persecuted the Church of God, and chased away such holy men as praised for his peaceable and prosperous estate. The persecutions of the Christians in the dayes of Decius and Gallus were accompanied or followed with a most grievous Pestilence, which so vehemently raged, that there was scarcely any Province, City or house, but was almost waisted and ruined by it. Gallus and Volusian his son reigned little more than one year.

5. Emilianus enjoyed the dignity not long, for another Army near the Alpes creating Emperour one Valerianus, a man of noble descent, his Soldiers, lest they should incur any danger or trouble killed him after three moneths. Valerianus then taking the Government upon him in Rhætia, the Senate at Rome gave the title of Cæsar to Gallienus his son. He was at first very courteous to the Christians, and so familiarly imbraced them, that his Palace was filled with Professors of the Faith; but afterward, he was persuaded by the Master of the Egyptian Sorcerers to slay them, as Enemies to their Art, and hinderers of it's operation in their presence; so that he raised the eighth Persecution, wherein many perished. But God avenged the cause of his Saints upon him; for going against Sapores the King of the Persians, he was taken prisoner, and could not be released, notwithstanding the intercession of the Persian's confederates, who alleged, that the Romans the more they were overcome, the more vehemently they ever resisted. Sapores kept and used him as a stool to tread on when he got on horse-back, and at length pulling his skin over his ears, tortured him to death. Gallienus his son who all this time had reigned with him terrified hereat, stopped the Persecution of the Christians; but many of the Romans who had been the instruments of the Emperours cruelty, being to be punished as well as he, many Nations fell like a flood upon the Roman Empire, Gallienus giving up himself to all wantonnesse and luxury. The Germans over-running Rhætia and part of Italy, came as far as Ravenna, the Allemans also wasting Gall peirced into Italy. Greece, Macedonia, Pontus, and Asia, were overwhelmed with an inundation of the Goths and Scythians. Dacia beyond Danubius was perpetually lost, the Quadi and Sarmatæ seized on Pannonia, and the Parthians having got into their hands Mesopotamia, made incursions into Syria.

6. Gallienus neglected these motions, answering alwaies concerning these matters, as if notwithstanding them the Empire might flourish and so well enough. He thus little minding the Commonwealth, the Soldiers almost in all places chose them Emperours; so that at this time there were no lesse than thirty Tyrants. The most notable of these upstarts was Posthumus, who reigned in Gall with great commendation ten years; he used much moderation, expelled the Enemies, and recovered Provinces. All those thirty fell at length, either fighting with one another, or with the Emperour. But Gallienus at last, being contemned, was slain, having reigned six years together with his father, and nine by himself, A. V. C. 1021. A. D. 268. His Successor was Flavius Claudius a Dalmatian born, according to his own desire, and the will of the Senate, who killing of the Goths and other Barbarians to the number of 330000 men, and sinking 2000 Vessels, the Senate decreed him a Golden Shield to be set up in the Court, and a Statue in the Capitol; but to the great losse of the Commonwealth he was slain at Syracum, when he had scarcely reigned two years. Into his place was advanced Aurelius Quintillus his brother, an excellent person; but being too good, they that set him up pulled him down, because they could not bear his gravity and strictnesse, killing him the seventeenth day after at Aquileia. Then reigned Valerius Aurelianus, born either at Syracum or some place in Dacia, of mean parentage. Being by Claudius appointed to drive the Goths out of Thrace, he was after his death saluted Emperour. He was an excellent Soldier, and restored the Empire well nigh to it's former bounds. He drove out the Goths from about Danubius; then returning to Rome, and there punishing some Seditious persons, he marched into the East, to reduce those parts to their former obedience.

7. In the dayes of Gallienus, the Persians having subdued Mesopotamia, and invaded Syria, One Odenatus an inhabitant of Palmyra, a Citie of this Countrey, gathering together a company of Boors, fell upon them, and so ordered his affairs, that he beat them out of Syria, recovered Mesopotamia, and incamped before Ctesiphon the Metropolis. Being slain after this Conquest, Zenobia his wife in right of her Children kept possession of the East together with Egypt. Aurelianus now going against her, in his way, in Illyricum, Thrace, and other places, defeated such Enemies as he met, and then entring Syria, after some trouble and danger, overthrew, and took the Queen her self near Antioch, and then recovered all her Dominions. But after his departure the Inhabitants of Palmyra killed his Garrison and revolted, which calling him back, he destroyed both the Citie and them therein, sparing neither Sex nor age; and after this recovered Egypt. Then returning into the West, he bent his endeavours against Tetricus, who reigned in Gall. Tetricus being vexed by his Seditious Soldiers, desired him, whom he termed Invincible, to rescue him from such evils, and betrayed his Army into his hands. Valerian growing proud upon such successe, first of all Romans set a Diadem on his head, and adorned himself with Gold and Pearl. He began also to persecute the Christians; but undertaking a War against the Persians, he was slain betwixt Byzantium and Heraclea, through the malice of his Secretary, in the sixth year of his reign. In his first year, Hormisdas the third Persian King began his reign, which lasted but one year. Him succeeded Varane, and reigned three years, and him followed Narse who continued 28. In his first year also died Plotinus the Platonist, who deriding all religion, perished through the just judgement of God by a filthy and painfull disease, although he had chosen a pleasant and wholefom place wherein to live in Campania. Now also flourished Porphyrius his Scholar, who of a Christian became a great Enemy to Christianity, and wrote 15 books against it, to which Eusebius answered in 30. of which 20 were extant in the time of Jerome, but at this day not one.

8. There was an inter-regnum after the death of Valerian for 8 moneths, the Senate and Army straining courtesie the one with the other, at length the Senate made choice of Tacitus, a man of Consular Dignity, who in his sixth moneth died of a Feaver at Tarsus. The Senate desired him, that in case he should die presently, he would not leave his Children his Successors, but some man of approved worth and valour, as the necessity of the State required. This man was Probus; yet notwithstanding Florianus the brother of Tacitus invaded the Empire, but was cut off by Probus near Tarsus, within the space of two or three moneths. Probus unwillingly receiving the burthen upon him, managed the Government with great commendation. He recovered Gall out of the hand of the Francones a people of Germany, which now first seized on it, after many bloody battels, and after this was engaged in Civil Wars. For Saturninus was saluted Emperour in Egypt, who was overthrown also, and killed also against his mind, and the same successe he had against Proculus in Gall and Bonofus a Britain born. He overthrew the Sarmatians, subdued several barbarous Nations about Thrace by the terour of his name onely, quieted all Asia, and forced the Parthian King to desire peace, which he granted. Returning afterward into Thrace, he planted several barbarous people within the Roman Empire, whereof some revolting, he chastized and reduced them. Now all things flourished exceedingly through peace and security, which made him something slight the Soldiers, who thereupon, as he was marching through Illyricum against the Persians, murdered him at Syrmius, though he fled for safety into a fortified Tower. That saying undid him, Si vixero non opus erit amplius Romano Imperio militibus, a speech of great despair for the Soldiers. Witty and sharp speeches fallen from Princes have often given fire to Seditions. Surely, saith the most learned Viscount of St. Albans, Princes had need in tender matters, and sick-

Carus.

9. M. Aurelius Carus, of the Province of Narbon in Gall, succeeded him, who, when he had created Casars his two sons, Carinus and Numerianus, restrained the Sarmatians, that upon the death of Probus threatened Italy: But going against the Persians, after he had recovered Mesopotamia, and taken the two noble Cities of Parthia, Ctesiphon, and Cochis, he was slain by a Thunder-bolt in his Tent near to the River Tigris. Of his two sons, Numerianus was with him, and Carinus was left behind to look to Gall. Numerianus returning out of the East as Conquerour, and lying sick in his Litter, was killed by Atrius Aper his father-in-law, who gaped after the Empire. Scarcely after some dayes was this wickednesse detected by the stench of the Carcase, and then the Author of it being also discovered, Valerius Dioclesianus, who governed the family of Carus, was chosen Emperour, and rewarded Aper as he had deserved. On the 15th before the Calends of December, and 10 dayes after, he entred Nicomedia in Purple. From the beginning of this Dioclesian the Egyptians began a new Ara, fetching its rise from the new Moon of Thoth the preceding moneth (August 29) which they called the Ara of Grace for some reason or other. Cappellus observeth, that the fluctuating and virious Chronology of Baronius henceforth beginneth to be right. For thinking, saith he, that he exhibited the years both of the true, and received Ara of Christ in truth, he exhibited neither the one sort nor the other. Beginning the Ara of Dioclesian from the 284 year of our Lord, its true, and right, so that it be understood of the received, not of the true Ara of Christ: and the same is to be said concerning the years of the following Emperours. But after this, Carinus and Dioclesian fought for the Sovereignty, and Carinus after much ado was slain by his own Soldiers for his lasciviousnesse, which made an end of a bloudy and laborious War.

Diocletian.

10. Diocletian then enjoyed the Dignity alone; but great stirr arising in Gall, Carausius also who wastet to defend the sea-Coasts from the invasion of the Franks and Saxons, rather taking part with them than otherwise, he was constrained to create Cesar, Maximianus Hercules. He suppressed the motions in Gall, but commanding Carausius to be killed, this man put on the Purple, though a man of mean condition, and seized upon Britain. Achillens rebelled in Egypt, Africk was in trouble, and Narses King of Persia invaded the Eastern parts. Diocletian awakened with these dangers, promoted Maximianus to be Augustus, and they two adopted for Casars Maximianus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus, who married Theodora the wife's daughter of Hercules, and by her had six sons, as the other, the daughter of Diocletian. Carausius valiantly held Britain for seven years, and then was slain by Allectus, who having kept possession of the Island three years, was overthrown by Aselepiodorus. Constantius fighting against the Allemani in Gall, at first was worsted, but afterwards got a great victory, wherein 60000 of them are said to have been slain. Maximianus Hercules reduced Africk. Diocletian himself besieging Achillens in Alexandria 8 moneths, at length slew him therein, gave up the Citie to be plundered by the Soldiers, and vexed all Egypt with proscriptions and slaughters. Galerius was overthrown by the Persian King, and fled to Diocletian, who received him with great disdain, and made him run in his Purple Robe for some miles before his Chariot. Galerius much moved by this disgrace recruited his Army throughout Illyricum and Masie, and returning against Narses, routed his Army, took his Camp, his Wives, Sisters, and Children, many of his Nobles, and great Treasure, wherewith returning into Mesopotamia unto Diocletian, he was then received most honourably; for he had taken Ctesiphon, subdued Assyria, and recovered those five Provinces beyond Tigris, which revolted from Trajan.

persecution.

11. After this were the Carpi, Bastarna, and Sarmarians overthrown, and divers other Nations quieted. Diocletian now suffered himself to be called Lord, and worshipped as a God. He in the East, and his Collegue in the West, raised against the Christians the most heavy persecution that ever yet had hapned both for length and cruelty. The Soldiers were first begun with, whereof all such as would not sacrifice to Devils were cashiered; but the persecutors proceeded to such cruelty and rage that some were Crucified, others burnt alive, others roasted with slow fiers, and others pulled in pieces by having their limbs made fast to boughs of Trees, which being brought together for that purpose, were afterwards suffered to return to their natural position. Some were starved to death, many slain with the sword, and many devoured of wild beasts. Some were flead alive, others beaten to death by hot burning iron rods, and some returned to prison after their torments, there to languish away. Women were hung naked by one foot, and some had their breasts seared: no Sex, no Age, no condition was spared. A terrible Earthquake followed in Syria, which destroyed many thousands about Tyre and Sidon. But in the second year of this persecution Diocletian perswaded his Collegue, though unwilling, that they both might resign the Empire to the two Casars; so that he being seized with a fowl disease after he had almost reigned twenty years, put off the Purple at Nicomedia, and Maximianus Herculus the same day at Milain. The former withdrew to Salena into his own Countrey, and the later into Lucania.

12. The two Casars, Maximianus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus Orosius, became Augusti after the resignation of their fathers in Law, and first of all others parted the Empire between them. To Constantius fell Gall, Britain, Spain, Italy, and Africk; to the other Illyricum, with Greece, and Asia. Galerius created Casars his sister's two sons, Galerius Maximinus and Severus. The East he appointed to Maximinus, and intended Italy for Severus, if he could but take it from Constantius. For this purpose he kept at Rome as an Hostage Constantine the son of Constantius by Helena a British woman as some say, which he put away when he married the daughter of Maximianus. But Constantine made an escape to his father, who died at York in Britain not long after, on the 25 of July, in the third year of his reign, he and his Collegue both the sixth time being Consuls, in the 1058 year of the City, the 306 of the ordinary Aera of Christ, the first year of the 271 Olympiad ending. His son Constantine in Britain was now saluted Emperour.

13. The Prætorian Soldiers at Rome named Emperour Maxentius the son of Maximianus Herculus, who together with Diocletian had resigned the Government. Against Maxentius, Galerius sent Severus, who besieging Aurelius Vi- Rome was betrayed by his Soldiers, and flying away was killed at Ravenna. Now Maximianus Herculus out of desire to recover the Empire joyned with Constantine, to whom he married Fausta his daughter by Entropia; then to obtain his design did he plot against both son and son-in-law, but being frustrated by both, hanged himself at Massilia, now Marseils, a Citie in France. Maxentius his son, and Galerius Maximinus, otherwise disagreeing joyned in renewing the persecution against the Christians, by Eusebius called the second, which we understand of his age. But Galerius Maximianus Augustus made Licinius his Collegue in the Empire in the fifth year after the death of Constantius, in which year also Sapores the seventh King of Persia began his reign. Galerius Augustus heightning the persecution of Christians by several cruel edicts, rotted within, and was eaten with vvorms, vvhich crawled out of his belly, so that the Physicians not able to endure the stench of his body vvere put to death. Perceiving the hand of God upon him, in his own and Constantines name he recalled his Edicts, and at last miserably died. This vvas the second persecution, vvhich if it be joyned vwith the former, both make up about 8 years. But this rest scarcely continued 6 moneths; for Maximianus being dead at Salona, Maximinus being nothing amended by so sad an example, renewed the persecution. His fury God chastized by putting him to flight before the Armenians vvhom he had provoked, as also by pestipestilence and famine, wherein by Gods Grace the humanity of Christians was as admirable as formerly their constancy had been. Now the Roman Empire was under four Princes, viz. Constantine and Maxentius sons of Emperours, and Maximinus and Licinius new raised men.

14. The chief men at Rome being wearied with the Tyranny of Maxentius sent for Constantine against him. Constantine in his journey by the benefit of a famous vision tasted of Christianity, being formerly inclined towards it. The truth of the story he confirmed to Eusebius by an oath (as that Historian telleth us in the History of his life) and relateth it after this manner: A little past noon he beheld the sign of a Crosse lively figured in the air, with an Inscription in it, containing these words: In hoc vince. In this overcome. He said, that both he and his whole Army did wonder at so strange a prodigy. It's further said, that Christ appearing to him in a dream, commanded him to make the figure of the Crosse which he had seen, and to wear it in his Colours in the field. Proceeding against Maxentius, he overthrew his forces four times, although four times larger than his own; at the later time Maxentius flying amain towards Rome, was drowned in the River. Maximinus published an Edict against Christians, but was forced to sing a palinode twice, although his flattery was as unprofitable as his threats, for he died of an horrible disease at Tarsus. Then did Constantine and Licinius enjoy the Empire together. The former after his Victory over Maxentius was confirmed in the Christian Faith, and owned Christ for the Author of his successe. Licinius complied with him for a time in encouraging the Christians; but afterwards plotting against him, he also began a grievous persecution against the People of God, changed the good Laws, and laid heavy impositions on his Subjects. Constantine being hereby constrained to make Warre upon him, overthrew him in Pannonia, and several times afterwards, for that he had renewed the War both by Land and Sea most perfidiously, and given the title of Cesar to Martinianus. At length he forced him to yield his person, and deliver up his Robe by the hand of his wife, which was Constantine's sister, given him on purpose to oblige him. He sent him to Thessalonica, where he afterwards attempting new matters, he commanded him to be slain.

15. Thus did Constantine obtain the Monarchy of the Roman Empire, in the nineteenth year of his reign, the fourth of the 275 Olympiad, A. V. C. 1077, A. D. 324. Six years after, in the 25 of his reign, he repaired Byzantium, and making it larger than ever, caried from Rome the greatest part of the ornaments, and of Christian Senators, and calling it after himself Constantinople; would have it also named New Rome, and to be head of the Roman Empire with the same right as the other. He first of all had designed to build a City near Sardis in Asia, afterwards begun one at Siganum a Promontory of Mount Ida, in the Country of Troas. The third time the design was begun at Chalcedon, where walls were erected; but fowls snatching up and carrying away the cords of the workmen to Byzantium a City of Thrace, upon it the Emperour pitched. This Town was first built in the third year of the thirtieth Olympiad; Hesychius saith by a Colony of the Argives, Amminianus by one of the Athenians, Velleius saith, it was a Colony of the Milefians, and Marcianus Periegetos of the Megarians, being so named from Byzas their Country-man and Captain of the Colony. It stood right over against Chalcedon in a far better soil, which made Apollo term the founders of the later blind men, because they passed by so excellent a place. It ran through various fortune according to that influence which Greece had into it's affaires; as we have from time to time observed upon occasion. Severus the Emperour almost destroyed it, but by the Soldiers of Galiennus it was brought to ruine, and now restored and augmented by Constantine.

16. This Empire being now in it's declining condition, by reason of it's old age (for all sublunary things are subject to the vicissitude of time) and sorely distempered by inward heats, into which want of hereditary Monarchy, and the horrid licentiousnesse of a standing Army had thrown it, as also labouring under so huge a bulk, and so great a plethora as Nature could not well govern, govern, being forced as it were by Constantine to change its natural, suitable, and native air, by so violent an alteration contracted its mortal infirmity. For as plants being transplanted out of their native soil, into other regions divers in climate and quality, retain little of their natural virtue; so humane affairs, especially Dominions and Empires, by such great mutations lose their vigour and stability, even also as we see it happeneth to several sorts of Animals. For this cause the Senate would never consent to the Commons to depart from Rome to Veii, though a place much more pleasant and commodious, especially after Rome was burnt by the Galls. All great and sodain mutations as to the body natural, so to the body Politick, are ever dangerous. But this translation of the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, seemeth also to have given some occasion to a second error of Constantine, whereby dividing his Empire into three parts to his sons, of one great one he made three, with a notable diminution of authority and strength. For his sons falling out amongst themselves, they so defeated one another, as the Empire was exhausted, and enervated amongst them.

came to passe.

17. For although it somerimes a little recovered under one Prince, yet remained it so lyable to divisions, that it seldom happened but it was divided into Eastern and Western, till at length Odoacer King of the Heruli and Turingi entering Italy with a great Army, cast Augustulus into such straights, that out of desperation he quitted the Western Empire, which happened about the year 476. The Hunni ere this had passed over Danubius, Alaricus King of the Vandals had taken Rome. The Vandals first seized on Andalusia, and afterwards on Africk: the Alani on Lusitania (now Portugal) and the Goths on the greater part of Spain, the Angli on Britain, and the Burgundians on Provence. Justinian the Emperour by driving the Vandals out of Africk and the Goths out of Italy, did a little repair these decayes. but the effect thereof continued not long, for about the year 710 the Armies and Heresie of Mahomet began to disturb the Eastern Empire: and in a short time the Saracens over-ran Syria, Egypt, Africk, Sicily, and Spain. About the year 735 they also seized on several parts of Gall. Thus was the Western Empire by little and little torn in pieces and canonized. At length by a new title it came to Charls the Great, in whose family it scarcely continued 100 years, and then came to be Elective by seven Persons, and so continueth rather a resemblance of an Empire than otherwise unto this day. As for the Eastern, it continued so weak, that scarcely somerimes could it defend the Metropolis against the Saracens; much lesse could it afford any assistance to the other; and after the Saracens, the Turks got ground of it by little and little, till having for many years left the Emperours little more than an empty name, at last Constantinople also was taken by Mahomet the Great. No more at present by way of Anticipation, either concerning the decay of the Roman Empire, or of those particular Kingdoms, Principalities, and States that were cut out of it, all which are referred to the method of another Volume. But as we said, the division of the Empire took its original from the translation of the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, it increased by plurality of Princes, and came to perfection in the promotion of Charls the Great, after which there was no communion of Government, Laws, Magistracy, or Councils, as had been before. Now to our continuation of Ecclesiastical matters.

Bishops,

18. In the second year of Decius was Fabianus Bishop of Rome crowned with Martyrdom on the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The Sea was vacant for one year, and then was chosen Cornelius, whose election displeasing some, Novatus ordained against him Novatianus. The year following Cornelius was martyred on the eighteenth before the Calends of October, and Lucius succeeded him, who shortly after was banished. In the second of Gallienus was he beheaded, and after a vacancy of 35 dayes, Stephen succeeded on the ninth of April the first feria, who interceding for Basilides condemned by the Spaniards, they defended their right against him, and condemned his usurpation against the Africans as appeareth from Cyprian's Epistles, Epistles, as also that the boldness of the Roman See was now checked by all the Provinces. After three years Stephen was beheaded by the command of Valerian, and Sixtus succeeded him, who being beheaded when Laurence the Deacon was tried to death by the command of Valerian, Dionysius succeeded. After him came Felix, and then Eutychianus, who being martyred in the first of Carnus, after nine days Caius succeeded, December 16. Caius was crowned with Martyrdom in the twelfth of Diocletian, and after eleven days Marcellinus succeeded, who through fear offering incense to Idols, when he denied it, was overborn by the testimony of a multitude of witnesses, confessed his fault, and afterwards redeemed his credit by suffering Martyrdom. Marcellus succeeded him. After Marcellus succeeded Eusebius, and then Miltiades, then Sylvester, who was Bishop at the time of the Council of Nice, in the twentieth year of Constantine.

19. After Alexander, Maxabanes was Bishop of Jerusalem untill the reign of Gallus and Volusianus, after him Hymeneus till the time of Aurelian. Then followed Zambdas and Hermon, according to (a) Eusebius, (a) Lib. 7. c. 19. who writeth, that the Sea of Jerusalem was alwaies honoured, and the succession continued unto his own days. After Hermon Macarius was Bishop, and was present at the Council of Nice. In the Church of Antioch after Socrat. Phileas succeeded Zebinus, and then Babylas, who died in prison, in the Scholast. l. 1. cap. 9, 13. persecution under Decius. Him followed Fabius, him Demetrianus, and him Paulus Samosatenus the heretick, who denying the Divinity of the Son of God, was excommunicated, and deprived by the second Synod held against him at Antioch in the days of (c) Aurelianus. And when he would (c) Euseb. l. 7. c. 29, 30. neither depart the Church, nor avoid the house, the Emperour was besought (the first application to the Prince in this nature by the Christians) to interpose and command by edict, that such should have the house as agreed in doctrine with the followers of the Bishop of Rome and Italy. Domnus was by the Synod appointed to succeed him, after whom followed Timens, Cyrillus, Dorotheus, Tyrannus, Vitalis, Philogonus a Martyr, and (d) Eustathius, (d) Socrat. l. 1. c. 9, 23. who was at the Council of Nice. He fell into the Heresie of Sabellius, who being the Scholar of Novatus, taught that the three Persons of the Trinity were but one; but they differed, in that Sabellius said not the Father to have suffered. He was deposed by a Council held at Antioch. Eusebius Pamphilus Bishop of Cæsarea confuted him. After his deposition the Sea was vacant eight years. In the Sea of Alexandria after Heraclas, Dionysius the Scholar of Origen was Bishop, in the third year of Philip. He reporteth in (e) Eusebius the peril he stood in, and the persecution he suffered under Decius. He wrote of the Alexandrian Martyrs to Fabius Bishop of Antioch; (e) Quem vid. l. 6, c. 7. passim. and to Novatus the Heretick, who being a Priest of Rome fell from his order, and calling his Sect Cathari, would not admit unto the Church such as fell after repentance, and he abhorred second marriage. Dionysius also wrote to Hermanion, to Steven, and Xistus Bishops of Rome, unto Philemon a Minister of Rome, and unto Dionysius Bishop of Rome. He confuted the Book of Nepos the Chiliaft, and confounded in open disputation Coracion his disciple. Hitherto this error of the Millenaries propagated by Papias, had many of the Fathers that adhered to it, who yet held that Christ when he came was to do his own work, without any prejudice to Earthly Princes in the mean time. Some observe, that Dionysius striking at this error, traduceth the Apocalypse, as also defending the distinction of Persons against Sabellius, seemeth to make three Essences. Many betook themselves to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, that he would reclaim him, and obtained it. After he had governed the Church seventeen years he died, and Maximinus succeeded him, whom followed Theonas, and him Peter, who was martyred under Diocletian. Him succeeded Achillus, and then came Alexander, who was at the Council of Nice. Hee by preaching of the Trinity somewhat curiously, gave occasion to Arius one of his Clergy to fall from the Faith, as * Socrates in-<sup>l. 1. c. 1.</sup> formeth us.

20. In the fifth year of Philip whilst Fabianus was Bishop of Rome, Do-

Novatus the Bishop of Carthage died, and Cyprian succeeded him by consent of all men except Felicissimus, who, whilst the Heathens invaded his patrimony, endeavoured to deprive him of his Bishoprick. Felicissimus was ordained Bishop by Novatus, who also ordained Novatianus against Cornelius Bishop of Rome. Yet Cornelius favoured Felicissimus against Cyprian, and would have taken Cognisance of their business, whereupon Cyprian vehemently rebuketh him, and denies that any one beyond the Sea hath right to passe judgement upon any matters concerning Africa. And a little after, the pride of the Roman Sea was reprehended by all those of the Provinces, an occasion being given about Basilides, who being censured in Spain, complained to Stephen the Bishop of Rome. Cyprian was several times driven into exile. (a) Eusebius maketh him to have erred in rebaptizing Hereticks. In the fourth of Valerian died Origen seventy years old, a man of admirable parts, most austere life, indefatigable industry, and stupendious learning, but of impure Doctrine. Jerome sheweth how full of portentous errors his book περι ἀρχῶν is. (b) Augustin saith, he held the Devil at length should be delivered from Hell, and associated with the holy Angels, and for this, and other things, especially for holding alternate or successive blessedness and misery for ever, the Church did reject him. Pamphilus wrote an Apology for him. But his works are to be read with especial care, and especially his Commentaries upon the Scripture, concerning some of which Theodore (c) Beza passeth this censure: Certe hoc ausim dicere, si hæc sunt Origenis ejus titulum præferant, hunc hominem fuisse selectum Diaboli organum Apostolica Doctrina evertenda destinatum; for he evaporateth the solid and substantial Doctrine of the Gospel, into Allegorical, and airy Notions.

21. But, God having exercised his people by many a fiery trial, was pleased to preserve the bush unburned, and at length to grant them Peace by Constantine, who proved a nursing father to the Church, taking away all penal Laws against them, and enacting new ones, not onely for their preservation, but convenience and comfort. And as he preserved them from external violence; so he also took care for their inward peace. This had been somewhat of late disturbed by the Heresie of Manes, from whom his followers were named Maniches, who began to publish his impure Doctrine in the first of Probus, in the 277 year of the ordinary, or received Æra of Christ. This fellow being a Persian, said that he was born of a Virgin, that he was both Christ and the holy Ghost, and sent out twelve Disciples to preach his Doctrine, which was made up of many old Heresies heretofore named. But his, and other grosse opinions found not such entertainment as to procure so much disturbance as that of Arius did, who having as we said heard Alexander the Bishop of Alexandria discoursing curiously of the Trinity, and thinking that he maintained the error of Sabelius, in opposition to him fell to deny the blessed Trinity, and affirmed that the son of God was like unto God in name onely, and not in substance. His Heresie having been condemned in many Synods, Constantine in the 20th of his reign A. D. 325. summoned a General Council to meet at Nice, where assembled 318 Bishops. In opposition to Arianism was framed the Nicene Creed, June 19. Hosius presided as he had done in the Synodes of Egypt, and first subscribed the Canons. Besides the condemnation of Arius, the Sanction concerning Easter made at Arles and in Palastine was confirmed. Moreover, twenty Ecclesiastical Canons were established, than which no good Author mentioneth more. Now were the Temples of Idols overthrown, and Churches Erected, the service of Devils was banished, and the worship of the true God owned and encouraged: now faith and patience triumphed over most tedious and exquisite persecutions, and truth dispelled the Clouds of prejudice and error.

The Council of Nice.

Mr. George Herbert his Church Militant.

Religion now flourish'd in Greece, where Arts Gave her the hig best place in all mens hearts.
Learning was pos'd, Philosophy was set,
Sophisters taken in a fishers net.
Plato, and Aristotle were at a losse,
And wheel'd about again to spell Christs Crosse.
Prayers chased Syllogisms into their den,
And Ergo was transform'd into Amen.
Though Greece took horse as soon as Egypt did,
And Rome as both, yet Egypt faster rid,
And spent her period, and prefixed time
Before the other. Greece being past her prime, Religion went to Rome, subduing those,
Who that they might subdue made all their foes.
The Warriour his dear skars no more resounds,
But seems to yield Christ haile the greater wounds,
Wounds willingly endur'd to work his blisse,
Who by an ambush lost his Paradise.
The great heart stoops, and taketh from the dust
A sad repentance, not the spoils of lust;
Quitting his spear, lest it should pierce again
Him in his members, who for him was slain.
The shepherds hook grew to a Scepter here,
Giving new names, and numbers to the year.
But th' Empire dwelt in Greece, to comfort them
Who were cut short in Alexander's stem.
In both of these Promise and Arts did tame
And tune mens hearts against the Gospel came,
Which using, and not fearing skill in th' one
Or strength in th' other, did erect her Throne.
Many a rent, and struggling th' Empire knew (As dying things are wont) untill it flew
At length to Germany, still westward bending,
And there the Churches festival attending:
That as before Empire, and Arts made way,
(For no lesse Harbingers would serve than they)
So they might still, and point us out the place Where first the Church should raise her down-cast face.
Strength levels ground, Art makes a Garden there,
Then shows Religion, and makes all to bear.
Spain in the Empire shar'd with Germany,
But England in the higher victory
Giving the Church a Crown to keep her state,
And not so lesse than she had done of late.
Constantines British line meant this of old,
And did this mystery wrap up, and fold
Within a sheet of paper, which was rent
From time's great Chronicle and hither sent.
Thus both the Church and Sun together ran Unto the farthest old Meridian.

How dear to me, O God thy Counsels are!
Who may with thee compare?

READER, there being many proper names in this work, which the Printers rarely meet with elsewhere, this hath occasioned the more faults in the Impression; yet most of them are corrected by a frequent printing of them aright, especially towards the later end of the Book; most faults being onely the alteration of one letter in a word. Such of these, or others, that are most notable thus correct, and passe by the rest by thy candour.
